MORRIS, L.J., was, apparently, of the opinion that, because they agreed to disobey the order and because neither was in a position of authority over the other, the negligence was joint and that Dale's negligence could not have been asserted by Stapley if he had lived, or by his widow in the circumstances of his death. With the greatest respect for the lord justice's opinion, I cannot follow his reasoning. The doctrines of common employment and of contributory negligence having been abolished, the only question is whether, under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1), Stapley's death was "the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of" Dale, for whose fault the respondents are responsible. It follows, in my opinion, that Stapley, if he had lived, could have asserted as against the respondents that Dale's breach of duty had contributed to the accident and that his widow can do likewise in the circumstances of his death. Each man was responsible for disobeying the order and, in my opinion, it is quite uncertain whether Stapley would have acted as he did had not Dale agreed that the roof was safe and that they should go on with their ordinary work. I think the matter may be tested by considering a case of conspiracy. If an agreement to commit an unlawful act is sufficiently causally connected with the unlawful act to be criminal, how can it be said that an agreement to commit a breach of duty is not causally connected with the consequences to either party of that breach of duty? For these reasons, my Lords, I am of opinion that the judgment of SELLERS, J., was right and ought to be restored on the question of liability. I am not at all certain that I should not have decided the apportionment in the same way as the learned judge did, but in view of your Lordships' view that the apportionment should be varied, I am not prepared to dissent.

LORD REID: My Lords, in the respondents' mines the workings are driven at right angles away from the main haulage way. The actual working place is the stope and the part between it and the haulage way is the twitten. The miners all work in pairs, one being the borer and the other the breaker. There is no sharp demarcation between their work and neither can give orders to the other, though the borer appears to be the senior man. Before the accident Stapley and Dale were working together, Stapley being the breaker. He was a steady workman with long experience, but rather slow. He had for a time been a borer but had reverted to being a breaker. A well recognised danger in the mine is a fall of part of the roof. The roof is not generally shored up as any weakness in it can be detected by tapping it. If it is "drummy", giving a hollow sound, it is unsafe and must be taken down. There are three ways of doing this—with a pick, or with a pinch bar or crow bar, or by firing a shot. Whichever way is adopted, of course, men doing the necessary work must not stand immediately below the dangerous part of the roof. One morning when Stapley and Dale arrived at their stope they tested the roof and found it to be drummy. They saw the foreman, Church, about it and he ordered them to fetch it down. They all knew that that meant that no one was to work under the roof before it had come down. Church did not say which method was to be adopted. Both men were accustomed to this work and the method was properly left to their discretion. They used picks, but after half an hour had made no impression. The work was awkwardly placed as a fault ran across the mouth of the stope, the floor and roof inside being about eighteen inches higher than outside it. Probably they could not use a pinch bar, but they could easily have prepared the place for firing a shot and sent for the shot-firer. Instead, according to Dale whose evidence was accepted, they agreed that the roof was safe enough for them to resume their ordinary work, and did so. There was a quantity of gypsum lying in the stope and if the roof had been safe their first task would have been to get this to the haulage way.

A To do that, Stapley had to enter the stope and break the gypsum into smaller pieces and Dale had to make preparations in the twitten. So they separated, and when Dale came back half an hour later he found Stapley lying dead in the stope under a large piece of the roof which had fallen on him.

There is no doubt that if these men had obeyed their orders the accident would not have happened. Both acted in breach of orders and in breach of safety regulations, and both ought to have known quite well that it was dangerous for Stapley to enter the stope. The present action against the respondents is chiefly based on Dale's fault having contributed to the accident, and on the respondents being responsible for it, the defence of common employment being no longer available. So it is necessary to consider what would have happened if Dale had done his duty. It was his duty either to try a pinch bar or to start boring holes for the shot-firer, and on the evidence I think that it is highly probable that, if he had insisted on doing that instead of agreeing with Stapley to neglect their orders and the regulations, Stapley would not have stood out against him or tried to resume his ordinary work. Stapley had nothing to gain from his disobedience, and, if he had not found Dale in agreement with him, it appears to me unlikely that he would have persisted. But if he had persisted

E and thereby prevented Dale from carrying out his orders—because Dale could not have worked at the roof if Stapley had persisted in going below it—then it was Dale's duty to go for the foreman, as he, Dale, could not give orders to Stapley. We do not know how soon the roof fell or how long it would have taken Dale to find and bring the foreman, but it is, at least, quite likely that the foreman would have arrived in time to prevent the accident. If Dale's

F failure did contribute to the accident, then I do not see on what ground the respondents can escape liability in respect of that failure.

In these circumstances it is necessary to determine what caused the death of Stapley. If it was caused solely by his own fault, then the appellant cannot succeed. But if it was caused partly by his own fault and partly by the fault of Dale, then the appellant can rely on the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. To determine what caused an accident from the point of view of legal liability is a most difficult task. If there is any valid logical or scientific theory of causation, it is quite irrelevant in this connection. In a court of law, this question must be decided as a properly instructed and reasonable jury would decide it. As LORD DU PARCQ said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 246) in Grant v. Sun Shipping Co., Ltd. (3):

H “A jury would not have profited by a direction couched in the language of logicians, and expounding theories of causation, with or without the aid of Latin maxims.”

The question must be determined by applying common sense to the facts of each particular case. One may find that, as a matter of history, several people have been at fault and that if any one of them had acted properly the accident would not have happened, but that does not mean that the accident must be regarded as having been caused by the faults of all of them. One must discriminate between those faults which must be discarded as being too remote and those which must not. Sometimes it is proper to discard all but one and to regard that one as the sole cause, but in other cases it is proper to regard two or more as having jointly caused the accident. I doubt whether any test can be applied generally. It may often be dangerous to apply to this kind of case tests which have been used in traffic accidents by land or sea, but in this case I think it useful to adopt phrases from the speech of VISCOUNT BIRKENHEAD, L.C. ([1922] 1 A.C. 144, 145) in Admiralty Comrs. v. S.S. Volute (2), and to ask: Was Dale's fault "so much mixed up with the state of things brought about" by Stapley that "in the ordinary plain common sense of this business" it must be regarded as having contributed to the accident? I can only say that I think it was and that there was no "sufficient separation of time, place or circumstance" between them to justify its being excluded. Dale's fault was one of omission rather than commission and it may often be impossible to say that, if a man had done what he omitted to do, the accident would certainly have been prevented. It is enough, in my judgment, if there is a sufficiently high degree of probability that the accident would have been prevented. I have already stated my view of the probabilities in this case and I think that it must lead to the conclusion that Dale's fault ought to be regarded as having contributed to the accident.

Finally, it is necessary to apply the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. SELLERS, J., reduced the damages by one half holding both parties equally to blame. Normally one would not disturb such an award, but SELLERS, J., does not appear to have taken into account the fact that Stapley deliberately and culpably entered the stope. By doing so, it appears to me that he contributed to the accident much more directly than Dale. Section 1 (1) of the Act directs that the damages " . . . shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage."

A court must deal broadly with the problem of apportionment, and, in considering what is just and equitable, must have regard to the blameworthiness of each party, but "the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage" cannot, I think, be assessed without considering the relative importance of his acts in causing the damage apart from his blameworthiness. It may be that in this case Dale was not much less to blame than Stapley, but Stapley's conduct in entering the stope contributed more immediately to the accident than anything that Dale did or failed to do. I agree with your Lordships that in all the circumstances it is proper in this case to reduce the damages by eighty per cent. and to award twenty per cent. of the damages to the appellant. I have not dealt with the question whether, at the time of the accident, the respondents were in breach of reg. 7 (3) of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938, because, whichever way that question was decided, it would not in this case affect my view as to the amount by which the damages should be reduced.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I need not repeat the facts as found by the learned judge. It will, I think, tend to simplify the case if these facts in relation to their causal effect are considered irrespective of the accidental circumstances as to which of the actors happens to be, or to be regarded as standing in the position of, plaintiff or defendant in the action. Two men, named Stapley and Dale, disobeyed the lawful instruction of their foreman, Church, "to bring down the roof" of the stope. It is common ground that this instruction meant, and was understood to mean, that they were to bring it down by the use of a pick or pinch bar or, if either of these methods failed or was impracticable, to bore holes and get the shot-firer to blast it down. Failing all these methods their duty was to report the matter to Church. Having tried for about half an hour to get the roof down with a pick, they did not adopt any of the other methods or report to Church. The result was that the roof remained insecure and dangerous, and if any one entered the stope in that condition an accident was liable to occur. Someone did enter and an accident did occur.

A My Lords, I cannot avoid the conclusion that the failure of these men to carry out their instructions was a contributory cause of the accident. In Admiralty Comrs. v. S.S. Volute (2) VISCOUNT BIRKENHEAD, L.C., said ([1922] 1 A.C. 144):

B “Upon the whole I think that the question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it. And while no doubt, where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is the only one to look to, there are cases in which the two acts come so closely together, and the second act of negligence is so much mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act, that the party secondly negligent, while not held free from blame under The Bywell Castle (4) rule, might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution.”

C Towards the conclusion of his speech he observed (ibid., 145):

“The Volute, in the ordinary plain common sense of this business, having contributed to the accident, it would be right for your Lordships to hold both vessels to blame for the collision.”

D In this connection I venture to quote a passage from a recent judgment of the Privy Council in Sigurdson v. British Columbia Electric Ry. Co. (5), because it was the judgment of the Board including VISCOUNT SIMON, LORD NORMAND and LORD OAKSEY, although it was delivered by me. After referring to the above quoted passages from the Volute (2) the judgment proceeded:

E “This was an Admiralty case, but now that common law courts have to apply the same principles to cases of collision on land it seems to their Lordships that this language will be found particularly suited to the exposition to a jury of the principles which they have to apply in these cases, and is much to be preferred to attempts to classify acts in relation to one another with reference to time or with regard to the knowledge of one party at a particular moment of the negligence of the other party and his appreciation of the resulting danger and by such tests to create categories in some of which one party is solely liable and others in which both parties are liable. Time and knowledge may often be decisive factors but it is for the jury or other tribunal of fact to decide whether, in any particular case, the existence of one of these factors results or does not result in the ascertainment of that clear line to which VISCOUNT BIRKENHEAD referred—moreover, their Lordships do not read him as intending to lay down that the existence of ‘subsequent’ negligence will alone enable that clear line to be found.”

H My Lords, in the present case, the negligence of Stapley in going into the stope seems to me to be “so . . . mixed up with” the negligence of Dale and himself in not obeying their instructions that it cannot be regarded as an independent act unrelated to and distinct from their disobedience so as to make it the sole “real” or “effective” cause of the accident. The decision in these cases is one of fact and degree, and I see no reason for rejecting the conclusion arrived at by SELLERS, J., on this issue. If your Lordships were compelled as a matter of law to hold otherwise, it would appear that no relief is afforded by the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, in a great number of cases under the Factories Act, 1937, where employers are in breach of their obligation to fence but an operative has been negligent in working at an unfenced machine.

My Lords, so far as causation is in question, it can make no difference whether Stapley or Dale was the person injured, nor can it matter whether Stapley was one of two or one of a hundred men who acted in disobedience to the order. Each of them was guilty of a separate and independent act of negligence and breach of statutory duty which was a contributory cause of the accident. It is admitted that, in acting as he did, Dale was in breach of reg. 15 (1) and (10). On the facts of this case these breaches clearly also constituted negligence at common law for which the respondents are responsible. As to the proper proportion of responsibility to be attributed to them, the learned judge does not appear to me to have given sufficient weight to the important fact that it was Stapley alone who entered the dangerous stope. Dale and Stapley were, no doubt, equally at fault up to that stage, but then Stapley alone acted in contravention of reg. 7 (3) by entering and working in the stope which had not been made secure. He must, I think, consequently bear a much larger share of responsibility than the respondents. I agree to the proposed proportions of eighty per cent. and twenty per cent. On this view of the case I have not found it necessary to decide whether the respondents were in breach of their duty under s. 23 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulations Act, 1872, and reg. 7 (3) of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938 [which regulations were substituted by the preamble thereto for the general rules originally contained in s. 23], because on any view it would not affect my conclusion on liability or the proportions of responsibility indicated above. I desire to reserve for future consideration, if and when it arises, whether the result would be different if Dale's acts or omissions had not amounted to negligence, but had only been breaches of statutory duties imposed on him personally. For the reasons stated, I would allow the appeal and assess the damages recoverable by the appellant at the sum of £605. I agree to the order proposed as to costs.

LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE: My Lords, I agree that if, as the majority of your Lordships hold, contributory negligence by the respondents is established and, therefore, a question of apportionment arises, the appellant should not recover more than twenty per cent. of the damage. I find myself, however, unfortunately in disagreement with the majority of your Lordships in so far as you hold that any contributory negligence has been proved, and wish to record, briefly and with respect, my reasons for concurring with the conclusions on this issue of my noble and learned friend, LORD PORTER.

There was in this case, in my opinion, no breach by the respondents, by themselves, or by any servant or agent, of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938, made under s. 86 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. The respondents carried out their obligations under reg. 7 (3) to the letter, if the first line and a half of that regulation be read with the last two and a half lines. If the respondents detail X. and Y. to repair a defect in the walls or roof to restore safety, they cannot possibly, it seems to me, be told that they are breaking the regulation by permitting the repairers to work in a working place which, pending the completion of the repair, is insecure. It was further suggested that the respondents were guilty of a breach of reg. 15 (1). This is a regulation binding on the employee only. It binds him to comply with "such directions concerning safety and discipline as may be given to him by those in authority over him." It was, however, argued that a breach of this regulation by the employee was a breach by the mineowner, on the principle of respondeat superior, which is now disencumbered from the fetters of the doctrine of common employment. This argument, in my view, also fails, so far as it is based on the regulations, since reg. 14 (1) defines the extent to which the mineowners are to be liable for the failure of their employees to carry out the provisions of the regulations and provides that the owner or agent need only "enforce the observance thereof" "to the best of his power". This the respondents clearly did, on the facts of the present case. The regulations were, in my view, complied with, and I only mention them because a very large percentage of the argument was devoted to their supposed breach and its consequences.

A But, it is said, the matter does not rest on the regulations. Over and above them, and unimpaired by them, there is the common law liability of the employers to use all due care for the safety of their employees. This duty, the argument runs, was infringed when Dale, an employee of the owners, acting within the course of his employment, failed to carry out the instructions of Church, the foreman, and this, it is said, was a contributory cause of Stapley's death.

B That Dale was in breach of his duty seems to me undeniable. He, like Stapley, was told (i) to bring down the roof of the dangerous stope; (ii) not to work on the stope till the roof had been brought down. Stapley violated both of these injunctions. Dale violated only the first. Of the three well-recognised methods of bringing the roof down, one—that of fetching the shot-firer and getting it blasted down—he failed to employ, and was a consenting party to

C an arrangement whereby each of them, he and Stapley, should proceed with their respective normal tasks, without that method having first been resorted to. Let it be assumed, therefore, that Dale was guilty of a negligent act committed within the course of his employment. Does it follow, as the night does the day, that Dale's omission, the negligence of Stapley's act being undisputed, was contributory negligence in part causing the mishap to Stapley? In my

D view it does not. The Court of Appeal has so held. Like my noble friend, LORD PORTER, I am not confident that I can wholeheartedly subscribe to the ground on which BIRKETT, L.J., based his conclusion in this sense. He seems to say that, since Stapley's negligent act in resuming work at the dangerous stope with the roof still intact was sufficient in itself to cause the disaster without assistance from any positive negligent act by Dale, ergo the court

E need not take into account the fact that, if Dale had done his duty, the consequences of Stapley's breach of duty might have been averted, and that, consequently, Dale's omission was not a contributory cause of the accident. While I feel, with great respect, doubt about the validity of this reasoning, I consider that the conclusion of the lords justices can, and should, be supported on a different ground.

F Courts of law must accept the fact that the philosophic doctrine of causation and the juridical doctrine of responsibility for the consequences of a negligent act are not congruent. To a philosopher—a term which I use in no disparaging sense, for what is a philosopher but one who, inter alia, reasons severely and with precision?—to a philosopher, the whole legal doctrine of responsibility must seem anomalous. To him, if event C could not occur unless each of two

G previous events—A and B—had preceded it, it would be unmeaning to say that A was more responsible for the occurrence of C than was B, or that B was more responsible for its occurrence than was A. The whole modern doctrine of contributory negligence, however, proceeds on the contrary assumption. If not, there would be no question of apportionment. But the fission between law and strict logic goes deeper than that. For I am persuaded that it is still

H part of the law of this country that two causes may both be necessary pre-conditions of a particular result—damage to X—yet the one may, if the facts justify that conclusion, be treated as the real, substantial, direct or effective cause, and the other dismissed as at best a causa sine qua non and ignored for purposes of legal liability. This is a doctrine affirmed by your Lordships' House, and not, in my view, displaced by the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. On the contrary, the words "as the result of" in s. 1 (1) of that statute impliedly preserve the doctrine, the assertion of which your Lordships have more than once coupled with an admonition that, if the conditions for its application occur, a judge sitting alone should assume the mantle and the mentality of a jury, and should take what is called a "broad common-sense view" in deciding whether one of the causes (there may be two or twenty) is the "real" cause. Approaching the matter from this angle, I have hardly any doubt that a jury would have said that the real cause of this mishap was Stapley's resumption of work at the perilous place without the roof having been brought down. While, no doubt, they would have realised that, if Dale had acted in conformity with his duty, this result might have been averted—it is a pure speculation whether it would or not—yet I am satisfied that they would have said Stapley's act was the real and substantial cause. His resumption of work, in the circumstances, was the crossing of the legal Rubicon. For that reason I agree with my noble friend, LORD PORTER, that the appeal should be dismissed, but, as a majority of your Lordships are of a contrary opinion, I repeat that I think twenty per cent. is a reasonable percentage for the widow to recover.

Appeal allowed.

TERRELL v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES AND OTHERS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), June 4, 5, 17, 19, 1953.]

Judge—Colonial judge—Tenure of office—Tenure during pleasure—Appointment by letter from Secretary of State—No contractual force.

In 1930, by letters dated July 15 and Aug. 7, the claimant was offered by the Secretary of State for the Colonies the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements. One of the matters mentioned in the letter was that the compulsory retiring age would be sixty-two. The claimant accepted the appointment on the terms stated in the letters. In 1942, when Malaya was occupied by the Japanese, he was on leave in Australia, and was unable to resume his office until the British regained control of Malaya. In March, 1942, he was informed that, as no other suitable appointment in the colonial legal service could be found for him, he must be awarded a pension on abolition of office, and on July 7, 1942, his appointment was ended, seventeen months before his sixty-second birthday. On a claim by him that he was not liable to be dismissed before he reached the age of sixty-two, when he would be entitled to a larger pension, HELD: (i) judges in Malaya did not hold their office during good behaviour, but they held, and always had held, office at the pleasure of the Crown, and, therefore, the claimant had held office during pleasure.

(ii) the right of the Crown to dismiss at pleasure was a rule of law which could not be taken away by any contractual arrangement made by any executive officer or department of State, and, therefore, the letters of July 15 and Aug. 7, 1930, did not constitute a contract between the claimant and the Crown that the Crown would employ him till he reached the age of sixty-two, and, therefore, his claim must be dismissed.

AWARD in form of Special Case stated by arbitrator.

By a letter dated July 15, 1930, the Secretary of State for the Colonies offered the claimant, Arthur Koberwein a'Beckett Terrell, a member of the English Bar, then aged 49, practising as an advocate and solicitor in the Straits Settlements since 1909, an appointment as a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements. One of the terms of the offer was that he should not resume his practice in Malaya after retirement. At the same time he was sent a copy of the regulations governing leave and pension. On July 20, 1930, he wrote to the Under-Secretary of State pointing out that, as the rules provided for a minimum of ten years' service as a qualification for pension, and for compulsory retirement at the age of fifty-five, they could not apply to him. On Aug. 7, 1930, the Secretary of State wrote to the claimant stating that he had been selected for appointment on the terms of the letter of July 15, that his special position was governed by reg. 13 (1) of Regulations 2285 of 1928, made under the Straits Settlements Pensions Ordinance, 1928 (No. 22 of 1928), which specified seven years as a qualifying term for a pension, and that the compulsory retiring age in the case of a judge was sixty-two. The claimant accepted the appointment on these terms and was appointed by letters patent under the seal of the colony dated Jan. 23, 1931. He served as a judge of the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements until Jan. 1, 1940, when he became a judge of appeal of the Supreme Court. In February, 1942, when Malaya was occupied by the Japanese, the claimant was on leave in Australia and it became impossible for him to resume his duties until control of Malaya by the British was regained. On Mar. 10, 1942, he was informed that the Secretary of State regretted that he could find no suitable post for him to occupy in the colonial legal service between the expiration of his leave and December, 1943, when he would reach normal retiring age. He was invited to ask for permission to retire and was told that the retirement would become effective three months after notice of acceptance. He felt unable to comply with this suggestion and asked that he might remain on half pay until a suitable appointment became available. On Apr. 7, 1942, the official secretary to the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Australia wrote to the claimant, at the request of the Secretary of State, stating that, as there was no suitable legal appointment, he could not justify retaining him on half pay as his post was necessarily in abeyance, and, therefore, there was no alternative but to award him a pension on abolition of office, and his retirement would take effect and pension commence on the expiration of his leave or three months after the date of the letter, whichever was the later. In the result, his appointment ended on July 7, 1942, seventeen months before his sixty-second birthday. From that date he was paid a yearly pension of £722 18s. 11d., being the pension appropriate to the length of his service if he had retired on that date, whereas, if he had been treated as continuing in office until he was sixty-two, he would have been entitled to a salary of £1,820 per annum till that age and thereafter a pension for life of £812 per annum.

A dispute whether the claimant was liable in law to be required to retire from the position he held as judge of appeal before reaching the age of sixty-two was referred to an arbitrator, who, at the parties' request, stated his award in the form of a Special Case. The arbitrator's findings of law were that: (i) judges of the Straits Settlements and of the Supreme Court of Malaya held office during pleasure; (ii) they were, in any case, subject by statute to compulsory retirement at the age of fifty-five; (iii) the letters of July 15 and Aug. 7, 1930, did not constitute an enforceable contractual obligation, and, even if they did, the claimant was not thereby exempted from his liability to compulsory retirement at the age of fifty-five; (iv) if his finding on (i) was correct, the Crown was not prevented by the representations contained in the letters of July 15 and Aug. 7, 1930, from legally dismissing the claimant before he attained the age of sixty-two, but, if his finding on (i) was wrong, the Crown was in equity prevented from asserting that the claimant was in law liable to be dismissed before attaining the age of sixty-two.

The arbitrator set out the following points of law to be decided by the court:— (i) whether judges of the Straits Settlements and of the Supreme Court of Malaya held office during pleasure; (ii) whether such judges were in any case subject to compulsory retirement at the age of fifty-five; (iii) whether (a) the letters of July 15 and Aug. 7, 1930, amounted to an enforceable contractual obligation annexed to the appointment, and if so (b) whether, as the result of that obligation, the claimant was not liable in law to be required to retire before reaching the age of sixty-two; (iv) whether, by reason of the representations contained in those letters, the Crown was prevented from legally dismissing the claimant until he had attained the age of sixty-two.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 19. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The questions mainly argued before me were (i) Does a judge in Malaya hold his office at the pleasure of the Crown, or is he protected by the provisions of s. 3 of the Act of Settlement, 1700, whereby judges hold their office during good behaviour and can only be removed by an address of both Houses of Parliament? (ii) If a judge is appointed during pleasure and not during good behaviour, was there here a contract that the Crown would employ the claimant until he attained sixty-two, and, if so, can he sue the Crown on that contract?

As to the first contention, counsel for the claimant submitted that the provisions of the Act of Settlement relating to the tenure of a judge are so fundamental in the law of this country that they would form part of the law of a new colony when it was first settled. The doctrines relating to the application of English law to territories acquired by the Crown are to be found in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, vol. I, [107], and his statement of the law was approved in Cooper v. Stuart (1). The mode of acquisition may vitally affect the application, or, at least, the extent of the application, of English law to the acquired territory. If, at the time of annexation by cession or conquest, there exists there a system of law, that will be the law of the country until it is altered by legislation, but there may exist a system of law adapted to the requirements of a native population but unsuitable for English settlers, in which case the settlers will carry the English law with them, at least so far as is necessary to the conditions of the new colony, as in the case of the settlement of unoccupied territory: see Freeman v. Fairlie (2), a case relating to India. This seems to have been the position with regard to the Straits Settlements, which were first colonised by the East India Company, and is, I think, recognised by the decision in Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo (3), which approved a statement of the law on this point by SIR BENSON MAXWELL, C.J., in Choa Choon Neoh v. Spottiswoode (4) (1 Kyshe's Reports, 221), referred to in BRADDELL'S THE LAW OF THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS, 2nd ed. (1931), vol. 1, p. 62. But, in my opinion, it is quite impossible to say that the particular provision of the Act of Settlement relating to English judges of the superior courts automatically became the law of this, or any other, colony. A short answer is that while the section provides for judicial office being held during good behaviour, thus preventing the arbitrary removal of a judge, it also provides that he may be removed by an address of both Houses of Parliament. This appears to me to be wholly inapplicable to a colonial judge, for I cannot believe that it would be right to hold that he could only be removed by an address of both Houses of the Imperial Parliament. It is for the Crown, by exercise of the prerogative, or Parliament, by statute, to set up courts in acquired territory, whether the acquisition be by cession, conquest, or mere settlement, and the conditions under which judges of those courts are to hold their office must depend on the terms on which the Crown or Parliament establish them.

In considering under what tenure the judges in Malaya hold office it is not, I think, necessary to go into a long history of the colony, for in 1866 the Straits Settlements Act (29 & 30 Vict. c. 115), was passed providing, among other things, for the establishment of courts of law in the Straits Settlements. It is, however, by no means unimportant to see what the position was with regard to courts and judges in the colony before the Act was passed. A charter of justice known as the Third Charter had been granted by the Crown in August, 1855, and was ratified by a statute passed in the same year (18 & 19 Vict. c. 93, s. 4). The court established thereunder was to consist of two divisions, one sitting at Singapore and Malacca, the other at Prince of Wales' Island, afterwards known as Penang. The judges were the governor, the resident councillor for the time being of the station in which the court sat, and, as professional judges for each division, the recorders of Singapore and Penang. It was expressly provided in the charter that the recorders should hold office during pleasure. A colonial governor always holds office during pleasure and the resident councillor was also a royal appointment, and the charter provided that they should act as judges during their term of office. It is clear, therefore, that when the Act of 1866 was passed, the judges held office during pleasure. Section 2 of that Act empowered Her Majesty by Order in Council inter alia to constitute such courts and officers as might be deemed advisable, any law, statute or usage to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding, thus, in my opinion, giving a complete and unfettered discretion to the Crown as to the terms on which judges and officers might be appointed. By the following section Her Majesty was given power to delegate her powers to three or more persons within the Settlements, and powers have been delegated by the Crown from time to time by letters patent to the governor and executive council.

Consequent on this Act and the delegation, the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements was established by the Supreme Court Ordinance, 1868 (No. 5 of 1868). Thereunder, the recorder of Singapore became the chief justice of the Straits Settlements and the recorder of Penang became the first judge of Penang, and it was provided by s. 6 that future judges should be appointed by Her Majesty by letters patent under the public seal of the colony to be issued in pursuance of a warrant under the sign manual or signet. There is nothing whatever in the ordinance to indicate that the tenure of these judges was changed, and the only possible inference is that they, as judges of the newly constituted court, held office at pleasure, as they had in the former court. It cannot be supposed that the tenure of future judges was intended to be in any way different from that by which the chief justice and the other senior judge, who were the original judges of the new court, held their offices. The ordinance in force at the time of the claimant's appointment was the Courts Ordinance, 1926 (Revised Laws, 1926 (No. 101)), and s. 4 (1) provided that judges of the Supreme Court should be appointed by His Majesty by letters patent under the public seal of the colony to be issued in pursuance of any warrant to be granted by His Majesty under his sign manual and signet, and this provision again appears in s. 4 (1) of the consolidating ordinance, the Courts Ordinance, 1935 (Revised Laws, 1936 (c. 10)). The royal letters patent of February, 1911, which are the instructions by the Crown to the governor, provide (as there is no doubt that earlier editions did, for, as I shall mention later, I have seen them) that "the governor may, in our name and on our behalf, constitute and appoint all such judges, commissioners, justices of the peace, and other necessary officers as may be lawfully constituted or appointed by us, all of whom, unless otherwise provided by law, shall hold their offices during our pleasure."

It is not without importance to observe that, when those letters patent of February, 1911, were sealed, the material section of the Act of Settlement had long been repealed. It was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1881, as no longer necessary because a similar provision had been inserted in the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, which indisputably applied only to the Supreme Court of this country. So I can find no statutory provision that could apply to the judges of the Straits Settlements in 1911 making their offices tenable on conditions different from those which existed in 1868. The words "unless otherwise provided by law" are probably inserted ex abundanti cautela, and, in any case, would safeguard the position if a subsequent legislative provision were made altering the tenure of office for the future. At a late stage in the argument I was shown and asked by both parties to look at the royal warrant to the governor, authorising him to seal the letters patent appointing the claimant to his office. This is the warrant contemplated by s. 4 (1) of the 1926 ordinance. It carries the matter no further as it follows the terms of the letters patent to the governor, and requires him to seal letters patent appointing the applicant to hold his office during His then Majesty's pleasure.

In my opinion, it is clear that judges in the Straits Settlements—or Malaya to use the modern nomenclature—hold, and always have held, their office at the pleasure of the Crown. It does not appear to me that there is anything surprising in this. So accustomed are we in this country nowadays to the exceptional position occupied by the judges of the Supreme Court that we are apt, perhaps, to forget that their independence is comparatively modern in the long history of our law. Professor MAITLAND points out in his CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND (pp. 68, 69) that it was in the reign of Henry II that a body of professional judges first emerged to cope with the increasing work of the curia regis, and from them evolved the superior courts of common law. So from the middle of the twelfth century to the last years of the seventeenth century, so far as any statutory provision was concerned, the judges of the royal courts, undoubtedly, held their office at the pleasure of the sovereign, though, according to HALLAM'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND (1869 ed.), p. 736, the commissions of the judges in the reign of William III were made "quamdiu se bene gesserint". The great majority of judicial personages in this country do not enjoy the exceptional position of the judges of the Supreme Court. County court judges do not, though they do have a measure of protection by s. 7 of the County Courts Act, 1934, nor do justices of the peace, who deal with something like ninety per cent. of all criminal cases as well as with a multitude of civil matters. They have no security of tenure.

A Stipendiaries hold office during pleasure: see the Stipendiary Magistrates Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 97), s. 3, and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 161. So do the metropolitan police magistrates by the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829 (10 Geo. 4, c. 44), s. 1. Therefore, it is not fundamental to the office of a judge that he should possess the immunity with which it was found necessary to clothe the judges of the Supreme Court by reason of what was considered the undue subservience of the judiciary in the time of the Stuarts towards the sovereign, and, more particularly, the attitude that they had taken up under fear of dismissal in upholding the exercise of the suspending power by James II. I recognise, of course, that the judicial personages to whom I have referred, with the exception of justices of the peace, are appointed under modern statutes, and the legislature can impose any terms which seem to it appropriate. So here, in my opinion, the legislature has left it to the Crown to determine the tenure of the judges in Malaya, and the Crown has determined it by the letters patent and the royal warrant. It is no reflection on the high standard and learning of the colonial judicial service to say that they hold office during pleasure. It may well be that when setting up courts in colonies, when in their infancy and when communications were difficult and lengthy, the Crown desired to retain a fuller and more speedily exercisable control over the judges of those colonies than existed in this country.

Through the courtesy of the librarian of the India Office library I have been able to see the letters patent which set up the High Courts in India. The first of these were the letters patent of Mar. 26, 1774, issued pursuant to 13 Geo. 3, c. 63, establishing a Supreme Court at Fort William for the province of Bengal. E They provided for a chief justice and two puisne judges to be appointed during pleasure, and men of the quality and standing of Sir Elijah Impey, the first chief justice of Bengal, and Sir Robert Chambers, the friend of Blackstone and his successor in the Vinerian Chair at Oxford, were content to accept office on those terms. Similar courts were established at Madras in December, 1800, and at Bombay in December, 1823, and the first court for Prince of Wales' F Island, Singapore and Malacca was set up by letters patent of November, 1826, the previous court, for Prince of Wales' Island only, having been established in 1807. In the letters patent by which all these courts were established, the same provision as to the tenure of the judges is found. That there has never been a demand to alter the terms of appointment of the judges in the colonial legal service may, indeed, be regarded as a tribute to the general judicial G conduct and quality of those who fill these positions. I may add, before leaving this part of the case, that it seems clear that both the clause in the letters patent of February, 1911, to which I have referred, and the Pensions Ordinance, 1928 (Revised Laws, 1936 (c. 78)), s. 11 (1), which provides that the governor may require the retirement of a judge at a certain age, clearly proceed on the assumption that a judge in Malaya holds his office at pleasure, and it would H seem strange indeed if not only the Secretary of State on whose advice the letters patent are issued, but also the legislative council which passed the ordinances, have all along been under a misapprehension as to the tenure whereby a judge of the colony holds his office. If a tenure equivalent to that conferred by the Act of Settlement were intended, I should expect to find it stated clearly somewhere, and not left to be implied by inference.

Then it is submitted that, even if the judges held office during pleasure, the effect of the correspondence to which I have referred earlier in this judgment is to constitute a contract between the Crown and the claimant that he should be retained in office till he attained the age of sixty-two. The present court is a creation of the Act of 1866 which, by the section already quoted, gave the Crown complete freedom as to the constitution of the courts and its officers. I have difficulty, therefore, in seeing how the Secretary of State, on whose behalf the letters were written, would have authority to bind the Crown, even if he had purported to do so. So to do would appear to me clearly to constitute a clog on the Crown's right to dismiss at pleasure. I regard this right as a rule of law firmly established by the decisions (for instance, Dunn v. Reginam (5), Shenton v. Smith (6), and Rodwell v. Thomas (7)), and once it is established that the Crown has power to dismiss at pleasure, that right cannot be taken away by any contractual arrangement made by an executive officer or department of State. Counsel for the claimant argued that this doctrine is founded on public policy, and referred to passages in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Dunn v. Reginam (5), and contended that considerations which might apply to the appointment of civil servants or military officers cannot apply to a judge. In my opinion, once a doctrine has become a rule of law, as I think this has, the court is bound to apply it without inquiring into its origin. It was by inquiring into the origin of the rule of law that consideration is necessary to support a simple contract that LORD MANSFIELD fell into error when he held, doubtless to the astonishment of the profession, in Pillans v. Van Mierop (8), that an agreement evidenced by a document under hand only, but without consideration, could be supported. As Sir William Holdsworth and Sir Frederick Pollock have shown, historically LORD MANSFIELD'S opinion was correct, but it was too late in 1765 to question what had become a rule of law and so the House of Lords held, thirteen years later, in Rann v. Hughes (9). Moreover, I can see no good reason why a judge appointed during pleasure should be in any different position from this point of view from any other person in the service of the Crown. KAY, L.J., in Dunn v. Reginam (5), said ([1896] 1 Q.B. 120):

"It seems to me that the continued employment of a civil servant might in many cases be as detrimental to the interests of the State as the continued employment of a military officer. It is impossible not to see that in remote places on the frontiers of our territory the question of peace or war might depend on the action of a civil servant on the spot; and it seems to me that there is as much ground for the possession by the Crown of an unrestricted right of dismissal in the case of civil service as there is in the case of military service."

That he uses the illustration of "the question of peace or war" does not rule out other considerations, and were a colonial judge to exercise his office in a brutal, tyrannical or incompetent manner the consequences might be quite as, if not more, detrimental to the peace and good order of a colony as the action of a civil servant or military officer. I cannot find that this doctrine has been laid down in such terms as would exclude a judge, and, indeed, Willis v. Gipps (10) seems directly to apply it to judges. But, as I have said, even if the Secretary of State purported to contract with the claimant he could not, in my opinion, limit the power of the Crown to dismiss at pleasure. He might have advised the withdrawal of the letters patent of February, 1911, and the issue of others giving the governor directions to appoint judges during good behaviour, or he might have advised a royal warrant to be issued under s. 4 (1) of the Courts Ordinance, 1926 (Revised Laws, 1926 (No. 101)), authorising the governor in a particular case to appoint, not at pleasure, but during good behaviour, and then the appointment would be by the Crown, and I have no doubt that if His late Majesty had chosen to appoint a judge on those terms the appointment would have been perfectly valid. But, the claimant having been appointed to hold office during pleasure, in my opinion, no correspondence which took place before or after the appointment can affect the terms of appointment.

A Apart from this, however, I agree with the learned arbitrator that a judge holds office by royal appointment, and not by contract. I think that the correspondence referred to does no more than inform the claimant of the general conditions applicable to the office. It tells him that at the age of sixty-two he will have to retire and may expect to receive a pension; it does not amount to an agreement that he is to be appointed for a definite period, and not at the pleasure of the Crown. Counsel for the claimant placed great reliance on Reilly v. Regem (11), but I do not read that case as going anything like the length for which he contends. The actual point material to this case which the Judicial Committee decided was that, if the terms of an appointment definitely prescribe a term and expressly provide for a power to determine "for cause", that excludes an implication that the appointment is at pleasure.

B The case also shows that there may be contractual rights existing before determination of a contract at will which are not inconsistent with a power to determine. Thus, if a servant is engaged, whether by the Crown or an individual, at a salary, but on the terms that he may be dismissed at will, if he is dismissed he may recover his salary for the time that he has served. Since that case

C I think it may very well be that, if the Crown appoints to an office on the terms that it is to be held during good behaviour or that the holder is only to be removed "for cause"—which is really the same thing—he would be entitled formerly to present a petition of right and now to bring an action if he were removed without cause. The claimant admitted in his reply that he was appointed under art. 14 of the letters patent of 1911 to the governor and sought to rely on that article. Counsel for the claimant argued that that admission was made per incuriam, but, even if it was, it does not, in my opinion, alter the position. In strictness the claimant was appointed by letters patent issued pursuant to the royal warrant which follows the terms of art. 14, and, as I have already said, I regard the correspondence merely as telling him of the age of compulsory retirement and of the pension at whatever age he retired that he might expect. I say "expect", because under the ordinance there

E is no absolute right to a pension. Were I to accede to the argument that these letters amount to a contract, I should be holding, in effect, that every person entering the service of the Crown who is told before he enters that his retiring age will be so and so could say that he has a contractual right to remain in the service till that age, and this would, in effect, override all the cases which

F have decided that a servant of the Crown holds office at pleasure, at least unless his appointment definitely prescribes a term or expressly provides for a power to determine only "for cause". That seems to have been exactly the argument put forward in Shenton v. Smith (6), and rejected by the Judicial Committee.

G As I have already held that the claimant's appointment was at pleasure and that there was no contract by the Crown, I do not find it necessary to deal with the questions of estoppel which were argued before me, except to say that, in my opinion, no estoppel here arises, and, in any case, the claimant cannot use an estoppel, even if it did arise, as giving him a cause of action, for, in effect, he is plaintiff, and, though the matter is an arbitration, he is really claiming a declaration that he was wrongly removed and has certain additional pension claims in consequence.

H I ought, however, before parting with the case to say a word with regard to a decision of the lord ordinary (LORD ROBERTSON) in Mackay v. Lord Advocate (12). In that case, by virtue of s. 3 (4) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, members of the Scottish Land Court held their appointments for life or until removed from office for inability or misbehaviour, and, accordingly, it was held that a clause in their appointments imposing the condition that they should vacate office at a particular age was ultra vires. That is a decision on the terms of a particular statute, though the learned lord ordinary did express views with regard to the general nature of a judge's office and may have thought that provisions of the Declaration of the Convention Parliament of 1689, ch. 13—a Scottish statute only—which altered the tenure of judges and made their offices tenable during good behaviour, applied generally to persons holding a judicial appointment. If he meant to go as far as this, I would respectfully say that, in my opinion, his conclusion was too wide, but, in any case, that decision is not binding on me, and, as I have said, turns really on the construction of the particular Act by which the pursuers were appointed. I, therefore, uphold the award.

Award affirmed.

DISTRICT BANK, LTD. v. ADELPHI HOTEL (BRIGHTON), LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 8, 17, 1953.]

Mortgage—Costs—Mortgagee's costs—Scale—Enforcement of security—Mortgagee's costs, charges and expenses properly incurred.

By a mortgage and debenture dated Mar. 6, 1947, a company charged by way of legal mortgage certain of its properties and premises with the payment to a bank of moneys therein covenanted to be paid. The deed provided, inter alia, that there was also thereby secured to the bank "all costs, charges and expenses incurred or paid by the bank in relation to the negotiation for and preparation, completion, realisation, and enforcement of this security". On Sept. 8, 1950, the bank issued a writ against the company to enforce its security, and judgment was by consent given on the same day, the usual accounts and inquiries being directed, and further consideration was adjourned. On Apr. 23, 1953, an order was made on further consideration directing (inter alia) that the costs of the bank of the action including in such costs any costs, charges and expenses of the bank as mortgagee properly incurred be taxed. The bank moved the court for an order that its costs of and in connection with the action (including any costs, charges and expenses of the bank as mortgagee properly incurred by it) should be taxed as between solicitor and own client.

HELD: the bank's costs of the action should be taxed as between party and party, and its costs, charges and expenses as mortgagee should be taxed on the same basis, the rights of the bank in this regard not being enlarged by the terms of the deed of 1947.

MOTION.

- In an action by the District Bank, Ltd., to enforce its security as mortgagee of leasehold premises and pure personal property of Adelphi Hotel (Brighton), Ltd., it was ordered, inter alia, "that the costs of the plaintiff of this action (including such costs, charges and expenses of the plaintiff as mortgagee properly incurred by it) be taxed". The bank now asked that that order be varied by substituting the following order: "Order that the costs of the plaintiff of and in connection with this action (including in such costs any costs, charges and expenses of the plaintiff as mortgagee properly incurred by it) be taxed as between solicitor and own client".

Cur. adv. vult.

- E June 17. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. In The Kestrel (1), to which I shall be referring presently, the judge, DR. LUSHINGTON, in a reserved judgment, used these words (L.R. 1 A. & E. 79):

- "There is no question that can come before the court which is so disagreeable as that of reviewing the taxation of costs, because it is manifestly clear that, for the greater part, it is impossible to find a clear principle whereon to proceed, and whether the charge be right or wrong depends upon a practice, and upon a practice with which the court cannot be familiar . . ."
- F

- I would apply those observations to the present case, which appears to involve the very important question as to what are the precise rights of a mortgagee in respect of the costs, charges and expenses incurred by him in his dealings with the mortgaged property and the recovery of his money.
- G

- This is a motion on the part of the plaintiffs in the action, the District Bank, Ltd., seeking a variation in that part of an order made on the further consideration of the action on Apr. 23, 1953, which relates to the plaintiffs' costs, charges and expenses. The action was brought by the plaintiff bank against the defendant company, Adelphi Hotel (Brighton), Ltd., to enforce the plaintiff bank's security constituted by a mortgage and debenture created and issued by the defendant company on Mar. 6, 1947. The writ was issued on Sept. 8, 1950, and the judgment in the action was pronounced by consent on the same day, the usual accounts and inquiries being directed, and the further consideration of the action adjourned. By the certificate filed on Dec. 22, 1951, it appeared that an aggregate sum of £13,475 15s. 7d. was due and owing to the bank under its security together with a sum (stated to be not then ascertained) for its charges and expenses as mortgagee. The relevant part of the before-mentioned order on further consideration directed that the costs of the bank of the action including in such costs any costs, charges and expenses of the bank as mortgagee properly incurred be taxed, and provision was made for the payment of such costs out of a fund now in court and to the credit of the action which was and is sufficient not only to meet such costs, charges and expenses, but also to leave a surplus for the company (which is now in liquidation) or its creditors. The direction in that form giving the bank only its ordinary so-called party and party costs, it is now asking that in lieu of such direction the order should provide that the costs of the bank of and in connection with the action (including in such costs any costs, charges and expenses of the bank as mortgagee properly incurred by it) should be taxed as between solicitor and own client. A

At the hearing of the motion the bank claimed to be indemnified in respect of the whole of its costs, charges and expenses as mortgagee, and argued that some, at least, of the items should be taxed either on an indemnity basis or (which comes to much the same thing) as between solicitor and own client, or, at any rate, as between solicitor and client. There are some words in the bank's security with which I shall deal later, but I propose first to inquire what the law applicable to this matter is, apart from any special provision in the security itself. B

Up to a point, the position seems to me to be entirely free from doubt. In The Kestrel (1) it was laid down in clear terms that mortgagees' costs in a mortgage suit would be taxed as between party and party and not as between solicitor and client, that being said in that case to accord with the established practice of the Court of Chancery. There had been a decree that the plaintiffs should receive their costs, charges and expenses properly incurred, and it was argued unsuccessfully that those words meant that their costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client. There is also the clear later authority of Re Queen's Hotel Co., Cardiff, Ltd. Re Vernon Tin Plate Co., Ltd. (2), in which it was held that the plaintiff in a debenture holders' action is allowed party and party costs only, COZENS-HARDY, J., in his judgment observing ([1900] 1 Ch. 793) that there was no vestige of authority to the contrary. D E

It cannot, therefore, in my opinion, be doubted that, so far as regards the costs of the present action, they are party and party costs and not costs as between solicitor and client. But what about the other costs, charges and expenses? It would certainly be very strange if they were taxable on any different basis, and I pause here to inquire what is meant by party and party costs. The expression is not, perhaps, a very happy one for, in my judgment, the words do not necessarily imply the existence of a suit or other litigation, and I think that they mean when analysed that the computation has to be made as in a case in which there are two or more parties between or among whom the expenditure has to be apportioned. A definition of the expression is hard to find, but there is a relevant statement by SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., in Smith v. Buller (3) (L.R. 19 Eq. 475): F G

" . . . the costs chargeable under a taxation as between party and party are all that are necessary to enable the adverse party to conduct the litigation, and no more. Any charges merely for conducting litigation more conveniently may be called luxuries, and must be paid by the party incurring them." H

And I think that where there is no actual litigation, the definition applies as though it referred to transacting business as well as to conducting litigation.

It must always be remembered that when costs are referred to they are understood to be party and party costs, and not solicitor and client costs, and it is difficult to see in principle why a mortgagor should be called on to reimburse a mortgagee for anything beyond his necessary expenditure. I think that a mortgagee is entitled, as against a mortgagor and against the mortgaged property, to his "full costs", but that expression means ordinary party and party costs, and not costs as between solicitor and client: see Avery v. Wood (4), following Irvine v. Reddish (5), apart, of course, from some special bargain.

A In HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (2nd ed., vol. 23, p. 404) it is said that a mortgagee is entitled to be indemnified against all expenses, citing Detillin v. Gale (6) and other authorities, but if this means that he is entitled to costs on an indemnity basis, I think that it is wholly unsupported by authority, nor is National Provincial Bank of England v. Games (7), in my judgment, any authority for a taxation on the higher scale.

Unfortunately in a useful recent publication (BUTTERWORTH'S COSTS, 1951, p. 70) there is a statement that a mortgagee under the terms of his security is usually entitled to his charges and expenses as between solicitor and own client. I do not understand what "under the terms of his security" means, but if it means that mortgage deeds and other instruments of security usually provide for indemnity costs, I can only say that I find no support for that either from any text-book or from any book of precedents or in my own experience. Normally such deeds and instruments are silent on the matter of costs and provide for redemption on payment of principal and interest only, leaving the costs to be dealt with by analogy, or according to what DR. LUSHINGTON called the established practice of the Court of Chancery. I am told that the editors of that work do not now adhere to that statement as having any general application. In my judgment, it is not an accurate statement. My view is that the bank in this case is entitled to its costs as between party and party only and not as between solicitor and client, still less as between solicitor and own client, and I so hold.

I should like to add that these various bases of taxation, though conveniently labelled, are difficult to formulate, nor is it easy to discover exactly how they work out in practice. In Giles v. Randall (8) BUCKLEY, L.J., said ([1915] 1 K.B. 295):

E "A practice has grown up, which I must say I regret, of differentiating between taxation of costs as between solicitor and client and as between solicitor and own client. In the former case the taxation is substantially a party and party taxation on a more generous scale. In the latter case there is an ascertainment and allowance of the charges properly payable by the client to his solicitor . . . I have no doubt that litigants who stipulate for and by agreement are to receive costs as between solicitor and client often intend to get an indemnity in respect of costs."

F So, too, in my judgment, when a mortgagee learns that he is entitled, as he is, to his "full costs", he may be surprised to know that this does not involve the discharge of every item in his solicitor's bill.

G I do not doubt that taxing masters exercise their discretionary powers with a due regard to the circumstances of each case with which they are dealing, and it may well be that the taxation of a mortgagee's costs would not usually be on a niggardly or markedly ungenerous scale. I do not know. But what a mortgagee is entitled to is that which is covered by the words "costs, charges and expenses properly incurred", and it is for the taxing masters to say what these are, conformably with the principles to which I have endeavoured to give expression. I may here refer to a recent case, Reed v. Gray (9).

H There seems to me to be no relevance to the present case in the principle that in a debenture holder's action, where the company's assets are insufficient for the payment of the debentures in full, the plaintiff is entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client and not as between party and party only as laid down and explained in Re New Zealand Midland Ry. Co. (10). Nor do I get any assistance from Cotterell v. Stratton (11).

Such, in my view, are the general principles which regulate the rights of the mortgagee against the mortgaged property, or the mortgagor personally, in respect of his costs, charges and expenses. There is here, however, a further point to be considered—whether as between the parties in this case those rights are enlarged by certain words contained in the mortgage and debenture entitling the bank to

“all costs, charges and expenses incurred or paid by [it] in relation to the negotiation for and preparation, completion, realisation, and enforcement of [the] security.”

These are certainly wide and comprehensive words, and it is argued with some force that they cover more than the “full costs” (the meaning of which I have already explained) and amount either to a complete unlimited and unqualified indemnity, or at any rate to such a measure of indemnity as would be ascertained on a taxation as between solicitor and client. I cannot so construe the words.

I thought at one time that Malvern Urban District Council v. Malvern Link Gas Co. (12) gave support to the claim of the bank, and certainly the words which were under consideration in that case are very similar indeed to those which I am considering in the present case, but the document in which they appear is of a very different character, viz., a contract of sale and purchase, and not one, like the present, to which a well-established rule normally applies, and it seems to me that, if parties desire to depart from such a rule, they must express themselves in plain and unequivocal language. I read the words as indicative of nothing more than an assertion or reminder of the bank's ordinary right, on realising or enforcing its security, to recover its costs, charges and expenses as well as the principal money and interest. Of course the words do confer additional rights in regard to the costs of negotiating, preparing and completing the security, which are matters occurring before the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee arose. I need not express any definite view as to how the amount of those particular costs ought to have been ascertained.

It suffices for me to say that I put my judgment on this part of the case, involving as it does a point of construction, on the ground that, as every taxation in which more than one party (in addition to the solicitor) is interested is prima facie a taxation as between party and party, any other basis of taxation is only justified when the party asking for it can show that he is entitled to it, either on some well-recognised principle, or under some contract plainly and unambiguously expressed. I can find no such principle nor any such contract here. The relevant part of the order of Apr. 23, 1953, is framed with sufficient aptness. There is no need to use the words “as between party and party” or any other words to express what is, in my judgment, implied. I should myself have put the direction slightly differently, thus: Let the costs of the plaintiff of this action together with any other costs, charges and expenses properly incurred by it as mortgagee be taxed. But the variation is not of substance; it is merely of form, and the order may properly stand as it is without variation. The motion must be dismissed with costs.

Motion dismissed.

Re ENGALL'S AGREEMENT.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 19, 1953.]

Land Charge—Vacation of entry in register—Contract for sale registered as estate contract—Failure by purchaser to complete—Summons to vacate entry—Competency.

A By a contract in writing incorporating, with some exceptions, the Law Society's Conditions of Sale, 1934 ed. (1949 revision), the vendors agreed to sell land to the purchaser. The contract provided that completion should take place on Sept. 30, 1952, and that the purchaser should submit the draft conveyance ten days before completion. The draft conveyance was not submitted in due time, and on Oct. 21, 1952, the vendors gave the purchaser notice to complete on or before Nov. 5, 1952. On Oct. 29, B 1952, the purchaser submitted the draft. On Nov. 4, 1952, the purchaser registered a land charge class C (iv) in respect of the land. Completion did not take place on Nov. 5, 1952, and the vendors purported to forfeit the deposit under condition 32 (2) of the Law Society's conditions. On Feb. 25, C 1953, the vendors requested the purchaser to withdraw the registration of the land charge, but the purchaser refused. The vendors now applied under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 10 (8), for the removal of the registration.

HELD: the application was misconceived because the question whether or not the entry on the register ought to be vacated depended on whether or not the contract subsisted, and procedure under s. 10 (8) was inappropriate for the determination of the latter question.

D AS TO VACATION OF REGISTER, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 19, p. 360, para. 758.

E ADJOURNED SUMMONS under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 10 (8), issued on the application of Barnabas Cecil Engall and Enid Beatrice Engall, his wife, for the following relief: (i) an order that the registration of the land charge C (iv) registered on Nov. 4, 1952, by London United Properties, Ltd., in the name of the said Barnabas Cecil Engall in respect of certain freehold properties be vacated; and (ii) a similar order in respect of an identical entry on the register of land charges in the name of the said Enid Beatrice Engall.

F Raffety for the applicants, the vendors.

Stamler for the respondent, the purchaser.

G VAISEY, J.: This is a summons issued under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 10 (8), asking for an order that two registered land charges be removed from the register. The applicants are the owners of certain freehold houses at Woking and, by a contract dated July 31, 1952, they agreed to sell those properties to the respondent for £5,875. The contract was in writing and the property was sold subject to the Law Society's Conditions of Sale, 1934 ed. (1949 revision) with certain exceptions so far as the same were applicable to a sale by private treaty and were not inconsistent with or varied by the remaining conditions in the contract. There was a condition as to title and the property H was sold subject to the covenants and conditions contained in the respective conveyances forming the respective roots of title, to any local land charges registered or required to be registered before the date of the contract, to any requirement of any local council or any county council whether registered, registrable, or otherwise, and to the respective tenancies of the properties. A deposit of £587 10s. was payable by the purchaser to the vendors' agent and completion was to take place on Sept. 30, 1952. Condition 24 (1) of the Law Society's Conditions of Sale provided that the conveyance to a purchaser should be prepared by him at his own expense, and that the draft thereof should be delivered at the office of the solicitors of the vendor at least ten days before the date fixed for completion for perusal and approval on behalf of the vendor and other necessary parties (if any). Condition 32 provides:

"(1) If a purchaser shall fail to perform his part of the contract, the vendor may give to the purchaser or his solicitor at least fourteen days' notice in writing specifying the default and requiring the purchaser to make good the same before the expiration of the notice. (2) If the purchaser does not comply with the terms of the said notice—(a) the deposit money, if any, shall be forfeited to the vendor . . . (b) the vendor may re-sell the property without previously tendering a conveyance to the purchaser; (c) the contract shall, without prejudice to the vendor's right to resume possession (if given up) and recover documents belonging to him, become void, save and except that the following provisions shall apply . . ."

The abstract of title was delivered, the deposit of £587 10s. was paid, and requisitions on title were made and replied to. The purchaser did not submit any draft conveyance ten days before the date fixed for completion, and on Oct. 8, 1952, the vendors' solicitors wrote to the purchaser's solicitors:

"We write to point out that although completion of this matter was fixed for the 30th ultimo you have not yet submitted a draft conveyance and we should be obliged if you would do so without any further delay. In anticipation of completion on Sept. 30, the vendors have given notice of their intention to discharge the mortgage on that day which was accepted and now that time has passed a fresh six months' notice will have to be given and the vendors will have to hold the purchaser responsible for any future interest which is payable as a result thereof."

On Oct. 20 they wrote:

"We cannot understand why you do not submit the draft conveyance to us herein. Completion is now three weeks' overdue and we have today had to take our client's instructions as to whether he wishes us to institute proceedings for specific performance or take the appropriate steps to lead to forfeiture of the deposit."

On the next day they sent a notice to complete, and, on Oct. 29 the purchaser's solicitors submitted a draft conveyance. The notice to complete required that completion should take place on or before Nov. 5, 1952. On Nov. 4 the purchaser caused to be registered against the name of each of the vendors a land charge of class C (iv) in respect of the properties. Completion did not take place on or before Nov. 5 and the vendors wish to sell the properties elsewhere. Accordingly, by letter dated Feb. 25, 1953, their solicitors requested the purchaser's solicitors to withdraw the registration of the land charges, but they did not do so, and by this summons the vendors ask for a separate order in respect of each charge that the registration of it should be vacated, and for an order that the costs and expenses of this application and of the vacation of the registrations be paid by the purchaser.

The notice to complete served by the vendors was to some extent complied with by the purchaser, because on Oct. 29 the purchaser submitted draft conveyances which the vendors' solicitors approved and returned. On Oct. 31 there was a dispute about amendments which had been made, but by Nov. 5 nothing further had happened and in due course the deposit was forfeited.

In the circumstances, it is open to some doubt whether the notice to complete was long enough. It might have been long enough had it been a twenty-one days' notice to pay the purchase money, served after the conveyance had been agreed. When it was served, however, the draft conveyances had not been submitted and the notice required that all this should be done, and the purchase money paid, within fifteen or sixteen days after service of the notice. It may well be that the notice was too short. There is a good deal to be said for the suggestion that the purchaser has behaved unsatisfactorily in preventing the vendors from re-selling and in attempting to use, possibly wrongly, the procedure under the Land Charges Act, 1925, for the purpose of putting pressure on them. It may well be open to comment that the purchaser never expected to be able to complete. The difficulty that I feel, however, is that an application under

- A s. 10 (8) of the Act of 1925 is not the appropriate method of approaching the matter. When the agreement of July 31 was signed, that, in equity, made the purchaser the owner of the property subject only to the payment of the purchase money. The existence or non-existence of a contract at any relevant time is of the utmost importance, and is a matter which ought to be considered carefully and in an appropriate manner. This summons is an attempt to use
- B the machinery of the Land Charges Act, 1925, to obtain adjudication on the existence or non-existence of the contract at the time when the notice was served, or when it expired, or at the present time. In my judgment, it is not an appropriate way in which to approach the solution of what, in my view, is a somewhat difficult question. Under the contract for sale either party could bring an action for specific performance or for rescission. The existence of
- C the charges is the shadow of the matter, not the substance of it—which is the existence of the contract—and I am being asked to deal with the shadow, not with the substance. That is not the proper procedure to ascertain the existence or non-existence of the contract. To ask that the charges be removed from the register before the point has been decided by an action is wrong. The charges register is only a record. Before the notice to complete was served,
- D the vendors' solicitors stated, accurately, that an action for specific performance was the appropriate remedy. It does not follow that because the deposit has been forfeited the entry on the register ought to be vacated. I am not going to decide the question one way or the other. There is a good deal to be said for the view that the notice to complete is deficient in point of time, but the purchaser might receive little sympathy in an action for specific
- E performance.

The only case which is of any assistance is Pedigree Stock Farm Developments, Ltd. v. R. Wheeler & Co. (1). In that case, I called attention to the important point that the procedure which is before me in the present case is not the proper procedure to ascertain the existence or non-existence of a contract. To ask that a charge be removed from the register before the substantive

F point has been decided by the appropriate means of an action seems to me to be putting the cart before the horse. The charges register, in my view, is merely a record, and whether that record of an alleged contract should remain or not depends on the question whether the contract purported to be recorded exists or does not exist. To obtain an order removing a charge from the register is merely the consequence of deciding that there is no contract. If there is

G a contract, the entry in the register will be allowed to remain.

Summons dismissed.

NOTE.Re HOLBERTON'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. THORBURN v.
HART AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), June 11, 1953.]

Costs—Taxation—Counsel's fees—Settlement negotiated and agreed.

SUMMONS by the plaintiff to review an order of the taxing master disallowing on the taxation of a bill of costs the costs and disbursements relating to the delivery of a brief to leading counsel and the greater part of junior counsel's fees on a summons, issued on July 4, 1950, in the matter of the trusts of a post-nuptial settlement, dated May 26, 1930.

By the trusts of the settlement the income of the trust fund was to be held during the life of the settlor on trust for the benefit of the settlor and his wife and the children of the marriage. After the death of the settlor there were certain trusts for the benefit of the wife if she should survive him, and after the death of the survivor of the settlor and his wife the capital of the fund was to be held on trust for the children and remoter issue of the marriage, and, if there should be no issue who attained a vested interest, on trust for such persons (other than persons related to the settlor on the father's side only), as would have become entitled under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, if the settlor had died intestate and a bachelor. There were no children of the marriage. The settlor had one sister, Miss Mary Campbell Holberton.

The plaintiff was one of the trustees of the settlement. While he was away on service in His Majesty's forces, the other trustee, Mr. Hart, a solicitor, carried out various transactions which, apparently, amounted to breaches of trust in that they were not performed strictly in accordance with the terms of the settlement. This was a serious matter for the plaintiff as the trust funds were of considerable value, and on Jan. 22, 1948, he took out an originating summons asking for the execution of the trusts of the settlement by the court, and, alternatively, for directions. The defendants were Hart, the settlor, and the settlor's wife. On Mar. 19, 1948, on a motion by the plaintiff, a receiver of the property subject to the trusts was appointed, and on Oct. 20, 1948, an order was made on the summons for the execution of the trusts, for an account to be taken and for certain inquiries to be made. On Dec. 24, 1949, the defendant, Hart, died, and on Mar. 1, 1950, an order was made for the action to proceed. On May 23, 1950, the master's certificate was issued in respect of the accounts and inquiries and it disclosed possible breaches of trust involving between £6,000 and £7,000, a great part of which had been paid to or on behalf of the settlor. On July 4, 1950, the plaintiff issued a summons for the determination of certain questions in regard to the accounts and asking, inter alia, whether to institute proceedings against the settlor. On Nov. 15, 1950, an order was made adding the personal representatives of Hart as defendants and the summons was adjourned into court.

In the meantime negotiations were proceeding for a settlement by way of a compromise between the parties. By Dec. 4, 1950, the main terms had been more or less settled, viz., that the settlor's sister would waive any claim in respect of breaches of trust and that an insurance policy should be effected to safeguard the rights of the remaindermen in the event of the sister pre-deceasing the settlor, as the settlor was unable to state who would be the next of kin entitled to the trust fund in such an event. The plaintiff was advised that he could not agree to such a compromise without the approval of the court, and that a scheme could not be formulated until the court had ascertained to what extent the trust fund was deficient. On Dec. 5, 1950, an attempt was made to set down the summons of July 4, but this could not be done as Hart's personal representatives had not entered an appearance. On Dec. 6 the plaintiff's solicitors delivered briefs to leading and junior counsel. Hart's personal representatives having entered an appearance, the summons was set down on Jan. 24, 1951. By an order, dated Feb. 6, 1951, the settlor's sister was added as a defendant.

On Feb. 26, 1951, the plaintiff learnt from the settlor's solicitors that the settlor had no next of kin on his mother's side other than his sister, so that in the event of her pre-deceasing the settlor the property would devolve on the Crown. It was, therefore, possible for all parties to be brought before the court, thus avoiding the necessity for any insurance policy and making a simplified form of settlement possible. On Feb. 5, 1952, the settlor took out a summons for an order disposing of the action on agreed terms, and on Apr. 28, 1952, the judge in chambers made an order by consent on both summonses, the matter being finally disposed of. By the order the costs of all parties were to be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the capital of the trust fund.

On taxation the taxing master allowed £1,500 costs, but disallowed briefs and brief fees to leading and junior counsel on the grounds, inter alia, (i) that the briefs were prematurely delivered, and (ii) that negotiations for a compromise were in progress before they were delivered and terms of settlement were agreed shortly afterwards. On objections being lodged, he allowed a small fee to junior counsel, but dismissed the objections in regard to leading counsel's fees and the greater part of junior counsel's fees. In his answers to objections he referred to the terms of compromise as having been approved by the court on "Apr. 28, 1951," while they were, in fact, approved on Apr. 28, 1952.

Harold Christie, Q.C., and J. A. Brightman for the plaintiff.
Wigglesworth for the defendants.

DANCKWERTS, J., stated the facts, and said: The summons in this matter was a serious matter for the plaintiff as he might have become liable for a very considerable sum of money. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the taxing master had made a number of errors of fact and had misdirected himself as to the facts. I think that this contention is well founded and that there are a number of mistakes of fact in his answers. He was in error where he said that the summons for approval of the compromise was heard on Apr. 28, 1951. He made a slip of a year, as it should have been 1952, and the several references which he made to Apr. 28, 1951, should be to Apr. 28, 1952. There are also other matters. The terms of compromise which were provisionally agreed in the first place could not be adopted by the parties until they had been approved by the court. It is by no means certain that the compromise would have been approved, and, therefore, it was not unreasonable to have delivered briefs shortly after agreement of terms. The taxing master, moreover, took no account of the fact that the terms ultimately agreed on were wholly different from the first terms. The negotiations between December, 1950, and April, 1952, were conducted by leading counsel. In the early stages, when it was not ascertainable who were the remaindermen under the settlement, a scheme had to be prepared to safeguard, by a policy of insurance, the interests of all who might be entitled. The cost of this policy proved to be extremely high, about 33½ per cent., which rendered the old terms impracticable. Even if the cost had not been so high, it was not clear that the terms would be approved, and the assistance of leading counsel might well have been necessary. Later, when information was received from the settlor's solicitors that the settlor had no next of kin other than his sister, it became plain that the remainderman under the settlement was the Crown. Then, on the Attorney-General being joined, all the parties could be brought before the court, thus avoiding the necessity for any insurance, a simplified form of settlement could be put forward, and, all parties being fully agreed, it was possible to obtain an order by consent. No account was taken of the fact that the negotiations after December, 1950, and the final settlement were conducted on behalf of the plaintiff by leading counsel without other remuneration than that on the brief originally delivered. The matter is one for the exercise of my discretion and I allow the fees of leading counsel and junior counsel. Accordingly, I allow the objections to the taxing master's certificate and it will be referred back with a direction to allow. Costs of this application as between solicitor and client are to come out of the trust fund.

Order accordingly.

Building—Demolition—Need and practicability of safety precautions—Collapse of wall killing workmen—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 79 (7), reg. 94 (2).

By the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 94 (2): "Where any work is carried on which is likely to reduce so as to endanger any person employed the security or stability of any part of an existing building or of a building in course of construction all practicable precautions shall be taken . . . to prevent danger to any person employed from the collapse of the building or the fall of any part thereof." By reg. 79 (1): "This regulation shall apply to the demolition of any building or substantial part of a building", and by reg. 79 (7): "Before demolition is commenced and also during the progress of the work precautions shall, where necessary, be taken by adequate shoring or otherwise to prevent, as far as practicable, the accidental collapse of any part of the building or of any adjoining building the collapse of which may endanger any person employed."

Two workmen, who were engaged in demolishing disused gas retort blocks in a retort house, were killed while working under a wall of a brick arch which collapsed on them. The wall was not shored in any way.

HELD: (i) having regard to the object of the regulations, the retort blocks were buildings within the meaning of the regulations even though they could also be described as part of the plant and, therefore, the regulations applied to them.

(ii) regulation 94 applied to the condition of new constructional work before completion, and not to demolition.

(iii) the words "where necessary" in reg. 79 (7) covered cases where, if the dangers of demolition had been appreciated, any reasonable person would have said that precautions were necessary, and "practicable" meant "possible to be accomplished with known means or resources"; the defendants should have appreciated the danger of sending workmen to work under the wall and it would have been practicable, in the sense of the word stated, for them to have taken precautions for the men's safety by way of shoring or otherwise; and, therefore, they were guilty of a breach of the statutory duty imposed on them by reg. 79 (7).

ACTIONS for damages for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty.

In March, 1951, the defendants, the Demolition & Construction Co., Ltd., began to demolish three blocks of disused gas retorts in a retort house at 709, Old Kent Road, London, belonging to the South-Eastern Gas Board, the object of the demolition being to obtain rubble. The blocks of retorts were enclosed in brick arches, and the method of demolition used was by cable and winch. From time to time, as the brickwork was demolished, workmen were sent in to clear away the debris. On Apr. 4, 1951, demolition work was being carried out on the second block under the supervision of a foreman, and had been completed except for the last two arches. These arches did not contain retorts, the end one being used as a passage and the one next to it having a small transverse wall in it. The outer wall of the last arch but one was pulled down and workmen went in to clear the debris and to demolish the transverse wall. When nearly all the debris had been removed and three men were working on the job, the adjoining wall of the last arch collapsed, killing two of the workmen, George Francis Knight and Reginald John Ransom. Their widows, Jane Elizabeth Knight and Kitty Elizabeth Ransom, now sued the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

Benev, Q.C., and Jukes for the defendants.

PARKER, J., stated the facts, found that there had been a breach of duty at common law by the defendants, and continued: That being so, it is really unnecessary to consider the case of statutory duty raised under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, but, in case I am wrong, I think it is right to deal with that matter. The plaintiffs rely on reg. 79 and reg. 94 of those regulations. Regulation 79 provides:

"(1) This regulation shall apply to the demolition of any building or substantial part of a building. (2) The demolition and operations incidental thereto shall be specifically placed under the supervision of a competent person experienced in demolition operations and appointed for the purpose whose name shall be posted up in a prominent position on the site of the operations . . ."

As regards that provision, I am satisfied that the work was under the supervision of one Ransom [the foreman] and that he was a competent person experienced in demolition. It is true that his name was not posted up in a prominent place; it was, in fact, put on the inside of a little office which he had on the site, but that can have no causative effect whatsoever in regard to this accident. By reg. 79 (5) it is provided:

"The following operations shall be carried out only (i) under the immediate supervision of a competent foreman or charge-hand with adequate experience of the particular kind of work, or (ii) by workmen experienced in the kind of work . . . (b) the actual demolition of any part of a building where there is a special risk of a collapse, whether of that or of any other part of a building, in the course or as a result of the said demolition, so as to endanger any person employed."

Again, I am satisfied that these were competent workmen and that they were working under the immediate supervision of a competent foreman. By reg. 79 (7):

“Before demolition is commenced and also during the progress of the work precautions shall, where necessary, be taken by adequate shoring or otherwise to prevent, as far as practicable, the accidental collapse of any part of the building or of any adjoining building the collapse of which may endanger any person employed.”

That paragraph contains matter for argument, and I will return to it in a moment. Finally, the plaintiffs rely on reg. 94, which, in para. (2), provides:

“Where any work is carried on which is likely to reduce so as to endanger any person employed the security or stability of any part of an existing building or of a building in course of construction all practicable precautions shall be taken by shoring or otherwise to prevent danger to any person employed from the collapse of the building or the fall of any part thereof.”

It is clear, therefore, that that provision prima facie applies to the facts of this case if it is applicable to demolition work.

In my view, however, reg. 94 does not apply to the work of demolition. Demolition is dealt with in an earlier part of the regulations, Part V, which deals specifically with demolition, whereas reg. 94 appears in Part VII, under the heading “Miscellaneous”. That, of course, is by no means conclusive, since it might be plain that reg. 94 was intended to apply to demolition work. If, however, one looks at the regulation as a whole, it is clear that the first paragraph has nothing to do with demolition at all. It deals with new constructional work and the condition of the work before the structure is completed. Paragraph (2) applies, not only to a building in course of construction, but also to any part of an existing building. It seems to me, however, that, reading that regulation as a whole, the reference to “any part of an existing building” is really a reference to an alteration in an existing building as opposed to the demolition of it. In other words, but for that provision, if instability were produced in a building which was not going to be pulled down, employers might be free from any such duty as is imposed by reg. 79 in the case of demolition. In my view, reg. 94 does not apply, so that, so far as statutory duty is concerned, the plaintiffs’ case must be based on reg. 79 (7).

The defendants’ first answer to that is that none of the building regulations applies in this case, because what was being demolished was not a building. By reg. 2 the regulations are to apply to certain operations, one of which is the demolition of a building, and reg. 79 (1) provides:

It is urged on behalf of the defendants that these regulations do not apply to plant, and they say that these brick arches were merely part of the plant. As counsel for the defendants put it, they were really a heat-resisting screen, and they might just as well have been made of iron or asbestos as of brick. Reference was made in that connection to Hutchison v. Cocksedge & Co., Ltd. (1), where it was held that a steel platform, some sixteen or seventeen feet above the floor of the plant, was part of the plant and not a building. Reference was also made to Street v. British Electricity Authority (2), where SELLERS, J., held that there was no breach of statutory duty, in that what was there in question was not a building. On the other hand, the plaintiffs refer to Aylward v. Matthews (3), where, for the purposes of the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1897, a temporary wooden structure, which was going to be used to support a steam crane, was held to be a building within that Act. It was held that it was a question of fact whether a structure in any particular case was a building, and, in particular, in deciding whether a structure was or was not a building, it was only right and proper to take into consideration the Act in question. It was pointed out that the Workmen's Compensation Act appeared to contemplate the risks which would arise in the case of the erection or repair of buildings exceeding thirty feet in height and that those risks would be incidental to the erection by means of a scaffolding of a structure of the kind with which the court was then dealing.

A In my view, each case must depend on its own facts, bearing in mind the object of the Act. Here, it seems to me, one would, in ordinary language, describe these retort blocks as buildings. Bearing in mind the object of the Factories Act, 1937, and the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, it seems to me that a part of the plant may be a building, notwithstanding that it can also be described as plant. Moreover, it is to be observed that reg. 2 of these regulations mentions in the proviso a number of structures B which are not deemed to be buildings for the purposes of the regulation. It is clear, if one reads that proviso, that it was considered that, but for it, the regulations would apply to a great number of structures which might well be thought in ordinary language not to be buildings. For example, it was deemed necessary to exclude pole or lattice work structures designed solely for the support of machinery, plant, or electric light. Accordingly, I C hold that these retort houses were buildings and that reg. 79 (7) applies.

That paragraph contains two phrases of some difficulty, namely, "where necessary", and "as far as practicable". It is urged on behalf of the defendants that "where necessary" means only where found necessary by experience, as opposed to being found necessary, for example, in the light of after events as a result of some latent defect not reasonably anticipated. I do not think I D need go further than to hold that it must, at any rate, cover a case where, if the dangers had been appreciated, as I have held they should have been, any reasonable person would say that precautions were necessary. I am satisfied that, if men were to be sent to work under this wall, precautions to secure their safety were necessary. As regards the phrase "as far as practicable", this has been considered in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (4), E where LORD GODDARD ([1945] 1 All E.R. 389) adopted a definition in the OXFORD DICTIONARY of "Practicable": "capable of being carried out in action", and also in Adsett v. K. & L. Steelfounders & Engineers, Ltd. (5), where the Court of Appeal referred (ante, p. 321) with approval to the definition in WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY of "possible to be accomplished with known means or resources". In other words, the test here is not whether it is reasonably F practicable, but merely whether it is possible in that sense. I am satisfied that it was practicable to take some precautions by way of shoring or otherwise, if men's lives were to be put in danger. I am not altogether satisfied with the method proposed by Mr. Galbraith [a constructional engineer], but something, I am sure, could be done—possibly by a girder fastened to the buck stays, as, in fact, was done by the defendants as an experiment after G the accident when working at East Greenwich. The provision of a girder would, no doubt, not meet every case, but it is relevant to observe that its presence in this case would, it is agreed by all witnesses, have prevented the total collapse of this wall in one piece on these two men. Be that as it may, again it is to be observed that there was no necessity whatsoever to send men under this wall to remove debris. I, accordingly, hold that there is also a breach H of a duty imposed on the defendants under reg. 79 (7).

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), June 24, 1953.]

Contract—General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works—Contractor responsible for damage “from any cause whatsoever”—Construction of jetty—Damage by Admiralty vessel—General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works, condition 26 (2).

By condition 7 (2) of the General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works: “. . . If in compliance with any . . . of the superintending officer's instructions the contractor properly incurs any expense beyond that provided for in or reasonably contemplated by the contract . . . the contract sum shall be increased by the amount of any such expense . . .” By condition 26 (2): “. . . the works and all materials and things whatsoever including such as may have been provided by the authority on the site in connection with and for the purposes of the contract shall stand at the risk and be in the sole charge of the contractor, and the contractor shall be responsible for, and with all possible speed make good, any loss or damage thereto arising from any cause whatsoever other than the accepted risks . . .”

On May 17, 1950, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendants for the construction of a destroyer jetty at a naval base. The contract included the General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works. On Aug. 4, 1951, an Admiralty vessel collided with the jetty and damaged it. The defendants, through the superintending officer under the contract, instructed the plaintiffs to repair the damage. On a claim by the plaintiffs for the cost of doing so,

HELD: the words “any cause whatsoever” in condition 26 (2) must be given a wide meaning and included the negligent navigation of a ship belonging to the defendants, and, therefore, under that condition the plaintiffs were liable to make good the damage and could not recover from the defendants the cost of so doing as an “expense” under condition 7 (2).

ACTION for money due under a contract or damages for breach of contract.

On May 17, 1950, a contract was entered into by the defendants, the Admiralty, with the plaintiffs, A. E. Farr, Ltd., a firm of civil engineering contractors, for the construction of a destroyer jetty at H.M. Naval Base at Portland. The contract was constituted by an acceptance by letter by the civil engineer-in-chief, on behalf of the defendants, of a tender made by the plaintiffs on Feb. 9, 1950, whereby the plaintiffs offered to construct the works on terms and conditions contained in certain documents which included the General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works, known as Form CCC/Works/1, Edition 5. On Aug. 4, 1951, while the plaintiffs were constructing the jetty, an Admiralty vessel, M.F.V. 1006, using Portland harbour, collided with it, causing damage to certain of the concrete piles. In compliance with instructions given in a letter dated Aug. 14, 1951, by the superintending civil engineer, who was the superintending officer under the contract, the plaintiffs were required to repair the damage to the jetty, which they did at a cost of £2,038 12s. 5d. The plaintiffs now claimed that sum from the defendants under condition 7 (2) of the General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works, or, alternatively, as damages for breach of an implied condition in the contract that the defendants should not, by their servants or agents, interfere with, or obstruct, the execution of the works by the plaintiffs.

Eustace Roskill, Q.C., for the defendants.

A PARKER, J.: This is a claim by a firm of civil engineering contractors against the Admiralty for the sum of £2,038 12s. 5d., as money due under a contract, or, alternatively, as damages for breach of the contract. The facts are not in dispute at all, and the issue depends on the construction of the contract. From the very outset, as the correspondence shows, there was a dispute as to the meaning and effect of condition 26 (2).

B The contract took the form of an acceptance by a letter dated May 17, 1950, by the civil engineer-in-chief of a tender made by the plaintiffs on Feb. 9, 1950, and the contract was made on and included the General Conditions of Government Contracts for Building and Civil Engineering Works in a printed form known as CCC/Works/1, Edition 5. So far as it is material to this action, it is provided, by condition 3, that the works and all materials, plant, and buildings brought on the site shall immediately vest in the Admiralty. No
C doubt, that is to cover the Admiralty in respect of any progress payments they make. By condition 7 the superintending officer is given a number of powers to direct the contractors to suspend or execute the works, and to vary, add to, or omit from the works. It is provided by sub-cl. (2) of that condition that

D " . . . If in compliance with any other of the superintending officer's instructions the contractor properly incurs any expense beyond that provided for in or reasonably contemplated by the contract . . . the contract sum shall be increased by the amount of any such expense . . . ",

E and it is clear that "any other of the superintending officer's instructions" comprises instructions other than instructions given to alter, add to, or omit. It seems to me that the superintending officer's instructions to carry out these repairs were clearly classed as "any other of the superintending officer's instructions". By condition 26 (2), it is provided that "save as above"—and sub-cl. (1) has dealt with, broadly speaking, the plant and equipment—

F " . . . the works and all materials and things whatsoever including such as may have been provided by the authority on the site in connection with and for the purposes of the contract shall stand at the risk and be in the sole charge of the contractor, and the contractor shall be responsible for, and with all possible speed make good, any loss or damage thereto arising from any cause whatsoever other than the accepted risks and shall deliver up all the works to the superintending officer, in a clean state, complete in every particular . . . "

G The "accepted risks" are earlier defined in condition 1 as risks of fire, storm, tempest, flood and a number of others, and it is conceded that the risk here of the negligent navigation of this ship does not come within those accepted risks.

H However one approaches this matter, one always gets back to what is the true construction of condition 26 (2). It is argued forcibly by counsel for the plaintiffs that, if a party desires to be free of liability for negligence, he must say so in express words. That is, undoubtedly, true, and at first sight, when one looks at the facts of this case, it does seem as if very clear words were needed to make contractors liable for damage caused by the negligent navigation of an Admiralty ship which damages part of the works they have constructed, but it all comes back to the meaning of the words in that clause, and, in particular, to what is meant by "any cause whatsoever".

A number of cases have been cited to me. I do not propose to refer to any of them, because they all depend on their own particular wording, except

Joseph Travers & Sons, Ltd. v. Cooper (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal which has often been quoted and approved. All I need refer to is a passage from the judgment of PHILLIMORE, L.J. The clause there was a clause that a lighterman had inserted, seeking to protect himself from liability, and what he exempted himself from was liability "for any damage to goods however caused which can be covered by insurance". PHILLIMORE, L.J., said ([1915] 1 K.B. 101):

"This then is the distinction. It is a fine one, and I am sorry to think that it is so fine; but it seems to be this. If you say 'any loss' you are directing attention to the kinds of losses and not to their cause or origin, and you have not sufficiently made it plain that you mean 'any and every loss' irrespective of the cause, and therefore you have not brought home to the person who is entrusting the goods to you that you are not going to be responsible for your servants on your behalf exercising due care for them, or possibly even for your own personal want of care. But if you direct attention to the causes of any loss, if you say 'any loss', 'however caused' or 'under any circumstances', you give sufficient warning, and it is not necessary to say in express terms 'whether caused by my servants' negligence' . . ."

It seems to me that the words in the present case are about as wide as they can be and that I must read "any cause whatsoever" as if it included and expressly said "including damage caused by the negligent navigation by an Admiralty servant of a ship". If one reads the words in that way, there is no possibility of the plaintiffs recovering the sum expended under condition 7 (2) of the contract, because, by condition 26 (2), they are responsible for the damage and have to make it good, and, therefore, the expense which they have incurred in so doing is not an expense beyond that provided for in, or reasonably contemplated by, the contract.

It is, however, said that there is an implied term in the contract that the contractor should have uninterrupted and undisturbed possession of the site, and that the building owner must not come, either negligently or deliberately, and knock down the works, and, accordingly, "any cause whatsoever" must be read subject to that implied term. It seems to me that that is the wrong approach to the matter. Once one realises that condition 26 (2) must be given the wide construction which, I think, it must be given, there is no room for any implied term, however it is worded, which, in effect, destroys the construction ordinarily given to those words. It was faintly argued by counsel for the plaintiffs that, even if he was wrong, it might be a possible view that the provision under condition 26 (2) that the contractor was to make good was merely machinery, and that, having made good, it would be possible for him to obtain the sum that he has expended against the Admiralty for breach of contract or in negligence. It seems to me, however, that condition 26 (2) is plain beyond words that, not merely as a matter of machinery has he got to carry out repairs, but that he is wholly responsible for the loss or damage. In my view, therefore, this claim, however hard it may be on the contractors, must fail.

VINALL v. HOWARD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Streatfeild, J.), June 29, 1953.]

Contract—Illegality—Motor vehicle—Sale in unroadworthy condition—Road Traffic Act, 1934 (c. 50), s. 8 (1)—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 3—Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 2101), regs. 12 (1), 20, 44 (1).

A The plaintiff sold to the defendant a motor car of which the speed indicator, the silencer, and the braking system did not comply with the provisions respectively of regs. 12, 20, and 44 of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951. The defendant gave the plaintiff a cheque for the purchase price of the car, but, on discovering the unsatisfactory condition of the vehicle, he stopped the cheque. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the amount of the cheque,

C
D HELD: section 8 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1934 (which prohibits the sale of motor vehicles which do not comply with the regulations as to the construction, etc., of such vehicles) must be read subject to the provisions of s. 8 (4), but on the facts, if the plaintiff had been charged under s. 8 (3) with an offence under s. 8 (1), the defence provided by s. 8 (4)—namely, that he had reasonable cause to believe that the vehicle would not be used on a road until it had been put in a condition in which it might lawfully be so used—would not have been available to him; the prohibition contained in s. 8 (1) was absolute; the condition of the vehicle in question was such that its use on a road in that condition would be unlawful under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 3, since it failed to comply with the requirements of the regulations of 1951; and, therefore, the sale was unlawful under s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934, the contract was tainted with illegality, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

E FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 3, and the ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1934, s. 8, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 24, p. 574 and p. 717 respectively.

ACTION on a cheque.

F In February, 1952, the plaintiff bought for the purposes of re-sale a 1939/40 Morris eight horse-power motor car, registration number CBU 333. The plaintiff having advertised the car for sale, the defendant answered the advertisement, and on Feb. 27, the plaintiff, in accordance with arrangements made earlier, took the car to the defendant's house. He pointed out to the defendant such defects as he knew about, and then took the defendant for a short run in the car. After the run the defendant decided he would have the car, a price of £310 was agreed, and the defendant wrote out a cheque for that amount and gave it to the plaintiff. The defendant then drove the plaintiff in the car nearly ten miles to the plaintiff's house, the plaintiff knowing that the defendant would drive it back to his house. The next day the defendant inspected the car, and found that the chassis was fractured, and stopped the cheque. He told the plaintiff of his discovery and asked him to cancel the contract, but this
H the plaintiff was not willing to do. The plaintiff twice presented the cheque for payment and on both occasions it was dishonoured.

In the present action for the recovery of the amount of the cheque it was contended on behalf of the defendant that (i) there was an implied warranty that the car was in a fit condition for use on the road and otherwise free from mechanical defects; (ii) there was an express term that the cheque had been delivered to the plaintiff as an escrow pending the defendant's proper examination of the car in daylight; and (iii) the contract was tainted with illegality because the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant constituted a breach of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 8 (1). With regard to the first contention His LORDSHIP found that there was no implied warranty of fitness as alleged, and, with regard to the second, that the cheque was delivered unconditionally, and so decided those matters in favour of the plaintiff. The case is reported on the third contention.

Collard for the plaintiff.

Gazdar for the defendant.

STREATFEILD, J., stated the facts and his conclusions on the first two issues and continued: The third issue which the defendant has raised is whether this contract was tainted with illegality. For that purpose reliance is placed on s. 8 of the Road Traffic Act, 1934. By sub-s. (1) of that section:

" . . . it shall not be lawful to sell, or to supply . . . a motor vehicle . . . for delivery in such a condition that the use thereof on a road in that condition would be unlawful by virtue of the provisions of s. 3 of the [Road Traffic Act, 1930]."

By s. 3 of the Act of 1930:

" . . . it shall not be lawful, to use on any road a motor vehicle . . . which does not comply with the regulations applicable to the class or description of vehicles to which the vehicle belongs, as to the construction, weight and equipment thereof."

It is said that, by virtue of several of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, this vehicle was sold in such a condition that the use of it on the road in that condition would be unlawful by virtue of the provisions of s. 3.

The words in s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934 stating that to sell a vehicle in the condition mentioned shall be unlawful are governed by the opening words of the sub-section: "Subject to the provisions of this section . . ." It is not laid down in unqualified terms simply that it shall be unlawful to sell a vehicle in that condition, but only that it shall be unlawful to do so "subject to the provisions of this section." Therefore, it becomes necessary to look at the rest of the section. Section 8 (2) has no application to the present case. Section 8 (3) provides:

"If a motor vehicle . . . is sold, supplied, offered; or altered, in contravention of the provisions of this section, any person who so sells, supplies, offers, or alters it . . . shall be guilty of an offence."

Therefore, if a person in fact sells a vehicle in such a condition that it infringes the provisions of the regulations in question, an offence is committed. By s. 8 (4):

"A person shall not be convicted for an offence under this section in respect of the sale, supply, offer, or alteration of a motor vehicle . . . if he proves that . . . he had reasonable cause to believe that the vehicle . . . would not be used on a road in Great Britain . . ."

Obviously that applies to the case of a vehicle which is sold as scrap. Then come these words:

" . . . or would not be so used until it had been put into a condition in which it might lawfully be so used."

In other words, a man may commit an offence by selling a vehicle in an unroad-worthy condition, but he cannot be convicted of that offence, if, among other things, he shows to the court that he had reasonable cause to believe that the vehicle would not be used on a road in Great Britain until it had been put into a proper, roadworthy condition. If he does not prove that, it seems that the words of s. 8 (1) apply in full force.

A I have, therefore, to come to a conclusion whether this sale was illegal in the sense that the plaintiff would not have had a defence, had he been prosecuted for an offence under s. 8 (1). The particulars pleaded, in which it is alleged that this motor car was illegally sold because it was unroadworthy, first of all refer to the speed indicator, and it is admitted by the plaintiff that in fact the speedometer was in breach of reg. 12 (1) of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, which is applicable to the speedometer. Secondly, it is said that the silencer of the car was not in good and efficient working order and was not suitable for reducing the noise caused by the escape of gas from the engine, and it is admitted that that was in breach of reg. 20. Lastly, it is said that the car was not equipped with an efficient braking system, and it is admitted that that was the case and that that was in breach of reg. 44 (1).
B What the plaintiff says, in reply, relating to these matters, is that, so far as the speedometer and the braking system were concerned, the defects were pointed out by him to the defendant before or immediately after the sale was concluded and he received the cheque. He told me that he had no reason to suppose that the defendant would use the car on a road until he had rectified those defects. [His LORDSHIP referred to the facts and continued:] I accept
C the evidence of the plaintiff as a perfectly honest and accurate witness, but it is impossible for me to hold that he did not know that the defendant would be using the car on the road before these defects were remedied.

D I agree with the submission of counsel for the defendant that an absolute prohibition is imposed by s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934 against the sale, and by s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1930, against the use, of vehicles which are in an unroadworthy condition. I do not think that the condition of the vehicle has to be within the knowledge of the seller or the user. I think that counsel for the defendant is right in the submission he made about that, and also in saying that the only defence which would have been open to the plaintiff had he been prosecuted—that provided by s. 8 (4) of the Act of 1934—would not have been open to him on the facts of this case. I do not think he made good before me that he had reasonable cause to believe that the car would not be so used until the
E necessary repairs had been effected. In those circumstances, in my view, the sale of the car was an unlawful sale in contravention of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934. The authorities to which counsel for the defendant has drawn my attention, in particular, Commercial Air Hire, Ltd. v. Wrightways, Ltd. (1), make it clear that, if a contract is tainted with illegality, the court must take cognisance of it so that the party who has entered into the contract cannot recover in respect
F of it. On that ground, therefore, the defendant is entitled to succeed.

Divorce—Desertion—Constructive desertion—Conduct equivalent to expulsion of other spouse—Conduct falling short of cruelty.

Res Judicata—Husband and wife—Persistent cruelty—Dismissal of summons—Fresh summons on ground of constructive desertion.

On Aug. 29, 1952, the wife issued a summons against the husband, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, charging him with persistent cruelty to her on divers occasions before and on Aug. 16. On Sept. 3 the summons was served on the husband. On Sept. 4 the wife left the matrimonial home. On Sept. 17 the justices dismissed the summons. On Oct. 24 the wife issued further summonses before a different court of summary jurisdiction charging the husband with desertion as from Sept. 4, and wilful neglect to maintain her. At the hearing on Nov. 16 she gave evidence similar to that which she had given in the earlier proceedings, but stated also, inter alia, that on or about Sept. 4 the husband had said that he had finished with her, and that on Aug. 28 he had hit her and she had left the house for the night. On Nov. 16 the justices made an order in favour of the wife.

HELD: since the issue decided on Sept. 17 was different from that before the justices on Nov. 16 the wife was not estopped per rem judicatum from giving evidence similar to that given in the first proceedings; further, although the wife could not on the same evidence make out a case of constructive desertion, she was entitled to give evidence of other acts justifying her leaving home; there was evidence of other acts from which the court could find that the husband's conduct, being of a different kind from and not merely less than cruelty, justified the wife in leaving the matrimonial home; and, therefore, the wife was entitled to an order.

APPEAL by the husband against a maintenance order made by the justices for the petty sessional division of Sutton, Surrey, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, on the grounds of the husband's desertion and wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife.

The parties were married on Aug. 1, 1927. On Aug. 29, 1952, the wife issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, complaining that on Aug. 16, 1952, and on divers days prior thereto at the matrimonial home the husband had been guilty of persistent cruelty to her. On Sept. 3, 1952, the summons was served on the husband. On Sept. 4, 1952, the wife left the matrimonial home. At the hearing of that summons before the Dorking justices, the wife stated that the marriage had begun to break up at the beginning of the war; that during the preceding ten years the husband had illtreated her; that he had been associating with other women, particularly a Mrs. D.; that she, the wife, was suspicious of these associations; that she and the husband had quarrelled about them; and that these quarrels often ended by the husband hitting her on the mouth, causing her injury. The husband admitted that he had smacked his wife many times, and that on a date before the service of the summons there had been a "scene". On Sept. 17, 1952, the Dorking justices found that for the previous ten years the wife had been obsessed with the idea that the husband was having affairs with other women, and during the previous year or so had particularly accused him of having an affair with Mrs. D., and they found that there was no evidence that he was guilty of any improper association with Mrs. D. As regards the physical violence, they found that the husband had smacked the wife from time to time when she had been nagging him about going out without her, but that the husband's conduct was not of such a character as to have caused danger to life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, or to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger. Having seen and heard both parties in the witness box the justices were more impressed by the husband than by the wife, and, therefore, they dismissed the complaint, it not being considered that there was sufficient evidence of persistent cruelty to justify an order being made. On the same day the parties saw the probation officer with a view to a reconciliation, and the probation officer suggested that the wife should have three weeks in which to decide whether to return home. At no time did the wife announce her decision.

On Oct. 24, 1952, the wife issued summonses charging the husband with desertion as from Sept. 4, 1952, and wilful neglect to maintain her. Those summonses were heard by the Sutton justices on Nov. 16, 1952, when the wife gave evidence similar to that given before the Dorking justices, but added that the husband had said to her: "I would not take a thing like you out"; that, if she asked him to take her out, he flew into a rage and hit her; that, if she asked him, as she frequently did, not to take out Mrs. D., he hit her; and that a week before she left he hit her and threatened to "do her in"; that this phrase had been used more frequently recently and had frightened her; that when the husband could not have sexual intercourse he would hit her and say he would go out because he knew where he could "get it"; that on Aug. 28, 1952, there had been a quarrel over a conversation which the wife had had with Mrs. D., and as a result of the quarrel the husband had hit her, causing her injury, and she had spent the night with her sister; and that on Sept. 4, 1952, she had left because the husband said he had finished with her. Neighbours stated in evidence that on Aug. 28, 1952, they had heard the wife scream and had seen her running out of her house with blood on her face. The Sutton justices found that the husband's conduct caused her to leave the matrimonial home, and that he had deserted her and had wilfully neglected to maintain her. They, accordingly, made a maintenance order in the wife's favour and the husband appealed.

D. E. Peck for the husband.

Boydell for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: There is no escape from the dilemma that we are confronted with rival findings about substantially the same course of events, and that at Dorking, the husband's, and at Sutton, the wife's, evidence, has been preferred by those who had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses. In those circumstances it is not easy to apply the directions to an appellate tribunal contained in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (1). It is true that the charge at Dorking was persistent cruelty before and up to Aug. 16, whereas at Sutton it was desertion from Sept. 4, but the wife gave evidence at Dorking on Sept. 17 that things had got worse recently and that the husband had said to her: "I will do you in before I have finished with you", and that he had threatened to take her life within the previous two months, and that recently it had worried her a great deal and frightened her. Finally, she said that "matters came to a head at the end of August. I left home a fortnight ago tomorrow, on Sept. 4". From this it appears that the Dorking justices had before them the wife's whole story, at least in general terms, up to and including her alleged expulsion from the matrimonial home on Sept. 4. As I have already indicated, it seems to me that there is no escape from the essential conflict between the findings of the two courts. I should have felt happier about this case if the Sutton justices had particularised the conduct which they found had caused the wife to leave home, and if there had appeared in the statement of their reasons any trace of their having appreciated the difficulties created by the decision at Dorking a few weeks before.

It is said on behalf of the husband that the wife was estopped per rem judicatam from making the charge of desertion at Sutton. I must not be taken to assume that it is literally accurate that her evidence was in every respect the same at Sutton as it was at Dorking, but the gravamen of the submission on behalf of the husband is that she is saying, as she alleged that she said to the probation officer, that she could not go back to her husband because of his cruelty, which, ex hypothesi, had been found not to exist as a justification.

With regard to the incident on Aug. 28, it is argued that if this was in the least serious, as part of the course of cruelty, it not only could have been, but ought to have been, included in the wife's complaint of Aug. 29, and, therefore, she should be estopped from relying on it now, but it is also argued that it cannot have been serious because, if it had been, the wife could not have overlooked it when she made her complaint on Aug. 29. Alternatively, it is said that there was no such incident, and that it was only a confused repetition of an incident of Aug. 16. Out of such evidence it was obviously difficult to spell out an estoppel. As regards the suggestion that there was no incident on Aug. 28, and that it is merely a confused repetition of the incident of Aug. 16, it is worthy of note that, although the wife gave no evidence in chief and called no witnesses about the incident of Aug. 28, the husband in cross-examination referred to an incident, which is admittedly identifiable with the incident corroborated at the Sutton hearing by the neighbours, and that is again identifiable as the incident of Aug. 28.

Alternatively, it is argued on behalf of the husband that, if this is not a case of estoppel, it is a case of which, reading from the headnote in Pike v. Pike (2), it can be said that "A charge of constructive desertion cannot be proved by evidence of conduct, alleged to have caused the petitioner to leave the matrimonial home, of the nature of cruelty, but not amounting to cruelty in law."

The point in that case emerges clearly from one passage in HODSON, L.J.'s judgment ([1953] 1 All E.R. 235):

"I want to make it as clear as I can that when the case sought to be made is in the nature of a case of cruelty, it is not possible to build up a case of constructive desertion by what is really a case of unproved cruelty. That, of course, does not cover the whole area of constructive desertion, for grave and weighty matters might be alleged which are quite different in kind and quite as serious, if not more serious, than cruelty. One has in mind the well-known case of Russell v. Russell (3), where false charges were made, persisted in, and not withdrawn, or, of course, one can take the simple case of constructive desertion where there is an order or direction by one spouse to the other to leave. If that order is obeyed and the direction is followed and not withdrawn, then, again, desertion may run."

We were also referred to Edwards v. Edwards (4), and, in particular, to a passage in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., in which he commented on some observations of HODSON, J. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 250) in Barker v. Barker (5), an appeal heard in this court. BUCKNILL, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 149):

"Counsel for the husband says that is his case, and that in the present case, the commissioner having found that the husband was not cruel, there was no justification for the wife leaving. If HODSON, J., meant to say that, once a charge of cruelty has failed to be established, it is impossible for a wife to establish grounds justifying her in refusing to live with her husband, with great respect to the learned judge, it seems to me that that decision is inconsistent with the judgments in Russell v. Russell (3) and Buchler v. Buchler (6) which this court ought to follow. I myself think that that is not what the judge meant to say. I think he meant to say in effect: 'Here is a case where the blows inflicted by the husband on the wife either amounted to cruelty in that they injured her health, or were likely to injure it, or they were not of such a nature. If they were not of such a nature then, there being no other evidence in the case to justify desertion, the court ought not to say: "Although they were, in effect, trivial blows, they justify her in leaving the husband."'"

I emphasise the last sentence.

In a nutshell, therefore, the argument for the husband is that this is an attempt to build up a case of constructive desertion by what is really a case of unproved cruelty, and, more particularly, it is an attempt to say that smacks delivered from time to time by the husband, which have been held not to have been such as to amount to cruelty, justify the wife in leaving her husband. But I emphasise, as is apparent from the contexts of both those quotations, that the proposition depends on there being no other evidence in the case. Here it is said that there was other evidence, that is to say evidence of the husband having turned the wife out, in other words, of an order or direction by the husband to the wife to leave, acted on and not withdrawn. In her evidence-in-chief before the Sutton justices the wife said: "I left home on Sept. 4, 1952, because he said he had finished with me. He would not turn me out, but he would go out more". It is said, as the context is alleged to show, that this was all part of the incident of Aug. 28. I am not at all sure that that is so. The note at this part is by no means clear, and it may very well be that this, and an alleged threat to "do her in" of which she speaks, all occurred in what she calls "the week before I left", by which I presume she means the week before she left home. But then it is also said that the husband had withdrawn this direction to her to leave, if it was a direction to leave, at the interview with the probation officer on Sept. 17, and that the wife's failure to communicate her acceptance of that offer cancelled anything that had been said previously about her leaving. As regards the interview with the probation officer, if it was admissible at all, I do not think it can fairly be said to amount to any more than an undertaking by the wife to think it over. I do not think that the justices were bound to accept the evidence given by the husband that the wife was satisfied, and expressed herself to be satisfied, with his promise not to hit her again, which he said he had given after the issue of the first summons. The question still remains, therefore: Was there any evidence to justify a finding that the condition of things on Sept. 4 was such that the husband was expelling the wife from the home?

I will deal first with the allegation of estoppel. If the case before the Sutton justices had been an attempt to make a fresh charge of persistent cruelty by including in the course of conduct relied on an alleged incident of Aug. 28, the day before her complaint to the Dorking justices, I should be inclined to hold that she was estopped from re-opening that charge. Obviously, the mere fact that there was better and more detailed evidence, supported by independent witnesses of that incident, would be irrelevant. But at Dorking there was no charge of desertion on Sept. 4 before the court. It is true that, whether by amendment of the summons after she had left home or by the issue of a fresh summons returnable at the same time, all of which is a mere matter of machinery, a charge of desertion could have been made before the Dorking justices on Sept. 17, but, in my opinion, the wife was not bound to put the charge of desertion before the Dorking justices under the penalty of being estopped from afterwards alleging that she had been deserted before the date of that hearing. I think, perhaps, the matter can best be tested by supposing, for the sake of argument, that those steps had been taken, and that there had been before the justices at Dorking on Sept. 17 both a charge of cruelty up to Aug. 29 and a charge of desertion from Sept. 4. Would the Dorking justices, having found that the charge of cruelty had not been proved, have been bound to dismiss the charge of desertion because it was an attempt to build up a charge of constructive desertion by what was really a case of unproved cruelty? In my opinion, they would not, because of the evidence which, I am assuming for the purposes of the argument, the wife would have given, as she gave at Sutton, about the husband telling her that he had finished with her, and the rest. In other words, I am not prepared to hold that a court could not find that a husband who admittedly had smacked his wife in the face many times, because he said he was sick of being nagged by her about his going out, had neglected her, and "did not remember" having threatened her, as she alleged, but said that, if he did so, he did not mean it seriously, ought not to be taken to mean what he says, if he tells his wife at the end of it all that he had finished with her, even though he said that he would not actually turn her out, but coupled his statement that he had finished with her with the assertion that he would go out more than he did before, thereby implying that things would be worse than they had been before if she remained in the matrimonial home. The wife said, in the passage that I have read from her evidence before the Sutton justices, that she left home because of his saying this, and, although his conduct was held not to amount to cruelty, I cannot say that it is impossible that this statement, coupled with his avowal that he had finished with her, should be held to support a charge of desertion. For these reasons, unsatisfactory as I think it is that the wife's case should have been dealt with piecemeal by two courts which came to opposite conclusions about the credibility of the spouses, it is not, in my opinion, open to us to interfere with the decision under appeal, and, therefore, it is our duty to dismiss the appeal.

COLLINGWOOD, J.: I agree. The grounds of appeal are that the finding is wrong in law, that the issue had previously been decided by the Dorking justices and was thereby res judicata, that there was no evidence on which the justices could come to the conclusion at which they arrived, and that the decision was against the weight of the evidence.

I propose to look at the evidence which was given at Dorking on Sept. 17 and to compare that with the evidence given on Nov. 16 before the Sutton justices on the summons alleging desertion. I am not going through it in detail, but I will make an attempt to see how far any additional evidence of any materiality was carried at the second hearing, namely, before the Sutton justices. The wife, having spoken of the marriage on Aug. 1, 1927, said at Dorking that it started to break up at the beginning of the war. The husband worked at a pistol rocket factory near their home, a number of girls were working at the same factory, which brought him into contact with them, and he stayed out late at night. She said she was suspicious of his association with these girls because he appeared to prefer their company to hers and neglected to take her out, and that, when she challenged him with this, it led to quarrels which often ended in his hitting her in the face. With regard to that aspect of the case, when she was before the Sutton justices she added, with regard to his failure to take her out, that when he was taking the girls out he told her: "I would not take a thing like you out", and she said that, if she asked him to do so, he flew into a rage and hit her with the flat of his hand in the face. Apart from his partiality for girls in general during the last two years or so, the wife spoke of his association with a Mrs. D., and that, she said, got gradually worse and worse, especially during the six months preceding the hearing. With regard to that, she added at Sutton that, if she asked him not to go out with Mrs. D., as she frequently did, he hit her. Again, referring to the Dorking evidence, she said that during these quarrels he indulged in threats to the effect that he would "do her in" before he had finished with her, and that recently this phrase had become more frequent and it worried and frightened her. At the hearing before the Sutton justices she made reference to an express threat to "do her in", which she said was made a week before she left, and that would be this incident of Aug. 28, to which it will be necessary to refer again. Before the Sutton justices she said that, in addition to the conduct to which I have referred, her husband, when he could not get what he wanted (referring to sexual intercourse) would hit her, and would say that he would go out, because he knew where he could get it. Matters came to a head at the end of August, 1952. He had been seeing more and more of Mrs. D., her protests as before had been met by a smack in the face, and before the justices at Sutton she added: "If I asked him not to go out with Mrs. D. or to stay in he would hit me", and she added: "He hit me once a week before I left", and: "Once he sent me across the sink", by which, I imagine, she means that he gave her a smack which made her fall thus.

The incident of Aug. 16 was dealt with by the Dorking justices as being the culminating incident in the list of acts which were alleged to constitute cruelty. On that date the husband went to Brighton, returning late in the evening, something after eleven o'clock, having been to Brighton with Mrs. D., though admittedly with that lady's husband and son as well. This led to an argument, and the argument led to the usual smack in the face, which on this occasion made her lip bleed. She was in bed at the time, and she got up to wash her mouth out with water and her husband accompanied her downstairs. She added nothing to that incident in her evidence given at Sutton, except that she said that he had refused to take her to Brighton although she had wanted to go. Of the incident of Aug. 28 the wife gave no evidence before the Dorking justices, but that there was an incident on that day, that is, the day before the wife's summons was taken out, is clear from the evidence of the husband in the course of his cross-examination, because he says that at a date before the summons was served there was a scene. It is clear from the other evidence that the summons was served on him on Sept. 3, and that when he speaks of this scene he is speaking of the incident of Aug. 28. In the course of his cross-examination at Dorking he said: "Before summons was served there was a scene. She screamed and neighbours interfered". He explained the origin of the scene by saying that his wife had cycled down to the bus stop, seen Mrs. D. there, and had insulted her. At the hearing before the Sutton justices, the wife dealt in some detail with this incident of Aug. 28. It arose out of a visit by the husband to Redhill, and he had, his wife says, assured her that Mrs. D. was going to work that day. However, she saw Mrs. D. and spoke to her, the conversation being passed on later to the husband and described as being insulting. The wife went on to say: "At tea-time he came back. He got up", presumably meaning thereby out of a chair, "and asked me what I had said to Mrs. D. I said I told her she was to be at work", meaning thereby, "I understood you were going to be at work". Thereupon, she says, her husband hit her on the mouth and made a mark on her lip. She added: "It was Thursday or Friday evening" when this occurred "and we were in bed". August 28 was a Thursday, but it is difficult to associate this blow with the parties being in bed at the time when it was administered, because later in her evidence she says: "I called someone. He pushed me into a chair. I screamed. A Mr. B. came in and said something to him. I went to a neighbour. I was frightened of him and afraid to go to bed. He said he would do me in". Then, apparently asked again with regard to when that threat to do her in had been made, she said: "It was a week before we left", meaning thereby, "before I left the matrimonial home", which would be Aug. 28. I think she left with her sister, which would account for the plural.

I agree with LORD MERRIMAN, P., that this is not a question of res judicata. It is not estoppel, because the issue before the Sutton justices was an issue different from that before the Dorking justices. But it has been further contended that in this case, as in Pike v. Pike (2), in the words of DENNING, L.J., ([1953] 1 All E.R. 236): "... the husband's conduct was either cruelty or it was not. It was not something different from cruelty". HODSON, L.J., makes the same distinction when he says (ibid., 235):

"I want to make it as clear as I can that when the case sought to be made is in the nature of a case of cruelty, it is not possible to build up a case of constructive desertion by what is really a case of unproved cruelty", and it is urged here that, cruelty having been negatived by the Dorking justices at the first hearing, it followed that the wife's case on the ground of desertion failed also. That is the same argument as was presented in Edwards v. Edwards (4). The material passage in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., has already been read by my Lord. Applying the criteria in that case, the question which I ask myself is: Is there in the words of BUCKNILL, L.J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 149), "no other evidence . . . to justify desertion?" Is this a case where, if one negatives the wife's allegations of cruelty, the blows in the face, the threats to do her physical injury, if one finds that these blows and these threats were not of sufficient gravity to comply with the test in Russell v. Russell (3), and that they neither did nor were calculated to injure her health, mental or physical, is there anything left which can be said to justify her in leaving the matrimonial home? In my opinion, there was something in addition to the charges of cruelty simpliciter. In the first place, there was the husband's persistent preference for other women, carried to the length of his saying: "I would not take a thing like you out" to his wife. There was the persistent association with Mrs. D. in particular, insisted on over a period of between two and three years despite the wife's repeated protests, while at the same time he was insisting on intercourse with his wife and coupling that with the intimation that if he could not get it he knew where he could get it outside the house. There was no evidence that there was any impropriety in his association with her, but, nevertheless, he insisted on going out with her despite his wife's repeated protests and requests that he should cease to do so. Further, there was his habit of staying out late at night, again persisted in, although he knew the perfectly natural objection his wife had to it; and all these matters were getting worse and worse until the end of August, when the wife said that matters came to a head. He was seeing more of Mrs. D., and hitting the wife in the face when she protested, albeit not blows which injured her health or were calculated so to do. Finally the wife says: "On Sept. 4 I left home because he said he had finished with me. He would not turn me out, but he would go out more himself". In other words, the cause of all the wife's unhappiness for the past year or two was to be accentuated; what he knew to be the cause of his wife's unhappiness he was going to make worse, and deliberately make worse.

In those circumstances it is, in my opinion, impossible to say that there was no evidence on which the justices were entitled to find as they did, namely, that his conduct caused her to leave and justified her in leaving the matrimonial home. In my opinion, the conduct which did so cause her to leave was of a different kind from, and not merely something less than, cruelty. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HARTLEY v. MAYOH AND CO. AND ANOTHER.

[MANCHESTER ASSIZES (Barry, J.), March 20, 23, 24, 28, 1953.]

Negligence—Fire—Fireman electrocuted—Liability of occupiers—Invitee—Mains supply of electricity to lighting circuit not cut off—Obsolete type of mechanism—Unusual danger.

Factory—Fire—Fireman electrocuted while fighting fire—"Persons employed"—Electricity (Factories Act) Special Regulations, 1908 and 1944 (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1312, as amended by S.R. & O., 1944, No. 739), definitions.

Electricity Supply—Faulty installation—Fireman electrocuted—Liability of electricity board—Failure to test circuit—Negligence—Breach of statutory duty—Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937, reg. 25 (a).

The second defendants were the authority responsible for the supply of electricity to a factory occupied by the first defendants. On Sept. 24, 1950, a fire broke out at the factory and the fire brigade were summoned. As soon as they arrived, the deceased, an officer in the brigade, asked the first defendants' manager where the electric switches were so that he could cut off the mains supply of electricity. He was directed to a main switchboard on the ground floor, and, in his presence, another fireman knocked off the handles of two ironclad switches, contained in boxes adjoining the switchboard, which were obviously mains switches. They all thought that the whole supply of electricity to the premises was then cut off, as the manager did not know, and the firemen did not realise, that the lighting circuit was controlled by two old-fashioned tumbler switches, situated near the main switchboard, and unconnected by any form of link-bar. Notwithstanding that these tumbler switches were not turned off, no current should have been flowing through the lighting wires on the upper floor of the premises, where the fire was blazing, as the master switch which controlled the lighting circuit on the upper floor was turned off, but the polarity of the lighting system had been reversed by the crossing of the two leads between the tumbler switches and the meter and neutral bar, with the result that the neutral wire was alive throughout the whole circuit. When the deceased entered the room where the fire was, a live wire came into contact with his arm and he was electrocuted. The accident could not have occurred if the tumbler switches had been in the "off" position or if the leads had not been crossed. When, and by whom, they were originally crossed was not known. In January, 1950, the second defendants had fitted a new meter, but had not tested the circuits. The widow of the deceased claimed damages against the first and second defendants in respect of his death, the claim against the second defendants being based mainly on their failure to test the circuits in January, 1950. By their defence the second defendants pleaded that the accident was caused, either wholly or in part, by the negligence of the deceased or of some other officer of the fire brigade.

HELD: (i) although a fireman should understand the usual and normal methods of cutting off the electricity supply in premises in which a fire had taken place, he was not required to possess a detailed knowledge of obsolete mechanism which might, at some period, have been installed for this purpose in buildings within his area; in the circumstances the deceased was justified in concluding that the operation of the two modern ironclad switches cut off the whole of the electricity supply to the premises; and neither he nor any other member of the fire brigade was to blame for the accident.

(ii) the status of the deceased on the premises was that, or equivalent to that, of an invitee; a fireman attained this status whether his brigade had been summoned to the fire by the occupiers of the premises or by some other person.

Merrington v. Ironbridge Metal Works, Ltd. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 1101), followed.

(iii) the first defendants should have been aware of the way in which the mains supply to the lighting and power circuits could be switched off; the fact that the lighting supply was controlled by a switch which, in the absence of a link-bar between the two tumbler switches, did not appear to be a mains switch, and that electric current could circulate through the circuit when the only switches which appeared to be mains switches were turned off, constituted an unusual danger to persons in the situation of the deceased, against which such persons ought to have been warned; and, therefore, the first defendants, as the occupiers of the premises, had failed in their duty to the deceased, as an invitee, to give him due warning of an unusual danger of which they ought to have been aware, and they were liable in damages for negligence.

(iv) on the facts, the first defendants had failed to comply with the requirements of the Electricity (Factories Act) Special Regulations, 1908 and 1944, reg. 1, reg. 7 and reg. 9; their liability to persons injured by a breach of the regulations was not confined to persons in their own employment, notwithstanding that "danger" was defined in the regulations as meaning danger of various kinds "to persons employed"; the reference to persons employed was merely part of that definition, and, once the definition was fulfilled (i.e., once a breach of the regulations caused danger to "persons employed" on the premises), other persons lawfully on the premises were afforded the right of protection; alternatively, the words "persons employed" were not confined to persons employed by the occupiers, but included all other employed persons on the premises; and, therefore, the first defendants were in breach of their statutory duty to the deceased.

(v) when the second defendants installed the new meter on the first defendants' premises in January, 1950, they should have realised that the first defendants would assume that the mains supply was properly connected to the phase wire and not to the neutral wire of the lighting circuit; no intermediate examination by the first defendants could be reasonably contemplated and, in the absence of any such examination, the second defendants should have been aware that their omission to make a proper test would be likely to cause damage to any persons lawfully on the premises who had occasion to come into contact with any part of the wiring of the lighting system; and, therefore, the failure of the second defendants to test the circuits in January, 1950, was a negligent omission on their part and constituted a breach of the legal duty which they owed to the deceased.

M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson ([1932] A.C. 562), applied.

Semble, that the second defendants were also in breach of the Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937, reg. 25 (a).

(vi) the fault of the first defendants being comparatively venial, the liability for the damages awarded to the widow should be borne, as to ten per cent. by the first defendants, and as to ninety per cent. by the second defendants.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

D

The plaintiff, Mrs. Doris Hartley, was the widow and administratrix of Reginald Dingle Hartley, a divisional officer of the Salford Fire Brigade, who died through electrocution on Sept. 24, 1950, when he was engaged in extinguishing a fire at a factory occupied by the first defendants, Mayoh and Co. The second defendants, the North-Western Electricity Board, were the authority responsible for the supply of electricity to the factory. The plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of the death of her husband.

E

The deceased was the officer responsible for ensuring that the mains supply of electricity and gas was cut off from any building at which the fire brigade were called on to work. On Sept. 24, 1950, the brigade were summoned to deal with a fire which had broken out on the upper floor of the first defendants' factory, and, as soon as they arrived, the deceased and another fireman, named Bigland, asked the first defendants' manager where the main electric switches were situated and were directed by him to the main switchboard on the ground floor. By this switchboard were two ironclad switches contained in boxes, both being obviously mains switches. Bigland, in the presence of the deceased, knocked off the handles in both these switchboxes and they all thought that the whole of the electricity supply to the premises was then cut off. The lighting circuit, however, was controlled by two small tumbler switches, unconnected by any form of link-bar, which were situated on one side of the main switchboard. These tumbler switches were not turned off, as neither the manager nor the firemen realised their function. The master switch, which controlled the whole of the lighting circuit on the upper floor of the premises, and the switch controlling the lighting in the room in which the fire was blazing were both turned off, but, owing to the fact that the leads between the tumbler switches and the meter, on the one hand, and the neutral bar, on the other hand, were wrongly crossed, the polarity of the lighting system was reversed, the current passed through the neutral wire instead of through the phase wire, and the neutral wire remained charged with electricity even after the master switches were off. Having received a slight shock from an electric wire in the neighbourhood of the fire, Bigland returned to the switchboard with the first defendants' manager, who assured him that there were no other switches on the circuit. After re-examining the switchboard, the manager assured Bigland that all the switches were off. Shortly afterwards the deceased entered the room in which the fire was blazing, a "live" electric wire came into contact with his forearm, and he was killed. The plaintiff based her claim against each of the defendants on negligence at common law and breach of statutory duty.

F

G

Brabin, Q.C., and P. Curtis for the plaintiff.

Laski, Q.C., and T. M. Backhouse for the first defendants, Mayoh and Co.

Nelson, Q.C., and C. M. W. Elliott for the second defendants, the North-Western Electricity Board.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 28. BARRY, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and said: This accident, I think, could never have happened if the tumbler switches had been in the "off" position, nor could it have occurred if the current had been flowing, as it should have done, through the phase wire, which was controlled by the master switch and the switch controlling the lighting in the room where the fire was blazing, and not through the neutral wire. Before considering the liability, if any, attributable to the two defendants, or either of them, it will be convenient to deal with the plea raised by the second defendants that the accident was caused, either wholly or in part, by the negligence of the deceased himself or of some other officer of the Salford Fire Brigade. For this purpose I will assume that firemen should have some general knowledge of gas, electric and water installations, and, in particular, they should, I think, understand the normal and usual methods of cutting off the gas and electricity supply in premises in which a fire takes place. In my judgment, however, they are not required to possess a detailed, historical knowledge of obsolete and highly unusual pieces of mechanism which may at some period have been installed for these purposes in buildings within their area. In the circumstances of this case I am satisfied that, in the absence of any information to the contrary, both Sub-Officer Bigland and the deceased were justified in concluding that the operation of the two modern ironclad switches cut off the whole of the electricity supply to the building. It would, I think, be grossly unjust to convict them of negligence because they failed to realise during the progress of a fire that the two old, unconnected tumbler switches might control the mains supply to the lighting circuit. After all, both the deceased and Bigland were there to fight the fire and not to make a detailed examination into the wiring system of the switchboard. I accept the evidence of the many witnesses who told me that without such a detailed investigation any ordinary fireman would assume that two unconnected tumbler switches controlled some local lighting point and not the mains supply. The use of tumbler switches for controlling the mains supply, even when connected by a link-bar, was a wholly obsolete practice. Since 1930 the second defendants, or their predecessors, had been advising the owners of old installations to change over to modern ironclad switches of the interlocking type. Despite this fact, I have little doubt that, if the two tumbler switches had been connected by a link-bar, the deceased and Bigland would have turned them off, as they would have suspected, at least, that these two connected switches might have some connection with the mains supply. In the absence of any form of linkage joining the two, these two tumbler switches were almost, if not quite, unique as a device for cutting off the mains. Having exonerated, as I do, the deceased and other members of the fire brigade from any blame, I must now consider the legal position of the two defendants.

The first defendants were the occupiers of the premises in which the accident occurred and their common law and statutory obligations to the deceased have both got to be taken into account. At common law, the first defendants' duties to the deceased depended on the capacity in which the deceased entered on their premises. I am satisfied that the status of the deceased on the premises was that—or was, at least, equivalent to that—of an invitee. In reaching this conclusion I respectfully follow, and agree with, the decision of HALLETT, J., in Merrington v. Ironbridge Metal Works, Ltd. (1). I also share that learned judge's opinion that a fireman attains this status whether his brigade has been summoned to the fire by the occupiers of the premises or by some outside person who happens to observe that a fire has broken out.

A is to use proper care to ensure that his premises are free from any unusual danger, or, alternatively, to give due warning of any unusual danger of which he knows or ought to know. With this standard in mind I am quite satisfied that the first defendants failed to fulfil their common law duties towards the deceased. It is, however, right to say that I acquit them of any conscious default. I am also far from satisfied that they ought to have known that the polarity of the lighting system had been reversed by the crossing of the leads between the tumbler switches and the meter and neutral phase. On the other hand, I consider that the occupiers of premises of this kind ought to have been aware of the way in which the mains supply to the lighting and power circuits could be switched off. I am fortified in this view by the evidence of Mr. Holland, the first defendants' manager. He told me that he knew that the two tumbler switches did not control any local lighting points. This should, I think, have put him on inquiry as to their true function. Neither Mr. Holland nor anyone else in the employment of the first defendants warned the deceased of the unusual danger which existed in these premises for firemen or other persons who might come into contact with the electric wires, this unusual danger being, of course, the fact that the lighting supply was controlled by a switch which did not appear to be a mains switch and that electric current could circulate through the electric circuit when the only two switches which appeared to be mains switches were turned to the "off" position. Put in another way, the first defendants ought, I think, to have realised that the absence of any link-bar between the two tumbler switches constituted an unusual danger to persons in the situation of the deceased, against which such persons clearly ought to have been warned. If no warning was to be given, the first defendants should have fulfilled their alternative duty, i.e., they should have rendered their premises safe and eliminated this unusual danger by the simple means of fitting a link-bar between the two tumbler switches or fixing some label or notice in the neighbourhood of the switches indicating that they controlled the main lighting supply to the building.

F The plaintiff's case against the first defendants is also founded on a breach of their statutory duties under the Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907, 1908 (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1312), which are still in force.* If these regulations are, in truth, designed to afford protection to those employed in a factory other than the direct employees of the occupiers of that factory, the plaintiff's cause of action under the regulations is not, and, indeed, could not be, in dispute. The occupier of the factory is responsible for compliance with the regulations, and a substantial number of them have, clearly, been infringed in the present case, including reg. 1, reg. 7 and reg. 9, which are specifically referred to in the pleadings. Counsel for the first defendants, however, contended that the regulations afforded protection only to the direct employees of the occupier of the factory. In support of this argument he drew attention to the fact that in the regulations the word "danger" is defined as meaning danger of various kinds "to persons employed." He contrasted the phrase "persons employed" with the more general words used in certain sections of the Factories Act, 1937—e.g., s. 12 (3), s. 13 (1), s. 14 (1) and s. 23—which more general words, he said, were used by the legislature when it was intended to extend the protection of the Act to persons working on premises who were not, in fact, employed by the occupiers. This is a formidable argument, but, with some hesitation, I think that it ought to be rejected. The regulations of 1908 are quite general in their terms, although it is true they are made under powers contained in the Factory and Workshop Acts. It would, I think, be a strange course of construction to limit the application of any code of regulations by reason of the definition of a single word which is only to be found in a proportion, and not a large proportion, of the regulations concerned. This is particularly so when the word in question has not, in itself, any conceivable bearing on the extent of the application of the regulations. It would, of course, be absurd to find that those regulations which contained the word "danger" were of narrower application than those in which that word did not appear. Having regard to the scope, and, particularly, to the purpose, of these regulations and the danger which they were designed to prevent, I think that I should give them the most liberal interpretation which their wording will allow. This can be done by regarding the reference to "persons employed", in the definition of "danger", as merely part of that definition, and by so doing one can construe the regulations as meaning that, once this definition has been fulfilled—i.e., once some act or omission causes danger to "persons employed" on the premises—other persons lawfully on those premises are afforded the right of protection. Alternatively, and, to my mind, perhaps more attractively, it can be said that the words "persons employed" should not be given a more limited meaning than the words actually express, and it can be said that these words are not confined to persons employed by the occupiers but can also include all other persons who are employed on the premises. On the whole, therefore, I think that the plaintiff has established her case against the first defendants under the regulations of 1908, but I reach that conclusion with very much less confidence than I reached the conclusion that she has established against them a breach of their common law duties.

The liability of the first defendants having thus been established, I must now consider the position of the second defendants, the North-Western Electricity Board. For the sake of brevity, I shall not differentiate between the board and their predecessors prior to 1948 when the board took over the undertaking from the Salford Corporation and other authorities. I am satisfied that, when an electricity supply was first brought to these premises, the occupiers were responsible for supplying the cables, or leads, or lengths of wire, of sufficient length to enable the installation on the premises to be attached on the meter and neutral bar provided by the second defendants. The subsequent attachment of the leads provided by the occupiers, and their subsequent sealing within the meter and the neutral bar, were within the responsibility of the second defendants. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence which showed that the original installation had been interfered with on four occasions. On the first occasion the number of lighting points had been increased, the work being done by independent contractors employed by the first defendants. On the other three occasions the work had been done by the second defendants: in 1934 they had supplied a new meter, in 1946 they had installed a bottle-washing machine, and in January, 1950, after a burst pipe had flooded the switchboard, they had put in a new three-terminal meter and connected it up to the lighting circuit. The work of putting in the new meter was carried out by Mr. Oddy, a meter-fixer employed by the second defendants. HIS LORDSHIP was satisfied that Mr. Oddy was not responsible for crossing the wires, as, to carry out his work, he would only have disconnected the leads between the meter and the switches, and the leads were of such lengths that it was impossible to interchange them at the ends where they were connected with the second defendants' apparatus. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] I am, however, forced to the conclusion that, on a strong balance of probability, the original crossing of the two leads from the tumbler switches to the second defendants' apparatus was the fault of some unknown employee of the second defendants. This fault was committed on some previous occasion which it is wholly impossible to identify. The original responsibility for the crossing of these two leads is, however, a question, I think, of, comparatively, slight importance. The plaintiff's case against the second defendants is primarily based on their failure to test the circuits when they fitted the new meter in January, 1950—about eight months before this accident took place. The fact that the current was passing through the neutral instead of the phase wire could have been ascertained by more than one very simple test, the simplest of which was, perhaps, the use of a neon testing instrument, which would have detected this fault in a matter of seconds. There has been a considerable body of expert evidence to the effect that a test of this kind should be made by a supply authority whenever there has been any interference with the mains supply, such as by the fixing of a new meter. It was the normal practice of some boards to make such a test, although it was not, at that time at least, the practice of the second defendants. The failure of the second defendants to make any test on this occasion was, I think, a negligent omission on their part. The second defendants pointed out that Mr. Oddy himself could not have crossed the wires and was, therefore, entitled to assume that they were correctly connected. After fixing a meter and re-establishing a mains electricity supply on the premises, the second defendants, realising the extreme danger which may arise from any fault, should not, I think, have been satisfied with a probability—or even a high probability—that the circuits were correctly connected. I think that they should have satisfied themselves, as they so easily could have done, that they were, in truth and in fact, correctly connected.

It does not, however, assist the plaintiff to establish that the second defendants were what has been described as "negligent in the air". She must also satisfy me that they were in breach of some legal duty which they owed to the deceased. I have little doubt that such a duty did, in fact, exist. The plaintiff relied on the well-known principles enunciated by the House of Lords in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (2): see the observations of LORD ATKIN ([1932] A.C. 580). I am satisfied that those principles are applicable in the present case. In 1953 it is unnecessary for me to cite any passages from the well-known speeches so often referred to in that case. The second defendants should, I think, have realised that, when they installed a new meter which measured the electric current passing into the lighting system of the occupiers of any premises, these occupiers would assume that the mains supply was properly connected to the phase wire and not to the neutral wire of their lighting circuit. No intermediate examination by the occupiers could, I think, be reasonably contemplated, and in the absence of any such examination the second defendants should, in my judgment, have been aware that their omission to make a proper test of the circuit would be likely to cause damage to any persons lawfully on the occupiers' premises who had occasion to come into contact with any part of the wiring of the lighting system. Such persons, in my judgment, included the deceased. No useful purpose would, I think, be served by a further elaboration of this part of the case.

The plaintiff further relied, as against the second defendants, on a breach by them of the Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937, made by the Electricity Commissioners under the Electricity (Supply) Acts, 1882 to 1936. Here, again, I think that the plaintiff's case under these regulations is very much less secure than it is under the common law of this country. None the less, I ought to express an opinion about the matter, but again do so with some considerable hesitation. On the whole, I take the view that the plaintiff has established a breach of reg. 25 (a) of the regulations of 1937. Regulation 25 reads:

"(a) The undertakers shall be responsible for all electric lines and apparatus placed by them on the premises of a consumer and either belonging to the undertakers or under their control (whether forming the whole or part of the consumer's installation or not) being installed and maintained in a safe condition and suitable for their respective purposes and being so fixed and protected as to prevent so far as is reasonably practicable leakage to any adjacent metal. (b) The standard of construction and installation adopted by the undertakers in complying with para. (a) hereof in so far as it relates to the whole or any part of a consumer's installation shall not be lower than that which the undertakers would be prepared to accept under reg. 27 to reg. 30 (inclusive)."

The matter seems to me to be extremely doubtful, but although the two leads from the tumbler switches were originally, as I have found, provided by the occupiers of the premises, none the less, in one sense, they were placed by the undertakers on the premises—in the sense that the undertakers utilised these wires and wholly controlled them for the purpose of connection with their apparatus, i.e., the meter and the neutral phase on the switchboard. I think that is a possible construction of the matter, and, although I am extremely doubtful about it, I think, on the whole, were I forced to decide this matter, I should find in favour of the plaintiff. Clearly, if the regulations are applicable to these two leads there has been a breach of the requirements placed on the undertakers—in this case, the second defendants—as those two leads were certainly not installed or maintained in a safe condition.

In the result, I find that each of the defendants are responsible to the plaintiff in respect of this accident, each being responsible for one of the two causes in the absence of which no accident could have occurred. I have, therefore, to turn to the question of damages.

I have been asked by counsel for the first defendants to apportion the blame for this accident between the defendants. I have considered the matter carefully, and I have no doubt that by far the greater responsibility in this matter rests on the second defendants. The first defendants are pickle manufacturers and they are not experts in electrical supply. Their fault—although it was a fault, as I have found—was, I think, a comparatively venial one, and I think that the fair apportionment as between the defendants should be that the first defendants bear ten per cent. of the loss and the second defendants bear the remaining ninety per cent. of the loss. By "loss" I mean the damages awarded to the plaintiff.

NOTE.

DRYDEN v. DRYDEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 23, 1953.]

A Divorce—Desertion—Termination—Adultery by deserted spouse—Onus on deserted spouse to show that adultery did not affect desertion.

APPEAL by the wife from an order of His Honour JUDGE REWCASTLE, dated Dec. 18, 1952, made on an undefended petition by the wife for divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion.

B The husband deserted the wife in 1948, and in 1949 she obtained magistrates' orders in respect of her own maintenance and that of the two children of the marriage. In her discretion statement the wife admitted committing adultery in July, 1950, and in September, 1950, as a result of which a child was born in June, 1951. According to the evidence the husband, on hearing of her adultery, took proceedings to have the order for the wife's maintenance discharged. The learned commissioner dismissed the petition.

C Stranger-Jones for the wife.

The husband did not appear.

Case referred to:

(1) Herod v. Herod, [1938] 3 All E.R. 722; [1939] P. 11; 108 L.J.P. 27; 159 L.T. 530; 27 Digest, Replacement, 360, 2978.

D HODSON, L.J., said that the learned commissioner seemed to have based himself on the view that the husband's proceedings to discharge, on the ground of the wife's adultery, the order which the wife obtained against him had the automatic effect of showing that the desertion was terminated. He (HIS LORDSHIP) did not think that was the right view. It was open to the wife to discharge the burden of proving that desertion still continued notwithstanding that proceedings were taken by the husband to have the order discharged. The law applicable to that situation was stated in Herod v. Herod (1) in terms which had been repeatedly approved by the Court of Appeal, namely, that the adultery of the wife did not automatically terminate desertion, but it was an obstacle in the way of proving that it continued. That obstacle was often removed by the petitioner's giving evidence tending to show that in all probability the other party had no knowledge of the adultery, but once it was clear that the petitioner had committed adultery it was not an easy matter for him or her to show that that adultery had no effect on the continuance of the desertion. No attempt had been made in the present case before the learned commissioner to discharge that part of the burden. The commissioner had been asked to draw the conclusion that the husband's determination to desert was fixed and unshakable and that the adultery had had nothing to do with it. He (HIS LORDSHIP) thought the burden was not so easily discharged as that. In the circumstances HIS LORDSHIP had come to the conclusion that there ought to be an opportunity for the wife to have a re-hearing.

MILLS v. ALLEN AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.),
June 17, 18, 1953.]

Limitation of Action—Landlord and tenant—Possession—Suspension of warrant—Non-enforcement for more than twelve years since date of issue—Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838 (c. 74), s. 1—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 4 (2)—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 2 (4).

A

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—Order for possession during tenant's lifetime—Conditional suspension of order—Effect on rights of member of tenant's family—Form of order—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

B

In 1922 a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied was let to A. at a rent of £1 6s. 8d. per month. In May, 1935, the landlord gave A. notice to quit in June, 1935, when the contractual tenancy was effectually determined. On July 16, 1935, the landlord obtained from a court of summary jurisdiction a warrant for possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, subject to the provision that the warrant should not be executed as long as A. paid the rent regularly and made a monthly payment towards the arrears of rent, and it was ordered that the warrant should remain in force for three months or for such further period as the court should from time to time direct. On Jan. 31, 1939, the landlord applied for the enforcement of the order of July 16, 1935, but the court suspended the warrant for a further period of three months, and on Apr. 25, 1939, the operation of the order was suspended sine die. Rent was paid by A. and accepted by the landlord until, on Oct. 5, 1952, A. died intestate. The landlord now claimed possession against A.'s niece who had lived with A. since 1922. The county court judge made an order for possession on the ground that the order of the justices dated July 16, 1935, put an end to the statutory tenancy of A. and prevented the transmission of the statutory tenancy to the niece under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. On appeal, HELD: assuming that the directions of the justices were all effectively made, nevertheless, having regard to the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (4), the justices' order ceased to be effective at least one year, and possibly five years, before A.'s death, and, therefore, A.'s continuing in possession for a period before her death and paying rent, and the landlord's acceptance of that rent, was conduct referable only to there being in A. a contractual or a statutory tenancy, and it followed that, whatever the nature of A.'s tenancy, A.'s niece, as a member of A.'s family within s. 12 (1) (g), was entitled to remain in possession as tenant.

F

G

Moodie v. Hosegood ([1951] 2 All E.R. 582), applied.

Per curiam: An order for possession suspended so long as certain conditions are complied with is not necessarily the most satisfactory form of order to make. Where it is desired, in effect, to suspend the order for possession for an indefinite period, there is much to be said for making an order that the defendant should be required to agree to pay the rent and arrears, or perform whatever other conditions the court may think proper; that the agreement should be recited in the order; and that the court should make no order for possession, but should give liberty to apply for an order for possession on breach or non-fulfilment of the conditions. If any order for possession is then made, it is likely to be an absolute order, and nobody is left in doubt as to its effect.

H

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: There is strong ground for suggesting that a warrant under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, can be comprehended within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4 (2), as being a judgment, so as thereby to confer on the justices powers at the time of making their order to direct that it should not be executed so long as some conditions are fulfilled.

Observations of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., relating to the effect of the existence of a conditional order for possession on the right of a member of a deceased tenant's family to be deemed to be the tenant by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920.

American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1186), considered.

Quaere whether, where a statutory tenancy is to be treated as terminated by an order for possession, it would revive when the order ceased to be effective, or whether a statutory tenancy is capable of co-existing with the operation of the order.

F APPEAL by a defendant, Bessie Jane Allen, from an order of His Honour JUDGE RAWLINS at Redruth County Court, dated Mar. 12, 1953. The landlord claimed an order for possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied from (inter alios) the defendant, a niece of a Mrs. Allen. In 1922 Mrs. Allen became a contractual tenant of the dwelling-house, and her contractual tenancy was determined in June, 1935. On July 16, 1935, the landlord obtained from a court of summary jurisdiction a warrant for possession suspended for three months. In 1939 the operation of the warrant was suspended sine die. The county court judge held that the order of the justices put an end to Mrs. Allen's statutory tenancy and prevented the transmission of the tenancy to the appellant on Mrs. Allen's death on Oct. 5, 1952, under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g).

H Tilling for the defendant, Miss Allen.

Petherick for the plaintiff, the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: This appeal has given rise to considerable argument on certain points of great difficulty, and, I think, importance, though, in the event, the matter can, in my judgment, be determined, and should be determined, on a relatively simple point. The action is one for possession brought by Mrs. Mills, the landlord, against some seven persons who were and, I take it, are in occupation of the premises known as 33 Centenary Street, Camborne. At the trial, the substantial defence was to the effect that the first of the defendants, Miss Bessie Jane Allen, was entitled to be regarded as the statutory tenant of those premises by virtue of the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), as amended. The county court judge decided in favour of the landlord, and made an order for possession. Although the notice of appeal appears to have been served on behalf of all the defendants, it has been agreed before us (and we have proceeded accordingly) that the first defendant only, Miss Allen, is the appellant and she alone of the seven defendants claims any right to remain on the premises.

In September, 1922, these premises were let on a contractual tenancy to Miss Allen's aunt, a Mrs. Andrews, at a rent of £1 6s. 8d. per month, and thenceforward Mrs. Andrews, together with a number of her relatives, including Miss Allen, have occupied the house. In May, 1935, the then landlord, the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, gave notice to quit to Mrs. Andrews. That notice duly expired and was effective to determine the contractual tenancy in June, 1935. The next step—and it is the first of the matters which has given rise to great difficulty and not a little obscurity—was that the then owner, one William Vivian, made an application to the justices of the petty sessional division of East Penwith for the issue of a warrant for possession under the terms of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1. To the form of the order which was made, according to the notes with which we have been supplied, I shall presently have to return. Suffice it to state that the justices appear to have made an order in exercise or purported exercise of their powers under s. 1 of which the intended effect appears to have been that possession was to be given within twenty-one days, subject to the provision that so long as Mrs. Andrews paid regularly the monthly rent of £1 6s. 8d., together with a further sum of 14s. 4d. on account of arrears, the warrant should not be executed, and it was, subject to those directions, to remain in force for three months or for such further period as the court should from time to time direct. Those last few words, as will later appear, are a reflection of the terms of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4 (4). That order was made on July 16, 1935.

The provisions for payment of rent and arrears do not appear to have been closely adhered to, and although we have no note of any further order extending the period of three months mentioned in the first order, on Jan. 31, 1939, Mr. William Vivian applied again to the petty sessional court of East Penwith for enforcement of the order for possession made on July 16, 1935. On that occasion, it appears that the order was "suspended" (whatever may be the precise effect of that direction) for a further period of three months on the same conditions as those which I have already stated in reference to the first order—at least, so it has been assumed. From that time onwards, however, the performance of Mrs. Andrews in paying her rent and arrears was much improved, so that in April, 1939, the landlord himself communicated with the court and invited the court to make a further suspension. The note of what was then done on Apr. 25, 1939, is that the operation of the order was suspended sine die. I assume again that the intention was that for an indefinite period the execution of the warrant was to be suspended, provided that Mrs. Andrews punctually paid her rent and regular instalments of the arrears.

In 1943 the present plaintiff acquired the property from William Vivian. Finally, on Oct. 5, 1952, Mrs. Andrews died intestate, and no grant of administration of her estate has been made.

During the whole period of her occupation, from 1922 until 1952, the appellant (hereinafter called Miss Allen) was residing with her aunt, and it is conceded by counsel for the landlord that the judge was entitled to find and correctly held that if all other points were decided in Miss Allen's favour, she ought to be treated as a member of Mrs. Andrews' family within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, but, in order that she may, by fulfilling that condition, be entitled now to remain in occupation by virtue of the Rent Restrictions Acts she must show that when her aunt, Mrs. Andrews, died, she was either a contractual or a statutory tenant of 33 Centenary Street, Camborne.

A I have already intimated sufficiently what the real point was which presented itself to the county court judge, viz., whether the making of the order in 1935 by the justices, the operation of which was suspended first until April, 1939, and then sine die, was such as to put an end altogether to the statutory tenancy which Mrs. Andrews formerly enjoyed, and thereby to prevent the operation in Miss Allen's favour of the definition in s. 12 (1) (g).

B On that issue the county court judge concluded as follows:

C "Following the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little (1), I find that the plaintiff, the landlord, is entitled to an order for possession. For the purpose of this decision I am assuming that the defendant is a member of the tenant's family within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 13, and the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935, s. 1. The fact that the warrant cannot be enforced does not in my opinion affect the right of the landlord. I respectfully agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., when he says ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1188): ' . . . a tenant in that position, with an absolute order made against him, notwithstanding that it may be suspended, is not a tenant within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. That, I think, is in accordance with a common-sense application of the section. It would be an illogical result if that section gave protection to a widow which the court had expressly taken away from the husband whose tenancy she relies on, that tenancy having been brought to a suspended end by the order for possession' . . . In view of my opinion that the order was a final order, and not a conditional one, it is unnecessary for me to consider what would be the position if the order had been conditional."

E Before I refer further to American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little (1), it may be convenient to deal with certain other points which have arisen and which have themselves caused no little difficulty. The terms of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, so far as relevant are as follows:

F " . . . and upon proof of service of the notice [by the landlord for the determination of the tenancy], and of the neglect or refusal of the tenant or occupier, as the case may be, it shall be lawful for the justices acting for the district, division, or place within which the said premises or any part thereof shall be situate, in petty sessions assembled, or any two of them, to issue a warrant under their hands and seals to the constables and peace officers of the district, division, or place within which the said premises or any part thereof shall be situate, commanding them, within a period to be therein named, not less than twenty-one nor more than thirty clear days from the date of such warrant, to enter (by force if needful) into the premises, and give possession of the same to such landlord or agent . . ."

H There is no question but that these premises are within the scope of the Act of 1838. From the part of the section which I have read it is plain that the only jurisdiction conferred on the justices by the Act of 1838 is to issue a warrant for possession. It is, therefore, one difficulty in the way of the landlord in this case that, according to the notes of what took place in the petty sessional court of East Penwith, there is no express reference to the issue of a warrant at all. In the rather longer note which was before the county court judge, which the clerk certified, the court appears on July 16, 1935, to have made an order for possession, and then the note continued: "The warrant to be suspended", on the terms which I have already mentioned, but to remain in force for three months. In the rather shorter certificate with which we have been supplied the note is:

"Order made for possession within twenty-one days, not to be executed so long as respondent pays £2 a month on account of current rent accruing and arrears owing."

Judging solely from the evidence of those notes, it appears, therefore, at least doubtful whether any warrant under the hands and seals of the justices and addressed to the constables ever was, in fact, issued at all. That point, however, was not taken in the court below. In the particulars of claim the landlord pleaded that a warrant had been issued, and although it is true that the defence put the landlord to proof of the whole of her claim, no point, in fact, was made calling on the landlord strictly to prove the issue of a warrant. According to his notes of judgment, the learned judge, possibly proceeding, as he was entitled to do, on the principle that everything should be assumed to have been correctly done, opened his judgment thus: "The following facts were admitted or were proved to my satisfaction", and then No. 8 out of a total of 11:

"In July, 1935, the then landlord took proceedings under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, against Mrs. Annie Andrews and a warrant for possession was issued."

Counsel for Miss Allen has said that although the point that no warrant was ever issued was not taken below, it should be open to him in this court on the ground that we are here dealing with a rent restriction matter, and that by the imperative words of the Act of Parliament the court cannot make an order for possession unless the court is satisfied that the conditions on which alone an order can be made have been satisfied. I do not think, however, that that argument would suffice to enable this point to be taken here when it had not been taken below. The question whether a warrant was or was not issued was a question of fact, and if Miss Allen in the court below has chosen to concede, expressly or implicitly, that matter of fact, so that the judge was entitled to conclude as he did, it seems to me that the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts are not such as to empower or authorise us to go afresh into a matter of fact—which, indeed, we would be quite unable to do, having now no material available to enable a conclusion to be reached. Whatever doubts, therefore, the form of the clerk's notes might give rise to, I think we are entitled to assume, and must assume, that the judge rightly held that a warrant for possession had been issued.

That, however, is not entirely the end of the difficulties arising out of the justices' orders, because, as has been pointed out, the impact of the rent restriction legislation on the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, leaves some obscurity in the consequences. Two sub-sections of s. 4 of the Act of 1923 are relevant. Sub-section (2), so far as is necessary for these purposes, is as follows:

"At the time of . . . the making or giving of any order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any such dwelling-house . . . or in the case of any such order or judgment which has been made . . . and not executed . . . the court may adjourn the application, or stay or suspend execution on any such order or judgment, or postpone the date of possession for such period or periods as it thinks fit, and subject to such conditions (if any) in regard to payment by the tenant of arrears of rent, rent, or mesne profits or otherwise as the court thinks fit, and, if such conditions are complied with, the court may, if it thinks fit, discharge or rescind any such order or judgment."

That, in terms, does not refer to warrants under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, but I will come back in a moment to explain how it is suggested that it nevertheless applies. Sub-section (4) is directly concerned with these warrants:

A "Notwithstanding anything in s. 143 of the County Courts Act, 1888, or in s. 1 of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, every warrant for delivery of possession of, or to enter and give possession of, any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, shall remain in force for three months . . . or, in the case of a warrant under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, from the date of the issue of the warrant, and . . . for such further period or periods, if any, as the court shall from time to time, whether before or after the expiration of such three months, direct."

B To deal first with sub-s. (4), it seems to me plain enough that, notwithstanding the limits of time stated in the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, viz., that the warrant must be executed within a period not less than twenty-one nor more than thirty clear days from the date of the warrant, the warrant in the case of a rent-restricted house remains in operation for three months.

C What, however, happens to it during the three months if it is not, in fact, executed or—if it is permissible for the justices so to do—if the justices give some direction whereby it could not properly be executed? So far as I can see, though the matter is not one on which it is necessary for me to express a final view, the answer to that question appears to be provided by sub-s. (2). Counsel for the landlord observes, and I think counsel for Miss Allen agrees,

D that the issue of a warrant of this nature is not merely an administrative act comparable to the issue of a warrant for the purpose of executing some earlier judgment; it is in itself both the judgment and its form of execution, and, therefore, combines both the judicial and the administrative functions of the justices who order its issue. If that is so, there is at any rate strong ground for suggesting that a warrant also can be comprehended within sub-s. (2) as being

E a judgment, so as thereby to confer on the justices powers at the time they make their order to direct that it should not, in fact, be executed so long as some conditions which they impose are fulfilled.

It is, no doubt, not uncommon in the case of houses falling within the scope of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, for applications to be made to the justices, and where the premises are also within the Rent Restrictions Acts, it seems necessary, and certainly sensible (if effect is given to what appears

F to be the intention of Parliament) that the justices, at the time they direct the issue of the warrant, should be entitled to state that during the three months of the warrant's efficacy it should not be executed so long as the tenant performs such terms and conditions as they may direct, but, unless it is extended by the court—and I assume that that must mean the court that orders its original

G issue—the warrant would appear to expire and come to an end, so far as any efficacy is concerned, at the end of three months. In the present case, there was a substantial gap from July, 1935, until the next order in 1939—three and a half years later, when the same petty sessional bench directed that the original order should be suspended for a further three months from Jan. 31, 1939. I assume that it was competent for them, if nothing had happened

H in the meantime, to make that direction so as to preserve the efficacy of the warrant for three months from Jan. 31, 1939, though prima facie it would appear to have expired on Oct. 16, 1935. As I have said, before the three months from Jan. 31, 1939, had come to an end, a further order was made directing the suspension of the original order sine die.

What is the effect of those directions, assuming that they were all effectively made and within the jurisdiction of the justices? The answer to that problem seems to me to be reasonably clear, in view of the contentions put before us by counsel. The warrant has, in my judgment, ceased to have any efficacy, ceased entirely to be enforceable, and it has so ceased to have efficacy as the result of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (4). In that Act the definition section, s. 31, defines "action" in this way: "'Action' includes any proceedings in a court of law . . ." Section 2 (4) provides:

"An action shall not be brought upon any judgment after the expiration of twelve years from the date on which the judgment became enforceable . . ."

According to counsel for Miss Allen, the judgment must have become enforceable at some date after the expiry of the original three months and before the second order of Jan. 31, 1939, was made, for it is apparent that that second order was made because of the failure on Mrs. Andrews' part to comply with the terms of the original order, so that, if it remained efficacious at all, the landlord would have been enabled forthwith to apply for enforcement. As at present advised, however, I think the warrant ceased to be enforceable before that date for Lougher v. Donovan (2) seems to be authority for saying that in the case of a warrant of this nature the statute operates from the date of the warrant itself. If that is so, of course, it ceased to be effective so much the earlier. In any event, the warrant, in my judgment, ceased to be capable of execution, the original order of 1935 ceased to have any efficacy, at the latest on some date appreciably before the date of Mrs. Andrews' death. If counsel for the landlord is right—and it is, of course, his case to contend that the warrant remained alive as long as possible—then it ceased to be efficacious some five years or more before Mrs. Andrews died.

What, then, is the result? The result seems to me to be that there was a period of time—possibly a year, possibly five years—during which Mrs. Andrews continued in possession of these premises, paying rent which was accepted by the landlord before she died. Her occupation, the payment by her of rent, and the acceptance of that rent by the landlord, can be referable to one of two causes. It can be referable to Mrs. Andrews' right to remain in occupation as what is called a statutory tenant. If, as the argument of counsel for Miss Allen has run, the statutory tenancy came to an end once and for all when, on July 16, 1935, the justices made their first order, then it seems to me that the ordinary rules of the common law must apply, and that the continued occupation, etc., can only be referable to a contractual relation. There is, in my judgment, no room here on the evidence for the view that she was a licensee.

On one ground or the other, therefore, it seems to me inevitable that Mrs. Andrews, when she died, was a tenant, statutory or contractual, and, in either case, once it is conceded that Miss Allen is a member of the family within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, Miss Allen must be entitled now to claim to be a tenant by virtue of that section. It was, of course, at one time thought that the definition section applied only where what one might call the predecessor was a statutory tenant, but it has been held in Moodie v. Hosegood (3) that that is not so. It matters not, therefore, for the purposes of this case whether Mrs. Andrews was a contractual or a statutory tenant at her death. For the reasons I have indicated, she must have been, I think, one or the other, and it follows necessarily that the appeal must succeed on that ground.

But the case has raised a point of great difficulty and argument of some nicety about the effect, for the purposes of applying this definition section, s. 12 (1) (g), of orders for possession, and a distinction has been drawn in the argument between what have been called final or absolute orders for possession and what have been called conditional orders for possession. In the circumstances of the case, out of respect to the arguments and in the hope, perhaps, of rendering some useful service to those county court judges whose duty it is to administer these Acts, I would like to make a few observations on the arguments.

It is not, however, necessary for me to express a conclusion on the really difficult point which has emerged from the argument, viz., what happens so far as a member of the family otherwise within s. 12 (1) (g) is concerned if his or her predecessor (to use again that word) should die during the time that a conditional order for possession is in effective operation with regard to the premises?

A If the order for possession is absolute, then American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little (1), to which I referred when reading the judge's judgment, indubitably applies, and in such case it has been held by this court that there is no room for the application in favour of the member of the family of the definition section. But SOMERVELL, L.J., expressly left open the question whether the same result would follow if the order for possession were conditional. In that case, it is important to note, the order which had been made was an order for possession to take effect on a future date, the point of the time lag being merely to give to the tenant an opportunity to remove himself and his belongings. In point of fact, the period was extended, but the case came on for hearing after the expiration of the extended period. The order was, however, always an order otherwise unqualified in terms; it was an order that the defendant must give up possession on the future date named. SOMERVELL, L.J., noted the learned judge's decision that the defendant was, within the words in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, a member of the tenant's family and could claim to remain in possession and continued ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1188):

"The learned judge said, and I agree with him, that the point is not free from difficulty . . . he referred, first, to Brown v. Draper (4), and cited the following passage of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1944] 1 All E.R. 248):

D ' . . . the only ways in which he [the tenant] can be deprived of the protection of the Acts are (a) by giving up possession, in which case no order for recovery of possession against him is required; or (b) by having an order for recovery of possession made against him . . . ' Those words, read literally, might be taken to indicate that the order for possession in itself deprived him of the protection of the Act. On the other hand, the learned county court judge referred to a statement of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Keeves v. Dean, Nunn v. Pellegrini (5) where the learned lord justice said ([1924] 1 K.B. 694): ' I take it that he [the tenant] has a right as against all the world to remain in possession until he is turned out by an order of the court . . . ' The difference between the literal meaning of those statements of the law becomes apparent in the present case. I agree with the learned judge in that I do not think LORD GREENE, M.R., had in mind the point which we have to consider here, viz.: What is the position of a statutory tenant (I am not begging the question by using the word 'tenant' but it is useful to use it) between the time when the order for possession is made and the time when it falls to be executed having regard to a suspension under s. 5 (2) ? "

G Section 5 (2) is a reference to that section of the Act of 1920 now replaced by s. 4 (2) of the Act of 1923. I next note that lower down the page the learned lord justice said (ibid.):

H "I agree with what was said by JENKINS, L.J., in the course of the argument, that the position of someone against whom an order for possession has been made and suspended at common law or under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920 is sui generis. The problem which we have to solve is not assisted by considering in what respect his position is the same quoad the landlords as it was before the order was made. Obviously it is fundamentally different in the respect, that, whereas before he was entitled to the protection of the Acts until successful proceedings were taken, he is now in the position of proceedings having been taken and an order for possession having been made. All that he has is a right to apply for a postponement under s. 5 (2)."

Finally, the learned lord justice said (ibid.):

"I am not deciding what the position would be in a case of this kind where a conditional order had been made against the deceased. It may be that the result would be the same; it may be that it would be different. There seems to me, at any rate, scope for argument . . ."

—an observation which experience has proved to be amply justified.

JENKINS, L.J., agreed, and he said (ibid., 1190):

"During the period intervening between the date of such an order and the date fixed for delivery of possession the statutory tenant has obviously certain rights and certain obligations. For instance, during that period, he would have to pay the equivalent of the rent. That is not to say, however, that he is still a statutory tenant for all purposes . . . Thus, in the present case, assuming in the defendant's favour that, notwithstanding the existence of the final order for possession, she could still become statutory tenant of the premises by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, it seems to me clear that the tenancy to which she would succeed could be no more than the limited interest remaining to run between the date of her father's death and the expiration of the date fixed for possession by the order [and that had passed when the case came before the court.] For these reasons, and those stated by my Lord, I agree that the appeal should be allowed."

BIRKETT, L.J., confined himself to stating his agreement with what had been said.

It is clear from those passages that the question is left open what is the effect of a conditional order, so long as it remains an efficacious order capable of being enforced on fulfilment or non-fulfilment of the condition, on what is called the right of succession under s. 12 (1) (g). What happens if the tenant dies when such an order remains in operation? As I have already indicated, it is not necessary to determine that question in this case. It has, however, been strenuously argued by counsel for Miss Allen that there is in this respect a real and fundamental distinction between an absolute order, i.e., an order which is to take effect on some fixed date without qualification, and a conditional order or what has been called a suspended order, i.e., an order which will not take effect at all so long as certain things are done, for in the latter case it is contended that the true object of the court in making the order was to avoid the very thing which an order for possession would achieve. It is the purpose of the court to say: "So long as you now faithfully comply with this, that or the other obligation, we will not evict you." It is said that, the intention lying behind the two classes of order being different, their results will be different.

As it is not necessary to decide the question, I do not propose to do so, but I venture to indicate some difficulties in the way of what may appear at first sight, perhaps, to be the common-sense view of the so-called conditional form of order when the present problem arises (as it is apt to do though it may not frequently do so) on the death of the tenant leaving somebody who claims the benefit of the definition section. I begin by observing that, though the original order be absolute, nevertheless, as I read s. 4 (2) of the Act of 1923, it may not only be discharged on application, but it may, in effect, be converted thereafter into a conditional order, for the language at the end of the subsection seems to contemplate that possibility. But if in a particular case an order is made and suspended so long as the rent is punctually paid and X shillings a week are paid off arrears and, perhaps, off taxed costs as well, the right of the tenant to remain in possession may be said not to be (at least exclusively) referable to the Rent Restrictions Acts, because the terms on which occupation is retained are not merely the terms in the original contract, but are the terms in the contract plus the further terms imposed by the court. The truer view may be that the tenant's continued occupation is referable to the permission granted by the order, or, alternatively, to the combined operation of the order and the Act.

A But there is a further technical difficulty which counsel for Miss Allen indicated, and it is this. The phrase "statutory tenant" is not one which is defined in the Acts, but is a phrase which long usage has made convenient for describing the person who is entitled to remain in occupation by virtue of the Acts. That right is specified in s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1920:

B "A tenant who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies shall, so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy . . ."

C Putting it interrogatively, is a tenant whose right to remain in possession is dependent on compliance with the terms of an order of the court which may go beyond, and in the case I have supposed would go beyond, the terms of the original contract, within that sub-section? The right to remain in possession provided that the terms of s. 15 (1) are otherwise complied with depends on what was s. 5 of the Act of 1920, now re-enacted in s. 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1933. It is so well known that I do not take time to read it, except to observe that it begins:

D "No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies . . . shall be made or given unless . . ."

E In a case of a person against whom a so-called conditional order for possession has been made, the argument is that s. 5 is no longer really applicable. So long as the tenant satisfies the conditions of the order, he is entitled to remain by virtue of the order. If he does not satisfy the conditions, the order already made operates. No further order is required. Therefore, either the making of the order has already determined the statutory tenancy, or he is not a statutory tenant because no further order for dispossession is required.

F Finally, there is this problem. Section 12 (1) (g) is, as I have said many times, a definition section; it does not give any independent right to the relative, but it provides that a relative complying with the conditions of the paragraph shall be deemed to be a tenant within the meaning of s. 15. Again, I put the argument of counsel for Miss Allen interrogatively: Can it be said that a relative is a tenant within s. 15 if it has to be conceded—though I am aware that in spite of the observation of JENKINS, L.J., in the American Laundry case (1) it may not be conceded—that the right of the relative must be limited to the right which the predecessor had, or, in other words, that the relative cannot claim any better right to remain in possession than was possessed by the person he or she has succeeded? If the person he or she succeeded was bound as a condition of retaining occupation to pay something more than the rent, then should not the relative be similarly bound? But is the relative so bound? He or she is not a party to the order, and it does not appear clear to me that it is enforceable against him or her, and if it is, is he or she then a "tenant" within s. 15?

H These arguments are formidable, but I give no answer to them, because it is unnecessary in this case so to do. I have referred to them for another reason. Before stating it, I would like to say that I start, I confess, with some reluctance to give support to fine distinctions which may be of vital importance to many people but which depend on the difference between what may be on its true construction, on the one hand, an absolute order, and, on the other, a conditional order. Orders are sometimes made by county court judges in somewhat informal terms, and it is possible to imagine long arguments on the question whether a particular order, a little peculiar in its terms, was in truth absolute or conditional.

I was fittingly reminded by counsel for Miss Allen of an observation of my own in a case not long ago before this court, Tideway Investment & Property Holdings, Ltd. v. Wellwood (6). That was a very peculiar case, as appears from the form of the judgment which HARMAN, J., had given. His order was ([1952] 2 All E.R. 524):

"This court doth order that upon the execution by the [tenant] of an agreement in terms to be agreed between the parties or in the alternative to be settled by the judge within twenty-one days of the date when its terms are agreed or settled by the judge and upon the deposit and payment [of certain sums of money,] this court doth not think fit to make an order for possession but in default of such execution deposit and payment it is ordered that the [landlords] do recover . . . possession . . ."

I said (ibid.):

"In cases of this kind I also think it is more desirable, as a rule, to make an order for possession and suspend it on certain terms than to follow the converse, which has been adopted in this case . . ."

I had referred to what MORTON, L.J., said in Bell London & Provincial Properties, Ltd. v. Reuben (7), which attained some notability because the whole case turned on whether the tenant was justified in keeping a dog. MORTON, L.J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 551):

"I think that, if I had been trying the case, I might have inserted some safeguard for the assistance of the landlords. I have not thought out the exact form of words, but I might have ordered that possession should be given, the order not taking effect so long as the defendant satisfied the landlords, perhaps monthly or every two months, by some medical certificate, that her health still required the presence of the dog."

It is, I think, plain that neither MORTON, L.J., nor I had this very difficult and intricate point arising from s. 12 (1) (g) in mind. Having it in mind, and having heard the arguments, and having stated the sort of difficulties which arise, it seems to me that that form of order, viz., an order for possession suspended so long as certain conditions are complied with, is not by any means necessarily in all cases the most satisfactory form of order to make. I think it may well be, if the intended suspension is likely to be short, that such a form of order is satisfactory and saves further application. It would, I imagine, be made in expectation that the conditions would be complied with so that in due course the order would naturally run off or, perhaps, subsequently be discharged. But I cannot think that an order for possession suspended indefinitely, as was done in this case, or an order for possession which is likely to be in suspense for a very long period of time, is by any means necessarily a satisfactory or, as I venture to think, the best form of order, particularly if, as may be the case, the circumstances indicate at least the possibility of a claim to what I will call succession being made under s. 12 (1) (g). I confess I should have thought that in those cases, and, perhaps, in many others, there is much to be said for a form of order to the effect that the defendant should be required to undertake or agree (for I do not suggest save, perhaps, in exceptional cases that the defendant should be exposed to the penal consequences of an undertaking to the court) to pay the rent and arrears, or perform whatever other conditions the court may think proper; that that undertaking or agreement should be recited in the order; that the court should then make no order for possession, but should give liberty to apply for an order for possession on breach or non-fulfilment of the conditions. Then, if an order is made at all, it is likely to be an absolute order operating at once or certainly, and nobody is left in doubt as to its effect. By that form of order this extremely difficult problem would be avoided. I hope that possibly the judges who have the difficult task of administering this legislation may think it a more convenient course in many cases to adopt that form of order, which at any rate is to me familiar and to some extent hallowed by its use in comparable form in the Chancery Division, in which I was fortunate to be brought up.

A I have said so much out of respect for the arguments, but I have not decided, and have carefully avoided deciding, a point which does not here arise. In particular, I do not want, in what I have said, to create doubts where the obvious intention has been to keep alive the existing statutory tenant's rights so long as the conditions imposed are complied with. I only add that whatever be the answer to these difficulties, it is far from clear to me that even if a statutory tenancy is to be treated as terminated by the making of any order for possession, it would not properly revive when the order ceased to be effective, or that the statutory tenancy is not capable of co-existing with the operation of the order. In the latter case it seems to me that obscurities of construction arise and doubts as to the precise obligations of the person who may succeed to the tenancy, all of which are avoided if the form of order be that which seems to me in appropriate cases to be preferable.

C With those observations, however, I return whence I came, to state, on the short point, that Mrs. Andrews must either have been a statutory tenant or a contractual tenant, that, in my judgment, this appeal ought to be allowed, and that the order for possession against Miss Allen discharged.

D BIRKETT, L.J. (having stated the facts): I would like to express my very strong agreement with what SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said in his judgment about the form of the order. In this case the judge decided that the order made in 1935 was a final order. The expressions that are used are:

E "I am satisfied that the effect of the issue by the justices in 1935 of a warrant for possession was to grant to the then landlord a final order for possession, the execution of the warrant being suspended, ultimately sine die. I am satisfied that the warrant could have been revived by the court under s. 5 (4) of the Act of 1920, but that the Limitation Act, 1939, made it impossible for such revival."

F He then refers to American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little (1), and, following the observations of SOMERVELL, L.J., in that case about the effect of the final order, as he described it, he came to the conclusion in this case which he recorded and against which appeal is made.

G The argument that was addressed to us, at some length necessarily, was that the learned judge was wrong about that, that this was not a final order, and the consequences spoken of by SOMERVELL, L.J., did not, therefore, follow, but that this was plainly a conditional order. The difficulty about that is that the order recites: "Order for possession to be given; warrant to be suspended." It is said on the one side: "Well, however one frames it, one begins by saying that there is an order for possession."

In American Economic Laundry, Ltd. v. Little (1) SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1189):

H "Counsel for the landlords referred to the fact that under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920 orders for possession may take either of two forms. There may be, as here, an absolute order the execution of which is suspended, or there may be a conditional order, that is to say, the order for possession does not become operative so long as certain conditions are fulfilled—it may be payment of rent or abatement of a nuisance . . . I am not deciding what the position would be in a case of this kind where a conditional order has been made against the deceased. It may be that the result would be the same; it may be that it would be different. There seems to me, at any rate, scope for argument, which would require serious consideration, that a different result would be arrived at, and, therefore, it is better to leave it to be decided if and when it arises."

If the order went in the form which my Lord suggested in his judgment, that kind of situation would not arise, and I observe that the practice has been to use words like "absolute", "final", "conditional", "suspensory". They lead to the kind of discussions which have occupied very much time in this appeal. For example, it is said that the true effect of an absolute order is to say: "We make an order for possession", and then the tenancy comes to an end, but, if the order may be properly termed a conditional order, then, in truth, there is no ending of the tenancy, and what the court is seeking to say, though for administrative purposes it may use this particular form of words, is: "We have power to determine this tenancy on the facts proved before us, but we do not choose to do so; we leave the tenancy untouched, and we say so long as you fulfil these conditions about payment of rent or whatever it may be, so long will the tenancy continue, but if you do not, then in truth we shall make an order for possession."

I observe that in MEGARRY ON THE RENT ACTS, 7th ed., the learned author adopts that attitude towards the practice which has grown up with regard to absolute, conditional, final and suspensory orders. He says at p. 230:

"In considering the effect of an order for possession made under these provisions, a distinction must be made between the two forms of order which the court can make, namely, an absolute order for possession which is suspended in its operation, and a conditional order for possession (sometimes somewhat misleadingly called a 'suspensory order'). Notwithstanding the suspension, an absolute order forthwith determines the statutory tenancy, so that although the former tenant is in possession during the period of suspension on terms which in general are identical with those of his former statutory tenancy, his position is sui generis, in some ways resembling that of a licensee by indulgence of the court. A conditional order, on the other hand, leaves the statutory tenancy still in being, though shadowed by a Damoclean sword."

He cites in support of that Merrick v. Lenihan (8) and also Lee Haven Estates, Ltd. v. Daley (9).

It is plain that the use of this term "conditional order" gives rise, as it has given rise in this case, to many speculations and to many doubts which would be resolved entirely if the form of order suggested by my Lord were in common use, that is to say: "We make no order; we lay down certain conditions about the payment of the rent; and we give the landlord power to come and say: 'Those conditions about the payment of the rent have not been fulfilled, I now ask you to make an order' ". I should have imagined that a great deal of ambiguity might be avoided if that method were adopted.

It is one of the remarkable facts in the case that this order of 1935, at any rate some time in 1947 at the latest, could not possibly be enforced. Argument again arose on that matter. Is the order a nullity now? It was suggested by counsel for the landlord that it could be used in some way as a shield, but for my own part I do not quite see the efficacy of the shield. Down to 1952, so far as the evidence went, during a period of probably five years before Mrs. Andrews died, Mrs. Andrews was in possession, and she was paying the rent all that time. No question about the rent had been raised since 1939. The landlord, who became the landlord in 1943, had been accepting rent down to 1952. I should have thought, therefore, that the conclusion was irresistible that, if there was not here a statutory tenancy, there was certainly a contractual tenancy. In order to defeat this claim by the landlord, Miss Allen must claim to come within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. So far as the technical side of the matter is concerned, it is not in issue, and not in question, that she is a member of the family. She has been residing there for well over thirty years, and she says: "I am within the definition in s. 12 (1) (g), and there was here either a statutory tenancy which enables me to continue in occupation, or there was a contractual tenancy; I do not mind which it is". In my view, therefore, this appeal succeeds.

A ROMER, L.J.: I agree that the appeal must be allowed. After the judgments which have been delivered, I have very little to add. The ratio decidendi of the learned judge's decision appears from the following sentence in his judgment:

B "I am satisfied that the effect of the issue by the justices in 1935 of a warrant for possession was to grant to the then landlord a final order for possession, the execution of the warrant being suspended, ultimately sine die."

C On that view he decided the case. But the point was not presented to him, as it has been presented to us, that, if that view be right, the inevitable result, having regard to the operation of the Limitation Act, 1939, and to the payment and acceptance of rent, was to constitute Mrs. Annie Andrews a contractual tenant prior to and at the time of her death. If, on the other hand, the learned judge was wrong in the view that he took, then, for the reasons which have been stated by my Lord, it would follow that Mrs. Andrews was a statutory tenant at the time when she died. On either view Miss Allen would succeed in this appeal.

D That being so, I propose not to express any concluded view either on the question whether the order of 1935 operated as a final or as a conditional order for possession, or on the question as to what rights Miss Allen would have had, if the order was a conditional order, to succeed her aunt if Mrs. Andrews had died while the order was still in operation. It seems to me that each of these questions gives rise to difficulties which have been stated in the arguments before us, and which have been indicated in the judgments of my brothers.

E I express no definite view on either of them, but I certainly agree that justices should not make orders for possession, and then suspend their operation for what may be a considerable period of time. So to do leads to trouble. It has led to trouble in this case.

F I entirely agree, with respect, to the form of the order which my Lord has indicated as a desirable form to adopt, only premising that in using the word "undertaking" I apprehend that my Lord meant no more than to place on record an agreement by the tenant and not an undertaking in the technical sense of the word, a breach of which might lead to penal consequences. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

G SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I agree with what ROMER, L.J., has said about the use I made of the word "undertaking".

Appeal allowed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

TURNER v. JACARANDA CLUBS, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Streatfeild, J.), June 22, 1953.]

County Court—Costs—Action for breach of contract transferred to High Court—Recovery by plaintiff of less than £100—Discretion to award costs on High Court scale—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 47 (1) (b) (i).

The plaintiff brought an action, in which he claimed damages for wrongful dismissal, in the county court, limiting his claim to £200. The defendants then exercised their right under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 44, to have the case transferred to the High Court where the plaintiff recovered £87. On an application by the defendants that s. 47 (1) (b) (i) of the Act, applied, and, therefore, the plaintiff was only entitled to costs on the county court scale,

HELD: section 47 (1) (b) (i) did not apply as the action had been commenced in the county court and not in the High Court, although it had subsequently been transferred to the High Court, and, therefore, the question of costs was governed by s. 73 of the Act which gave the court a complete discretion.

Pellas v. Breslauer (1871) (L.R. 6 Q.B. 438), not applied.

APPLICATION by defendants as to costs.

F. Whitworth for the defendants.

Bloomfield for the plaintiff.

STREATFEILD, J.: The question of costs in this action of contract raises an interesting point. After I had given judgment for the plaintiff for £87, counsel for the defendants submitted that this was a case within s. 47 of the County Courts Act, 1934, being an action commenced in the High Court which might have been brought in the county court, and, therefore, the usual consequences should flow under the Act, the plaintiff having recovered less than £100. There is, of course, under sub-s. (3) a discretion to the court to award High Court costs if, in the opinion of the court, there was sufficient reason to bring the action in the High Court.

In fact this action was not commenced in the High Court; it was commenced in the county court. It was then an action in which, by abandoning a slight excess, the plaintiff confined his claim to £200, the extended jurisdiction of the county court, and, under s. 44 of the Act of 1934, the defendants exercised their right of having the case transferred to the High Court. Counsel for the defendants submitted that, although commenced in the county court and then transferred in those circumstances to the High Court, it, nevertheless, was an action to which s. 47 applied, and he quoted as his authority for that proposition Pellas v. Breslauer (1), in which the corresponding provision of the County Courts Act, 1867, was considered. The Court of Queen's Bench held that it applied to an action which had been removed from the county court to the High Court by way of certiorari. I think that counsel for the defendants was misled by a note in the County Court Practice, 1953, p. 55, in which it is stated:

"The section [that is, the present s. 47] applies . . . to an action . . . which has been removed from the county court by certiorari."

In HALSBURY'S STATUTES, 2nd ed., vol. 5, p. 43, it is stated:

"This section applies to an action brought in the High Court . . . or which has been removed from the county court by certiorari (Pellas v. Breslauer (1871), L.R. 6 Q.B. 438, at p. 440; 34 Digest 537, 115) . . ."

A With the greatest possible respect for the learned editors of both those valuable works, I am of opinion that their notes are wrong, for the reason that the wording of the Act of 1867 is quite different from that of the Act of 1934 or any of the intermediate County Courts Acts. In Pellas v. Breslauer (1) the words of s. 5 of the Act of 1867 to be construed were:

"if in any action commenced after the passing of this Act in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record the plaintiff shall recover a sum not exceeding £20 . . ."

B It was there ruled by the Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of BLACKBURN and HANNEN, JJ., that the words "commenced after the passing of this Act" must be regarded as being in parenthesis and referring only to the time at which the action had commenced. In effect, HANNEN, J., put it in this way (L.R. 6 Q.B. 440):

C "It is only necessary to read the words, 'commenced after the passing of this Act,' as if in a parenthesis, and the section then applies to all actions in the superior courts, however they may have got there, whether originally commenced there or brought there by certiorari;"

D Therefore, the enactment applied to all actions in any of the superior courts, the only saving being that they must have been commenced after the passing of that Act.

The County Courts Act, 1888, was quite different. That Act, as it originally appeared, in s. 116, read as follows:

E "With respect to any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court, the following provisions shall apply . . ."

That Act was amended, and by the County Courts Act, 1919, s. 11, and the Administration of Justice Act, 1925, s. 20, the new s. 116 of the Act of 1888 was made to read: "Where an action is brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court . . ."

F Those are the intermediate Acts, and then we come to the present Act of 1934, where the words of s. 47 (1) are: "Where an action is commenced in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court . . .", then certain consequences follow. It seems to me impossible to put the same construction on those words as the court did on the different words in Pellas v. Breslauer (1). If I were to treat the word "commenced" in the way in which it was treated in that case, I should not only be omitting the words "commenced in the High Court", but I should also be omitting the words "which could have been commenced in a county court."

G Therefore, it seems to me quite clear, on the construction of the Act of 1934 as well as on that of its predecessors since the Act of 1867, that the sub-section applies to actions which have been commenced in the High Court but could have been commenced in the county court.

H The present action was commenced in the county court even though it was transferred to the High Court in the way which has been described. For those reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that s. 47 does not apply and that the jurisdiction of this court over the question of costs is governed by s. 73 of the County Courts Act, 1934, which gives the court a complete discretion. With regard to the exercise of the discretion, in the circumstances of this case it seems to me that this is a case where the court ought to exercise its discretion in favour of the plaintiff. I should say that on the merits of the case alone, but, in my opinion, it ill fits the defendants, who had the action transferred to the High Court to say that it was really all along a county court action and ought not to have been brought in the High Court. It was the defendants, although they were exercising a statutory right, who chose the particular tribunal, and I think that they must pay for that luxury. Even under s. 47, if, in my judgment, it had applied, I still would have been prepared to make the order that there were sufficient reasons for bringing the action in the High Court.

Order for plaintiff's costs to be on High Court scale.

OZZARD-LOW v. OZZARD-LOW AND WONHAM.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Davies, J.), June 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, 1953.]

Document—Admissibility in evidence—Evidence of person beyond the seas—“Not reasonably practicable to secure attendance”—Attendance at trial—Discretion of judge sitting without jury to admit evidence—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1 (1), proviso.

On Oct. 28, 1951, the wife left Burma, where the parties were living, and returned alone to England. On Mar. 24, 1952, the husband wrote to her informing her of his intention to institute against her proceedings for divorce on the ground of her adultery. On Apr. 11, 1952, he caused sworn statements to be taken in Burmese from three Burmese servants. The husband returned to England, and on July 11, 1952, he filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery. During the hearing of the suit the husband tendered the three statements as evidence under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), but it was objected by the wife that, although the witnesses were beyond the seas, the husband had taken no steps to secure their attendance at any time during the suit to give evidence before an examiner or on commission, and, therefore, he had failed to show that it was “not reasonably practicable to secure [their] attendance” within the meaning of the proviso to s. 1 (1). Further, she contended that the court had a discretionary power to refuse to admit the statements.

HELD: (i) “attendance” in the proviso did not mean attendance to give evidence at any time during the suit, as, for instance, before an examiner or commissioner the words of the proviso imposed on the court the duty of deciding whether at the moment when the statement was tendered in evidence the maker of the statement “is beyond the seas and it is not reasonably practicable to secure his attendance”; in the present case the conditions contained in the proviso were fulfilled, and, therefore, the documents were admissible in evidence.

(ii) if the conditions laid down by the proviso were satisfied, the documents were admissible and a judge sitting without a jury had no discretionary power to reject them.

PETITION by husband for dissolution of marriage on ground of adultery.

The parties were married on May 28, 1934, and there were two children of the marriage. On Oct. 28, 1951, the parties separated, the wife leaving the husband in Burma, where they were living, and returning to England. On Mar. 24, 1952, the husband wrote to the wife informing her of his intention to institute proceedings for divorce against her on the ground of adultery.

- A On Apr. 11, 1952, he went to a Burmese solicitor who took statements in Burmese from two Burmese motor car drivers and a Burmese night watchman. These statements were translated into English and taken to another firm of solicitors and translated back into Burmese for purposes of verification. They were then sworn and certified at the British consulate. The husband returned to England, and on July 11, 1952, he filed a petition for divorce, dated
- B July 9, 1952, in which he alleged that the wife had committed adultery with the co-respondent in Burma on various occasions in April, May and June, 1951. The wife and the co-respondent filed answers denying the adultery, and the wife filed a petition dated Oct. 24, 1952, for dissolution of the marriage on the grounds that her husband had committed sodomy on her and had been cruel to her. The petitions were consolidated and during the
- C hearing of the husband's suit his counsel tendered the three statements in evidence in support of the allegation of adultery under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1). DAVIES, J., ruled that these statements were admissible, but, in his judgment at the conclusion of the hearing, he stated that, in so far as there was any disagreement between those statements and the other evidence, he refused to place any reliance on them. He dismissed the husband's petition
- D and dismissed the co-respondent from the suit, and he also dismissed the wife's petition. This report deals with the ruling as to the admissibility of the statements.

Beufus, Q.C., and Fairweather for the husband.

Temple, Q.C., and H. S. Law for the wife.

Melford Stevenson, Q.C., and Scarman for the co-respondent.

- E DAVIES, J.: In support of his case the husband seeks to put in evidence three affidavits by Burmese servants, a night watchman and two drivers. He has told me that these affidavits were sworn for the express purpose of tendering them in evidence under the Evidence Act, 1938, on the hearing of the petition for dissolution of marriage which he was then minded to commence against
- F his wife. He was, apparently, told by his legal advisers in Burma that the statements would be admissible. The affidavits, at which I have not yet looked, are now tendered in evidence by counsel for the husband.

- It is admitted by counsel that the husband has at no time made any attempt to bring any one of these three Burmese to this country. The husband took the view that on the ground of expense it was not reasonably practicable to
- G bring them here to give evidence. It is also clear that at no time has any application been made in this suit on behalf of the husband for an order that the evidence of these men should be taken before an examiner or by whatever is the procedure appropriate in Burma at the present time. With some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that the husband's submission that it is not reasonably practicable to secure the attendance of these witnesses
- H in this court is right. Therefore, at first sight, as the witnesses are admittedly beyond the seas, the proviso to s. 1 (1) of the Evidence Act, 1938, applies and the condition that the maker of the statement shall be called as a witness need not be satisfied.

It is, however, argued by counsel for the wife and counsel for the co-respondent that that does not conclude the matter. "Attendance", it is argued, means not only attendance in court at the hearing, but also attendance as a witness at any time in the suit, and, if it is at any time reasonably practicable to secure the attendance of a witness before an examiner or on a commission or by any other means to give oral evidence and subject himself to cross-examination, and that is not done, then, it is said, the person who is seeking to tender the written statement of the witness fails to show that "it is not reasonably practicable to secure his attendance" within the meaning of the proviso. I do not think that that is the correct interpretation of the section. It is true that the words of s. 1 (1) (ii)—"if the maker of the statement is called as a witness in the proceedings"—would plainly be satisfied if the witness had given evidence before an examiner, but, in my judgment, the words of the proviso impose on the court the duty of deciding whether at the moment when the statement is tendered in evidence the maker is beyond the seas and it is not reasonably practicable to secure his attendance. The use of the present tense seems to me to indicate this conclusion with reasonable clearness. In my opinion, therefore, the proviso is satisfied in the present case, and s. 1 (1) (ii) does not apply.

It is further argued by counsel for the wife that, even so, I have a discretion to reject these statements on the grounds, (i) that their contents are likely to be controversial, and (ii) that the husband ought to have taken other and more satisfactory steps to obtain the evidence of these witnesses. That argument is based on a decision of SIMONDS, J., in Infields, Ltd. v. Rosen (1), where he said ([1939] 1 All E.R. 121):

"I will assume, for the purpose of my ruling upon this matter, that Mrs. Emma Veith [a person, living in Germany, whose statement was tendered in evidence] is beyond the seas and that it is not reasonably practicable to secure her attendance . . . This is a statement which appears to me to have been made expressly for the purpose of its being given in evidence in this suit. Although, according to the language of the Act, that is within its purview, I have no doubt that that is the class of document to which the section is not primarily intended to apply, and the court must be exceedingly careful in allowing such a document to be used as evidence. Further, I have to bear this in mind. This is a statement in a document made by a lady who is in Germany and available for examination and cross-examination so far as that is permissible under letters of request. The party seeking to adduce that document in evidence did not so inform the other party to the suit . . . Then I have also to bear in mind the circumstance that this is a case in which there is an acute controversy of fact . . . In these circumstances, I shall, in the exercise of my discretion, decline to allow this declaration to be adduced in evidence in this case."

With the utmost respect and with natural hesitation, I feel that I am unable to follow that decision. It seems to me to be plain that, if the conditions laid down by the statute are satisfied, the document is admissible and a judge sitting alone has no discretionary power to reject it. That view is, in my judgment, fortified by a consideration of s. 1 (5) of the Act which provides that:

" . . . where the proceedings are with a jury, the court may in its discretion reject the statement notwithstanding that the requirements of this section are satisfied with respect thereto, if for any reason it appears to it to be inexpedient in the interests of justice that the statement should be admitted."

If a discretionary power is expressly given in the case of a trial with a jury, it seems to follow necessarily that when a judge is sitting alone there is, if the requirements of the section are satisfied, no discretion and the document is admissible.

In my judgment, therefore, these documents are admissible, but, of course, in deciding that I am saying nothing as to what weight I shall give to them when I have read them. Section 2 (1) of the Act plainly directs the court to exercise caution in regard to statements such as these, and the fact that the husband or his legal advisers could have obtained an order—as I imagine they certainly could have done—for the examination of these Burmese witnesses may well be a factor which should weigh heavily when I am considering what, if any, importance should be attached to these statements.

Documents ruled to be admissible.

KEMP v. KEMP.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.), June 10, 11, 1953.]

Divorce—Desertion—Constructive desertion—Association by husband with woman not resulting in adultery—Revival of condoned adultery.

Justices—Husband and wife—Majority decision—Need of dissenting justice to give reasons.

The parties were married in 1945. In 1949 the husband committed adultery, but the wife forgave him and they continued to live together as man and wife. Towards the end of 1952 the husband began to stay out late at night, coming home two or three times a week between 3 a.m. and 8 a.m. The husband knew that this conduct would arouse the wife's suspicions, but the only explanation that he gave at first was that he had been out with friends. Later, he said that there was a woman, but that there was nothing wrong in the association, and that she, the woman, was going away after Christmas. The wife went, with the husband's consent, to spend Christmas with relatives and did not return. On a summons by the wife alleging that the husband had deserted her,

HELD: although the husband's present association with the other woman was not found to have been adulterous, it was sufficient in law to revive the condoned adultery in 1949, and was serious enough to justify the wife in withdrawing from cohabitation and to found a charge of desertion.

Observations of SIR J. P. WILDE in Winscom v. Winscom & Plowden (1864) (3 Sw. & Tr. 382), applied.

Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: I do not think that, even if it is made clear at the hearing or is expressly stated at the time when the finding is made, that the decision of justices in a case relating to a matrimonial dispute is not unanimous, it entitles the parties to demand that the dissentient justice or justices shall furnish a written statement of the reasons for the dissent, and I certainly deprecate encouraging the establishment of any such practice.

APPEAL by the wife against the dismissal on Jan. 9, 1953, by the Leeds city justices of her summons alleging that her husband had deserted her.

The parties were married in 1945 and there was one child of the marriage. In 1949 the husband had committed adultery, but the wife forgave him and they continued to live together as man and wife. It was the custom for the husband to hand his weekly wages to the wife and to receive back a certain sum as pocket money. On Dec. 24, 1952, the wife went, as previously arranged with the husband, to spend Christmas with her relatives in Nottingham. On the same day she took out summonses under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, alleging that her husband had deserted her and had wilfully neglected to provide her with reasonable maintenance. At the hearing before the justices the wife stated that during the latter part of 1952 the husband had been keeping very late hours, coming home several times a week between 3 a.m. and 8 a.m., and refusing to give any explanation other than that he had been staying with friends; that she was suspicious and was not satisfied with his refusal to explain his conduct, and when she had taxed him with having been seen walking arm in arm in Leeds with another woman he had said there was "nothing in it" and had continued his habit of staying out "practically all night"; that the husband had kept her short of money; that on Dec. 23, 1952, the husband came in at 11.30 p.m. saying that he had been at his mother's, but she found that that was not true, and, having challenged him about it, asked him if he was going to mend his ways, to which he had replied "After Christmas" and had added that the other woman was going away after Christmas and that there was nothing wrong in the association; that she had replied that if that was all the satisfaction she was going to get she would not come back after Christmas; and that on Dec. 24, she went, as agreed with her husband, to spend Christmas with her relatives in Nottingham and had not returned home. The husband admitted in evidence that he had committed adultery in 1949 and that his wife had forgiven him, and that he knew that when he began to stay out late at night his wife would be suspicious. He also stated that his wife had said that she wanted to be near her relatives in Nottingham, but that he did not want to go there as he was settled in Leeds, and that, although he had been out with another woman, he had not committed adultery. He then said:

"The address I have been at is . . . and the name is [M.] . . . I used to go to dances and then go to the house for supper. Mr. and Mrs. [M.] . . . and her daughter live at the house. Mr. and Mrs. [M.] . . . used to go to bed. I used to sleep on the couch. I do want to live with my wife and I will mend my ways. The name of the other woman is Mrs. [B.] . . . and she is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. [M.] . . . She has not left Leeds. I did say that after Christmas I would not stay out late any more. The woman is a married woman and I think she is separated. She is living apart from her husband . . . We [he and his wife] could go out together in Leeds. The woman won't be here in Leeds for long. I did tell my wife the woman was leaving Leeds".

He denied that he had told his wife that he would come in at a proper time when the woman had left Leeds.

The justices, by a majority of two to one, dismissed the summons for desertion and stood over the summons for wilful neglect to maintain pending the wife's appeal against the dismissal of the first summons.

Baskerville for the wife.

The husband did not appear.

A LORD MERRIMAN, P.: It appears that of the three justices sitting, two were in favour of dismissing the summons and one was of the contrary opinion. In other words, the decision was by a majority, and it is evident that when the question arose of stating the reasons for the decision, the wife's solicitors were anxious to obtain the statement of the reasons for the dissenting justice's view. The clerk was reluctant to call on the dissenting justice, who happened to be the chairman, to give, as it were, a separate judgment, and attention was called to an observation I am reported as having made in England v. England (1) ([1953] P. 19): "The justices found by a majority (a fact which is irrelevant, in my opinion, if it ought to have been disclosed at all) . . ." My recollection is that our attention had been called to some observations by the Lord Chief Justice, when, on a Case Stated in some criminal matter, it was recorded that the decision was that of a majority and he had said that he thought that ought not to be mentioned. The observation does not appear in any of the regular reports, and probably it was a remark which was quoted in some newspaper at or about the time we gave our judgment in England v. England (1). However that may be with regard to a Case Stated in some criminal matter, I see no reason why, in some way or another, it should not be indicated in cases relating to matrimonial disputes that the decision was not unanimous. But I do not think that, if that is made clear during the hearing or when the finding is announced, it entitles parties to demand that the dissentient justice or justices shall furnish a written statement of their reasons for the dissent, and I certainly deprecate encouraging the establishment of any such practice. I think we must approach this case on the basis of the reasons given by the majority as the reasons for the decision, albeit we know that they did not command the assent of one member of the court. I do not think it would be right for us to weigh up the two rival judgments and say we prefer the one to the other. What we have to decide is whether the reasons for the decision commend themselves to us.

E [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The majority of the justices find that on account of the husband's admission of adultery on a former occasion the wife had been suspicious of him. They say that, while the wife was silent on sex matters, the husband was sincere when he said: "She has not been a willing wife to me for years. If she will have more affection for me, I will mend my ways." That quotation, which they accept, assumes that his ways need mending, and the evidence to that effect was given, of course, in the context of the wife's allegation of this association with another woman, the details of which were first revealed in his cross-examination before the court —an association on which the wife founded her grievance. They go on to say that the wife's complaint of shortage of money was not justified, that she had tacitly admitted that he gave her his wages, and that she gave him money back. There follows a finding which requires careful consideration:

H "We can only reconcile this to the statement—and, indeed, admission—that he was staying out late several times a week, coming in between 3 a.m. and 8 a.m.—by the inference that the wife was not at all averse to his doing so, for it is inconceivable to us that the ordinary wife with such a grievance would continue to put the means into her husband's hands to enable him to carry on his nocturnal habits . . . The intention of the wife has been to coerce her husband against his own wishes, as she well knew, to leave Leeds and live nearer to her relatives in Nottingham.

We, therefore, find that there was no intention on the part of the husband to desert his wife. It was not reasonable for the wife to expect her husband to join her in a new matrimonial home at Nottingham, and he was entitled to refuse reconciliation on these grounds."

I pause there to observe that, in my opinion, they are adopting a wrong test. Let it be assumed that the wife would prefer to live in Nottingham near her people rather than in Leeds. To my mind, the real point is that a situation had arisen in which she might be thought to object justifiably to continuing in Leeds, wherever else they might live. Let it be assumed that adultery had not been committed (and it is not found to have been committed), but that an association of an improper character, of which the wife could complain, had been going on, right up to the moment when the wife left home on Dec. 24, with this woman who was still in Leeds at the time of the hearing. To my mind, the question is not whether the wife was entitled to lay down conditions that a resumption of cohabitation must be in Nottingham, but whether she was entitled to say: "I will not go on living with my husband in Leeds while this thing is going on". The justices then say:

"We are satisfied that the break in consortium as it existed during the last two or three months rests with the wife, and her husband's conduct was not such as to compel her to leave the house, nor was his intention to break off matrimonial relations."

In other words, the question of the husband's intention in this matter has been decided adversely to the wife, because they say that it is she who broke up the consortium. I think it right to point out that the next finding was made against the wife without its ever having been put to her at all, so far as I can see. They say:

"The wife had one object in view—the removal of the matrimonial home to Nottingham, which she realised her husband would not consent to. She has not only shown little affection for her husband, but, despite her complaints, has continued to supply him with the wherewithal to carry on his admittedly frequent nightly absences with a view to paving the way to these proceedings, and thereby either (i) securing the removal of the matrimonial home to Nottingham, or (ii) enabling her to obtain an order so that she could return to Nottingham alone and be maintained by her husband. She is therefore not entitled to an order."

I do not ignore that it is a strong thing to differ from any conclusion of justices who have seen and heard the witnesses, but, in my opinion, that inference, which lies at the root of their finding that there was no intention of the husband to desert his wife, is an inference which ought not to have been drawn on the evidence, and is, in my opinion, unjustifiable, the more so as it was never put to the wife. Let it be assumed that she would be glad to live at Nottingham rather than at Leeds; the question still remains whether or not she has ample grounds for wishing not to continue to live in Leeds, where she has been the victim of a fresh association. But I go further. The suggestion that she has deliberately provided the husband with the means to carry on this association (for that is the implication of what is said), in other words, that she has corruptly connived at the association by providing the means for him to carry it on, for the indirect motive of getting her way about a change in the matrimonial home, seems to me monstrous in the circumstances. I am not prepared to accept that inference as justified. It vitiates the whole conclusion that this husband had no intention to drive his wife away. He was carrying on a clandestine association, to which the wife had every right to object, having regard to the circumstances in which she had taken him back before, and I am not prepared to accept the conclusion, which the justices have founded on the suggestion that she was promoting this association, that this is a case in which it can be said that the husband had no intention to drive his wife away. I appreciate, of course, that her merely telling him, as she did, that if he did not behave better and keep better hours, and the like, she would leave him, does not of itself entitle her to complain of something which is not a just cause of complaint.

A But I think that this matter can be tested on authority. Here is a case in which admittedly, as recently as four years ago, an adulterous association with another woman had been condoned. Of course, that adultery could not possibly be the subject of a charge in a court of summary jurisdiction because of the statutory limitation, but I think that what has happened in this case in connection with the fresh association with Mrs. B. might very well be held, in any court in which the matter is open, to have revived the condoned adultery.

B In Winscom v. Winscom & Plowden (2) the headnote reads:

“Semble, condoned adultery may be revived, so as to found a sentence of dissolution, by subsequent misconduct and improprieties, short of, but tending to adultery”,

C though, in fact, the charge of adultery was found not to be established. It was assumed, though the matter was not subjected to investigation in that case, that the wife had committed adultery some five years before with a man who was not a party to this particular suit. The husband discovered that she was carrying on an association with a second man, but, after going into the question as fully as he could and taking the advice of a senior officer, he came to the conclusion that adultery had not been committed and took his wife back in respect of the second association, and it was with reference to

D that that SIR J. P. WILDE said (3 Sw. & Tr. 382):

E “The petitioner then made the co-respondent promise not to speak to his wife again, and resumed cohabitation with her. He continued from that time to cohabit with her, sleeping in the same bed for upwards of a month. I think it right to pause here, and remark, that if the petitioner had taken a different course, he might probably have entitled himself to relief from the court; for it is alleged that his wife had, in 1853, been guilty of adultery with a person named Clark, which he had condoned. We know nothing of the circumstances, and the fact is proved only by implication. But condonation would hardly have been an answer to a suit founded on that adultery in the face of these familiarities with Lieutenant Plowden, had he not condoned them also. It is not necessary to decide the point; but, as at present advised, I am of opinion that this latter conduct would have enured to revive the original guilt, if that had been made out to the satisfaction of the court.”

F

G It is important to note that that was not a case of resuming an association with the original adulterer; it was a fresh association of a familiar character, but not established as having included the commission of adultery.

H It is only necessary to say that that case has been followed, and, so far as I know, never doubted. It was recently commented on with approval in Tilley v. Tilley (3), and I need only read one short passage from the judgment of DENNING, L.J., with reference to resumption or continuance by the wife of an association with the man with whom she had committed adultery. He says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1125):

“The circumstantial details do not matter, but the continuing intimate association does matter. It is one thing to forgive a wife for past adultery when the association is over and done with. It is quite another to forgive her when the association is still continuing. There is little hope of any true reconciliation if a wife, while pleading with her husband to his face for forgiveness, still keeps seeing her lover behind his back. No man can be expected to condone his wife's adultery whilst that is going on. Even if the wife did not actually commit adultery during those three weeks (as to which I say nothing) the intimate association itself was a material fact. Such an association has been held sufficient to revive an antecedent condoned adultery: Winscom v. Winscom & Plowden (2); Ridgway v. Ridgway (4); Beard v. Beard (5); and to justify a husband in separating from his wife, Glenister v. Glenister (6)."

In my opinion, the majority of the justices below have completely failed to realise the grave significance of the association with Mrs. B., and when I say "grave" I am not suggesting, and must not be taken to be suggesting, that adultery was actually committed. In my opinion, that is not the point. The point is that a man whose previous adultery had been condoned was, to use the phrase used in the headnote in Winscom v. Winscom & Plowden (2), conducting another association with a married woman living separate from her husband "tending to adultery", and, if that sort of thing is sufficient in law to revive condoned adultery, surely it ought to be considered serious enough to justify the wife in withdrawing from cohabitation, and, until that state of things is brought to an end, to found a charge of desertion and to justify her in withdrawing from cohabitation for the purpose of entitling herself to maintenance. In other words, I think that, by finding that it is the wife who broke up the consortium and not the husband, and that, for indirect motives, she actually promoted the association in order that she might take advantage of it, the justices have misdirected themselves in coming to the conclusion that this is a case in which it can truly be said that the husband had no intention to desert his wife. I think that nothing is to be gained by sending the matter back for further investigation, and that we must do that which we are entitled to do, namely, to draw inferences which we think the court below ought to have drawn, and to say that this is a case in which desertion is proved and the wife is also entitled, perhaps even more clearly, to succeed on the charge of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.

GREGORY v. FEARN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.),
June 24, 1953.]

Estate Agent—Sunday observance—Contract to effect sale of land on commission entered into on Sunday—Validity—Sunday Observance Act, 1677 (c. 7), s. 1.

A Per curiam: an estate agent is not a “tradesman or other person” within the meaning of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 1, and, therefore, a contract entered into on a Sunday to employ an estate agent to effect the sale of land in consideration of the payment to him of a commission on the price obtained is not prohibited by that section.

Palmer v. Snow ([1900] 1 Q.B. 725), applied.

FOR THE SUNDAY OBSERVANCE ACT, 1677, s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 5, p. 509.

C Case referred to:

(1) Palmer v. Snow, [1900] 1 Q.B. 725; 69 L.J.Q.B. 356; 82 L.T. 199; 64 J.P. 342; 43 Digest 5, 5.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE CAPORN at Nottingham County Court, dated Apr. 24, 1953, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for commission.

D The plaintiff was an estate agent, and the defendant was the owner of certain property which he wished to sell. The defendant told the plaintiff that the property to be sold was not available for business purposes, and the sum of £1,000 was fixed as the purchase price. On Sunday, Apr. 20, 1952, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff undertook to effect the sale of the land and the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff

E “a commission of £100 when sold and the said property shall be deemed to be sold and the commission payable on the receipt of a deposit or on a purchase agreement being entered into by a purchaser.”

One Owen, who wished to use the land for business purposes entered into an agreement for the sale of the property, but paid no deposit. The plaintiff

F claimed against the defendant £100 as his commission due under the agreement of Apr. 20, 1952, and the learned county court judge dismissed the claim on the grounds, inter alia, (i) that the agreement of Apr. 20, 1952, having been made on a Sunday fell within the prohibition of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 1; and (ii) that Owen was induced by the misrepresentation of the plaintiff to enter into the purchase agreement, and that, therefore, the plaintiff

G could not rely on such an agreement for the recovery of his commission. The plaintiff appealed.

T. R. Heald for the plaintiff.

The defendant did not appear.

H SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The first point which is to be noticed is that Apr. 20, 1952, was a Sunday, and the learned judge in the court below concluded against the plaintiff on the ground, among others, that the agreement fell within the prohibition of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 1, as having involved the doing of business or work in his ordinary calling on the Lord's day by a tradesman, to wit, an estate agent. On the view I take, it is not strictly necessary to decide that point, but it seems to me, as at present advised, that counsel for the plaintiff is right when he says that an estate agent is not a tradesman within the contemplation of that section, even if the execution by him of a contract of this kind was the doing of business or work in his ordinary calling. At first sight, counsel's argument appeared to be difficult, because the formula in the Act is "noe tradesman artificer workman labourer or other person whatsoever", and assuming that an estate agent is not a tradesman, he would, prima facie, be within the formula "other person whatsoever". It has, however, long been established that the words "other person whatsoever" are to be construed eiusdem generis with those that precede them, so that for the defendant to succeed on this point, it must be shown that an estate agent is a tradesman or something sufficiently like a tradesman to be covered by the eiusdem generis rule. Palmer v. Snow (1), which has the added force of being a decision of CHANNELL, J., shows that one who carried on the profession of a barber was not a tradesman, since a barber (so it was there said) does not commonly buy or sell things. If that be the kind of criterion to be applied, it would appear to me to exclude an estate agent from the formula in the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 1, but, as I have said already, it is not strictly necessary to express a concluded view on that matter, since there is another ground on which the learned judge decided against the plaintiff, and against that part of the decision, as it seems to me, counsel for the plaintiff battles in vain.

The form of the contract which was made on this Sunday in April, 1952, was not quite the usual form of an estate agent's contract. For one thing, there was a lump sum commission and not a percentage, and the obligation was expressed thus:

"I agree to pay him a commission of £100 when [the property is] sold and the said property shall be deemed to be sold and the commission payable on the receipt of a deposit or on a purchase agreement being entered into by a purchaser."

There was no deposit in fact received by the plaintiff and it would, therefore, be necessary, in order that he should succeed, for him to show that a purchase agreement was entered into by a purchaser within the meaning of the contract. It may be (and I will assume that it is, because we have heard no argument about it) open to counsel for the plaintiff to contend that a purchase agreement does not necessarily mean an agreement enforceable in the courts, but counsel concedes that, if the only agreement which he can rely on was one which the purchaser was induced to enter into by the plaintiff's own misrepresentation, even though that misrepresentation was quite innocent, then the plaintiff cannot rely on such an agreement as having earned his commission.

Since an agreement, on the face of it binding, was in fact entered into, there remains only the question of fact: Was the purchaser induced to enter into that agreement by a misrepresentation on the plaintiff's part? [HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence and continued:] I feel no doubt that the judge found, and there was evidence to support the finding, that the purchaser was misled by what he had been told by the plaintiff, and he was misled into entering into the contract in the belief that this land would be available to him or would be likely to be made available to him for some of his business purposes, and that, in leading him so to think, the plaintiff misrepresented (albeit quite innocently) the true position. On those facts it follows, first, that the purchaser could not have had this contract enforced against him, and, secondly, as counsel concedes, that the plaintiff cannot rely on such a contract as having earned his commission. On those grounds, it seems to me that this appeal must fail and be dismissed, and it becomes unnecessary for me to say any more about the possible third problem of the construction of the contract itself.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. Of the two points which have been raised and argued in this court, so far as the first point is concerned (that under the Sunday Observance Act, 1677), although it is not strictly necessary for a decision of the appeal in view of our decision on the second point, I should like to say that I agree with the observations of my Lord, and that an estate agent, in my opinion, could not be a tradesman within the meaning of the statute and the interpretation in the decided cases. I regard the second point as entirely a question of fact which has been rightly decided by the judge and the conclusions of law follow.

A ROMER, L.J.: I also agree, and I should like to associate myself with the view that an estate agent is not within the purview of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 1. Appeal dismissed.

Re A DEBTOR (No. 10 of 1953). Ex parte THE DEBTOR v. AMPTHILL RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman and Upjohn, JJ.), June 15, 29, 1953.]

C Bankruptcy—Petition—Time for filing—Bankruptcy notice—Application to set aside—Dismissal by registrar—Appeal by debtor to High Court and Court of Appeal—Appeal dismissed—Petition filed by judgment creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 4 (1) (c)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 (S.R. & O., 1914, No. 1824), r. 141—Bankruptcy Rules, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 2113), r. 139.

D On Apr. 26, 1951, a local authority obtained against the debtor judgment for a debt of £2 15s. 6d. On Aug. 22, 1952, the local authority served a bankruptcy notice in respect of the judgment debt, and, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 140, the debtor filed an affidavit in opposition (which operated as an application to set aside the notice). On Sept. 1, 1952, under r. 141 of the rules of 1915 the registrar fixed the hearing of the application for Sept. 10, 1952, and extended to the date of the hearing the duration of the bankruptcy notice. On Sept. 10, 1952, the registrar dismissed the debtor's application, and on Oct. 18, 1952, the debtor appealed by leave to the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division, which on Nov. 10, 1952, allowed his appeal. On Feb. 10, 1953, the Court of Appeal restored the decision of the registrar. The debtor thereupon immediately sent to the local authority a cheque for the appropriate sum, but it was refused. On Mar. 10, 1953, the local authority filed a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor, and on May 1, 1953, the registrar made a receiving order on the petition on the ground of the debtor's failure to comply before Feb. 10, 1953, with the notice served on him on Aug. 22, 1952.

G HELD: the act of bankruptcy was, prima facie, complete on Sept. 10, 1952, when the registrar made his order, and, having regard to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 4 (1) (c), it was not available to found a petition of bankruptcy more than three months thereafter, viz., on Mar. 10, 1953; neither the notice of appeal filed by the debtor on Oct. 18, 1952, nor the order of the Divisional Court of Nov. 10, 1952, discharging the order of Sept. 10, 1952, operated to suspend the running of time, because, under r. 141 of the rules of 1915, only the registrar or his deputy could extend the time for compliance with the notice; and, therefore, the petition was out of time.

APPEAL by the debtor against a receiving order dated May 1, 1953, made by the registrar of the Brentford County Court.

Muir Hunter for the debtor.

Showan for the respondents, the Amphill Rural District Council.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal against a receiving order made by the registrar of the Brentford County Court on May 1, 1953, on the petition of the respondents. The act of bankruptcy relied on was the appellant's failure to comply before Feb. 10, 1953, with a notice served on him on Aug. 22, 1952, in respect of a judgment debt of rather over £2 under an order of the petty sessional court at Amphill dated Apr. 26, 1951. The dates of the judgment and the bankruptcy notice and the amount concerned are sufficiently remarkable: more remarkable still is the fact that this bankruptcy notice has already received the attention of this court and of the Court of Appeal, the former having set it aside, and the latter having restored it by a considered judgment delivered on Feb. 10, 1953: Re A Debtor (No. 48 of 1952). Ex p. Amphill Rural District Council v. The Debtor (1). The facts are stated in the Court of Appeal's judgment. It appears that the £2 15s. 6d. represents water rates for two half-yearly periods in 1950 or thereabouts, aggregating £2 12s. 6d., which have admittedly remained unpaid, and 3s. costs. There has been, in fact, a long and protracted dispute between the respondents and the appellant about rates. The importance of the judgment for water rates was, as the Court of Appeal has held, that it was a good basis for a bankruptcy notice (because, unlike other rates, it is recoverable as a civil debt), thus enabling the council, having regard to the decision in Re McGreavy. Ex p. McGreavey v. Benfleet Urban District Council (2) to present a petition supported by its judgment for general rates, although the latter could not have been the subject of a bankruptcy notice.

As before stated, the bankruptcy notice was served on Aug. 22, 1952. In due course, the appellant filed an affidavit in opposition, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 140. This operated as an application to set aside the notice: see r. 141. Accordingly, on Sept. 1, 1952, the registrar, as r. 141 required, fixed Wednesday, Sept. 10, 1952, for the hearing of the application. This date was later than the date of expiration of the bankruptcy notice and, therefore, the registrar, as obliged to do by the same rule, extended to the date of the hearing what he called "the completion of the act of bankruptcy". On Sept. 10, 1952, the registrar dismissed the appellant's application on the ground that there was no good counterclaim or set-off under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (g), and he at the same time (but, as it was conceded, without jurisdiction) added a sum of £7 18s., consisting of costs and expenses, to the bankruptcy notice.

On Oct. 18, 1952, the appellant in person appealed by leave to this court, which heard his appeal on Nov. 10 and allowed it, not on the ground taken before the registrar, but on a different ground later disapproved of and explained by the Court of Appeal ([1953] 1 All E.R. 547). It appears that directly the Court of Appeal gave its decision the appellant sent by registered post to the respondents a cheque for the sum in question. There is no reason to suppose that the cheque would not have been met. It appears, however, though the evidence on this point is most unsatisfactory, that the cheque was not received by the respondents till the next day, when they refused to accept it. They maintain in this court that they were justified in so doing.

- The grounds of the appeal as argued before us are, first, that the receiving order and the petition are bad on their face in stating as the act of bankruptcy
- A a failure to comply with the bankruptcy notice "before" Feb. 10, 1953. This point is admittedly good as matters stand and we were asked to give leave to amend the petition by adding the words "on or" immediately before the word "before". The second ground taken was that the act of bankruptcy was complete on Sept. 10, 1952, when the registrar made his order, and, therefore, was not available as a foundation for a petition filed more than three
- B months thereafter, viz., on Mar. 10, 1953; Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 4 (1) (c). The third ground was that the bankruptcy court ought to have looked behind the judgment for £2 12s. 6d. and costs, and, if it did so, the judgment would be found to be unsatisfactory for the following reasons: First, it was a judgment by default, the defendant not being present, as he was ill and sent a doctor's certificate to the bench, but they refused to adjourn the matter.
- C Secondly, there was no effective appeal from that judgment. The debtor appealed to quarter sessions against two judgments, one involving the water rate already mentioned and the other certain general rates. The appeal committee at quarter sessions dismissed both appeals as premature. So far as the appeal against general rates was concerned, that was correct, as there had been no distraint for the rates in question: see R. v. London JJ. (3). The
- D committee also by inadvertence dismissed at the same time and apparently on the same ground the part of the judgment relating to water rate, although R. v. London JJ. (3) had no application to that part, as that rate was recoverable as a civil debt. In the result, the truth of the matter seems to be that the debtor's defence against the claim for water rates has never been heard. Fourthly, it is said that the registrar misdirected himself, in that he took
- E the view that, having regard to the finding of the Court of Appeal, it was no longer open to the debtor to take the point that he had a counterclaim or set-off, whereas the fact that there is no cross-claim to satisfy the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (g), does not decide the question whether the debtor may not be able, on the hearing of the petition, to set up a cross-claim. These last two grounds are not covered by the notice of appeal and we have been asked
- F to give leave to amend in that respect. There are other grounds of appeal stated in the notice which were not proceeded with before us.

- As to the first point, we were asked to refuse leave to amend the petition, it being argued with force that this was not a technical matter, because the appellant was in a position to pay and did, in fact, send a cheque which reached the respondents on the morning of the day following the Court of Appeal's
- G decision. It was said that, as the respondents were relying on two technical points, first, that the cheque was sent a few hours too late, and, secondly, that a tender by cheque is not a tender in law, they ought not to be allowed to amend. In many cases we should agree with that argument, but this case is only one step in a long and highly technical piece of litigation between the appellant and the respondents in respect generally to rates said to be due from him,
- H and we think that in the circumstances the respondents may properly rely on any technical matters and at the same time should be allowed to amend what is plainly a verbal slip. Though the ultimate outcome of the litigation may depend on highly technical matters, it would be wrong to let it be decided on a mere slip.

As to the second point, it is enough to remember the two dates appearing on the face of the receiving order, viz., Aug. 22, 1952 (the date of service of the notice) and Feb. 10, 1953 (the date of failure to comply) to suggest at once the conclusion that the interval is too great. The notice in the ordinary course expired on Aug. 29, and it was admittedly extended by the registrar, under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 141, to Sept. 10, 1952. On that date, prima facie the act of bankruptcy was complete and the three months then began to run. It was, however, argued for the respondents that either the notice of appeal filed by the appellant on Oct. 18, 1952, or the order of this court on Nov. 10, 1952, discharging the order of Sept. 10, 1952, and setting aside the bankruptcy notice, in some way suspended the running of time, and that time remained so suspended until the final determination of the matter by the Court of Appeal on Feb. 10, 1953. That order allowed the appeal, rescinded the order of this court of Nov. 10, 1952, and restored the registrar's order, and it is said that the respondents had three months from that date to enter their petition, and complied by filing it on Mar. 10, 1953. We are unable to accede to this argument. In our judgment, it follows from the terms of r. 141 of the rules of 1915 (replaced now without material alteration in this respect by the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 2113), r. 139), that the only person who can extend the time for complying with the bankruptcy notice is the registrar, or, having regard to the definition in r. 3, his deputy. The rule is directory and compels the registrar to extend it "until the application has been heard and determined". These words can only apply, in our judgment, to the determination before the registrar of the application to set aside the bankruptcy notice made by filing the affidavit mentioned in the rule, and cannot apply to its determination either by this court or by the Court of Appeal. It seems to us, therefore, that the time began to run at the latest on Sept. 11, 1952. There were in fact, on any view, two months during which the registrar's order stood and in which a petition could have been presented. Of course, when this court set aside the bankruptcy notice it would also have set aside the petition, but the order of the Court of Appeal would have restored both.

It was pointed out to us on behalf of the appellant that under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 16, which applies to a Divisional Court in Bankruptcy under r. 134 of the rules of 1915 (to which r. 132 of the rules of 1952 corresponds), an appeal does not operate as a stay of execution or of proceedings under the decision appealed from unless the court so orders. The only case touching on this matter to which we were referred was Nitrate Producers S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Short Bros., Ltd. (4). The immediate point is not relevant, but LORD BUCKMASTER in the course of his speech, in which the other Lords concurred, said (127 L.T. 727):

"It is, of course, a totally different proposition where the effect of an order in this House is to restore a judgment of the court of first instance which has been reversed by an order of the Court of Appeal. In that case the judgment of the court of first instance is expressly restored and remains standing as from the date when it was given."

So here the Court of Appeal reversed the Divisional Court and restored the registrar's judgment, which, accordingly, remains standing as from the date when it was given, viz., Sept. 10, 1952. In our judgment, therefore, the appeal succeeds on this ground.

This makes it unnecessary to consider the third and fourth grounds argued before us. Formally, in case this matter should go further, we grant leave to amend the notice of appeal to raise these points. We think, however, that there is no substance in either of them. As to the third point, the court of bankruptcy can, of course, look behind a judgment, but, so far as we are aware, the only defence to the summons before the justices would have been that the appellant had some counterclaim. This, however, was never put forward by him until after the bankruptcy proceedings had been started. We do not see, therefore, that any injustice can have been done to him by the original decision of the petty sessional court or on the appeal.

A With regard to the fourth point, the evidence as to what took place before the registrar was most unsatisfactory, but we are not satisfied that he misdirected himself on this matter. The information given to us leads us to suppose that the general rates paid by the appellant to the respondents were voluntarily paid by him in order to obtain some advantage for himself, viz., to clear the title of some property which he had sold, and, therefore, were not paid in circumstances in which he could succeed in an action for money paid under a mistake of fact or under some undue pressure. We think that this is not a case for the exercise of the powers given by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 5 (5): it is a matter which could be determined in the bankruptcy itself.

B However, as, in our view, the bankruptcy notice is no longer available as an act of bankruptcy, this appeal must be allowed and the petition dismissed. The respondents must pay the appellant's costs of the petition and of this appeal, and the £20 in court must be paid out to the appellant. Of course, as the appellant was in person below, there will only be such costs, if any, as an appellant in person is entitled to.

Appeal allowed.

D STERN v. FRIEDMANN.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), June 26, 1953.]

Practice—Appearance—Appearance after judgment—Ex parte application for leave to enter—Defendant's claim based on allegation of fraud.

E Until the outbreak of the war in 1939, the parties carried on a business in partnership. On July 18, 1940, the plaintiff issued a writ in an action for the dissolution of the partnership, and on Oct. 22, 1940, notice of the writ was served on the defendant in the United States of America. The defendant did not enter an appearance, and on Feb. 18, 1941, judgment was given for the dissolution of the partnership. On Jan. 22, 1943, an order was made in chambers approving the sale of the goodwill to the plaintiff for £10, and on Nov. 19, 1943, the final order on further consideration in the action was made and the action was at an end. On June 4, 1953, the defendant entered an appearance in the action, having obtained leave to do so on an ex parte application to the master, and on June 15, 1953, he served on the plaintiff a short notice of motion to set aside the order of Jan. 22, 1943. The plaintiff applied, under R.S.C., Ord. 70, r. 1, for the appearance to be struck out on the grounds that it was entered after judgment and that he had received no notice of the application for leave to enter an appearance. The defendant thereupon applied, by notice of motion, for leave to enter an appearance. On the hearing of the motions, the defendant alleged that the order of Jan. 22, 1943, had been obtained by fraud.

H HELD: (i) an application for leave to enter an appearance after judgment should be by special motion or summons, notice of which had been served on the plaintiff; leave to enter such an appearance could not be granted on an ex parte application; and, therefore, the appearance was irregular and should be set aside.

(ii) the defendant could not be allowed to raise an issue of fraud on a notice of motion in an action which was at an end; the proper method of raising the matter was by a separate action in which pleadings would have to be delivered and the rules of evidence to be obeyed; and, therefore, leave to enter an appearance would not be granted to him.

AS TO TIME FOR ENTRY OF APPEARANCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, p. 37, para. 55.

MOTIONS in an action for the dissolution of a partnership.

The action was commenced by writ on July 18, 1940. The defendant failed to appear, and on Feb. 18, 1941, the plaintiff obtained judgment. On Jan. 22, 1943, an order was made in chambers approving the sale of the goodwill of the business to the plaintiff for £10, and on Nov. 19, 1943, the final order on further consideration in the action was made. On June 4, 1953, the defendant entered an appearance, having obtained leave to do so on an ex parte application to the master. On June 15, 1953, he served on the plaintiff a notice of motion to set aside the order of Jan. 22, 1943, and the plaintiff thereupon served a notice of motion that the appearance of June 4 be struck out. The question having arisen whether leave to enter appearance after judgment could be granted on an ex parte application, the defendant applied, by notice of motion, for leave to enter an appearance. All three motions were now before the learned judge.

T. A. C. Burgess for the plaintiff.

C. Lawson for the defendant.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is a case of some difficulty in which there are three motions before me, one by the plaintiff and two by the defendant, in an action which was begun by writ on July 18, 1940, and which is, in form, an action for the dissolution of a partnership. Service of the writ was effected on the defendant in the United States on Oct. 22, 1940. The defendant, believing that the business (viz., the importing of provisions), which had been carried on in partnership between him and the plaintiff, had come to an end at the outbreak of the war, and for other reasons connected with the war, never took any steps to appear. On Feb. 18, 1941, judgment ordering dissolution of the partnership as from Dec. 31, 1939, was given in the action with the usual directions which are made in a partnership action of this kind. Subsequently, the question arose of the sale of the goodwill of the business, and, on the suggestion, apparently, that the goodwill was of little, if any, value, the plaintiff was allowed to purchase it for the sum of £10. This sale was approved by an order made in chambers in the action on Jan. 22, 1943. On Nov. 19, 1943, the final order on further consideration in the action was made, and thereupon it was clear that the action was at an end. Now, ten years later, the defendant wishes to enter an appearance. On June 4, 1953, he was allowed, by an order of the master, to enter an appearance, and on June 15, 1953, he served on the plaintiff a short notice of motion to set aside the order of Jan. 22, 1943. As a result of suggestions which were made as regards the practice in obtaining leave to enter an appearance after judgment has been obtained, he also asks for leave to enter an appearance. The plaintiff, on the other hand, has served a notice of motion, pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 70, r. 1, that the appearance on June 4 by the defendant may be struck out on the grounds that such appearance was entered after judgment in the action and that no notice of any application for leave to enter an appearance was given to the plaintiff.

The practice is not entirely clear in regard to this matter. By R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 22:

"A defendant may appear at any time before judgment. If he appear at any time after the time limited by the writ for appearance, he shall not, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order, be entitled to any further time for delivering his defence, or for any other purpose, than if he had appeared according to the writ."

In the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 141, this note appears under the rule:

"Appearance after judgment. In Chancery Division leave to enter appearance after judgment is obtained on special motion or summons: DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE, p. 295; DANIELL'S CHANCERY FORMS, p. 129. Order, SETON'S DECREE AND ORDERS, p. 23. In Queen's Bench Division appearance tendered after judgment signed will be accepted if the defendant desires to enter it. Such appearance would stand in the event of the judgment being set aside."

In DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE, 8th ed., vol. 1, p. 295, the practice is stated in this way:

"After judgment an appearance cannot be entered by a defendant except by leave of the court, which may be granted either with discharge of the judgment leaving the defendant free to defend on payment of costs thrown away, or without setting aside the judgment on defendant's submitting to be bound by it. The application for leave may be made by petition of course if the plaintiff will consent, and if he will not by special motion or summons, notice of which must be served on him. In the latter case the notice of motion or summons asks that the defendant on submitting to be bound by the judgment and proceedings already had may be at liberty to enter an appearance to the writ of summons, and may have the like benefit of the judgment, and may be at liberty to attend the subsequent proceedings as if he had appeared at the hearing. On production of the order to the proper officer an appearance for the defendant may be entered in the usual way, and notice thereof must be given on the same day to the plaintiff or his solicitor, and the action thenceforth proceeds against such defendant in the ordinary manner."

It is suggested that the practice has grown up whereby the master will make an order giving leave for appearance merely on an ex parte application by the defendant who wishes to appear after judgment. In my view, that practice (if it exists) is not correct. It seems to me that the practice is as stated in DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE in the passage I have read, and that it would be very undesirable that such an appearance should be allowed to be entered on ex parte application. In a case like the present when the matter is very much out of time after the judgment, it might be that the plaintiff would have a right to put forward submissions to the court why appearance should not be allowed to be entered at such a late stage, or, if it is allowed to be entered, that certain terms should be put on the defendant. In those circumstances it seems to me quite wrong that the defendant should be allowed to obtain leave to enter an appearance ex parte, and, accordingly, it seems to me that in the present case the order made by the master was irregular and the appearance must be set aside.

I now come to the question whether I should accede to the defendant's application by notice of motion for leave to enter an appearance in this action, and for that purpose I must consider the circumstances to some extent. The first point which is very much against the defendant is that it is ten years since the order was made, and that, in itself, is a circumstance which naturally causes some surprise at his application. He does, however, explain in an affidavit why he has not made an application previously or has not entered an appearance in the proper way, and there is some justification for what he says. It was really on account of the war. He had supposed that the business had come to an end, and, in particular, he was unaware of a circumstance which he now says was of the greatest importance, namely, that the National Egg Distributors Association, Ltd., was formed on June 30, 1941, under the Companies Act, 1929, and that the plaintiff, by virtue of having been in the business of importing food before the war in partnership with the defendant, was able to become a member of this company, with an allocation of six hundred and eighty units, and thereby obtained dividends which, the defendant says, amounted, over the period in which this procedure operated, to a considerable sum. The defendant alleges that the circumstance that the plaintiff would be entitled, by virtue of the partnership business, to acquire membership in the company was not disclosed to the court when the order was made approving the sale of the goodwill of the business to him, and that, therefore, it was obtained by fraud. That is a substantial point, and a matter of considerable importance which would, one would think, give the defendant some ground for claiming that he ought to have a right to re-open the matters which had been dealt with in this action. A

The difficult question then arises whether the defendant is going about the matter in the right way. If he is now allowed to enter an appearance, can he, merely on a motion, re-open this matter in the action which came to an end as long ago as Nov. 19, 1943? It is to be observed that he is not desirous of setting aside the order, made in 1941, for the dissolution of the partnership, or the order on further consideration, made on Nov. 19, 1943. He merely desires to set aside the order of Jan. 22, 1943, approving the sale of the goodwill—an order which was made over ten years ago in an action which is now at an end. It seems to me that that is not a proper way of proceeding. If there is an allegation of fraud and the allegation can be substantiated, it can, and should, be pursued in another way. Fraud is a serious matter. It has always been regarded by the court as a matter so serious that the precise allegations should be laid before the court in the form of pleadings and that it should not be decided on summary application, such as is a notice of motion. In the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 699, there is this note: B C D

“Fraud. It is the settled practice of the court that the proper method of impeaching a completed judgment on the ground of fraud is by action, in which the particulars of the fraud must be exactly given and the allegation established by strict proof. Although there is jurisdiction in special cases to set aside a judgment for fraud on a motion for a new trial, if for any special reason departure from the established practice is permitted, the necessity for stating the particulars of the fraud and the burden of proof are in no way abated and all the strict rules of evidence apply.” E

Thus, it seems that, notwithstanding the orders which have been made in this action, the defendant, if his claim of fraud is justified, is in a position to bring an action to set aside the sale, which was not a sale by the court, but merely a sale to which the approval of the court was obtained in the order of Jan. 22, 1943. Therefore, it is really unnecessary that he should be allowed now to enter appearance in the action, and it seems to me very inconvenient that he should be allowed to do so, and to demand to bring the matter of fraud before the court, merely on notice of motion. F

Reliance was placed by the defendant on R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 15, which reads: G

“Any judgment by default, whether under this order or under any other of these rules, may be set aside by the court or a judge, upon such terms as to costs or otherwise as such court or judge may think fit, and, where an action has been set down on motion for judgment under r. 11 of this order, such setting down may be dealt with by the court or a judge in the same way as if judgment by default had been signed when the case was set down.” H

It would appear that the order approving the sale was not a judgment, and, consequently, r. 15 does not apply in the present case. The defendant also relied on the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 62, which provides:

“Subject to the provisions of this Act with respect to appeals in matters of practice and procedure, every order made by a judge of the High Court in chambers, except orders as to costs only which by law are left to the discretion of the court, may be set aside or discharged upon notice by any Divisional Court, or by the judge sitting in court, according to the practice of the Division to which the cause or matter in which the order was made is assigned."

- A It is true that the order of Jan. 22, 1943, was an order made by a judge in chambers, but this does not seem to me the appropriate method of proceeding when the action has come to an end and an order on further consideration is made. One is familiar with the practice which is referred to in s. 62 of the Act of 1925. Cases constantly occur where a party wishes to appeal to the Court of Appeal from an order of the judge in chambers, and he then has to move the judge formally in open court to discharge the order made in chambers, or a certificate is obtained that no further argument is required by the judge:
- B [see the note headed "Appeal from and application to discharge orders made in chambers", in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 1188]. But it does not seem to me that s. 62 of the Act of 1925 is of any assistance in regard to the present problem, and, therefore, I come to the conclusion that, as stated in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 699, in a case of an allegation of fraud of this kind,
- C the proper method of raising the matter is by a separate action in which proper pleadings will have to be delivered, the proper rules of evidence can be obeyed, and the matter can be regulated by oral evidence in a more satisfactory manner. As I pointed out, the order of Jan. 22, 1943, was not an order for the sale of the goodwill to the plaintiff, but merely an order approving the sale, and it seems to me that the action which the defendant
- D would bring to attack that sale would be an action asking that the sale be set aside. If, in such an action, the answer were made that the sale was authorised or approved by the court, the defendant would then say that the order approving the sale was obtained by fraud. If, therefore, the defendant wishes to raise an issue of that kind, he must do it by a separate action, and he cannot be allowed to do it merely on a notice of motion in the action which is now at
- E an end. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that I ought not to accede to the defendant's application for leave to enter an appearance now, and that his notice of motion must be dismissed. His other notice of motion, which asked that the order of Jan. 22, 1943, be discharged, went to the merits of the order. As I have already indicated, I do not think that that is the right procedure, and, in any case, if the defendant is not allowed to enter an appearance in the action, this notice of motion cannot be made effective, and must
- F also be dismissed. On the other hand, the plaintiff's notice of motion asking for the discharge of the appearance which was entered by the defendant on June 4, 1953, succeeds, and an order must be made accordingly.

Order accordingly.

SVENSKA TRAKTOR AKTIEBOLAGET v. MARITIME AGENCIES (SOUTHAMPTON), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), June 4, 5, 8, 9, 11, 1953.]

Shipping—Carriage by sea—Deck cargo—Cargo “stated” as being carried on deck—Clause in bill of lading giving liberty to carry goods as deck cargo—Carriage subject to obligation properly and carefully to carry—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (c. 22), schedule, art. I (c), art. III, r. 2.

The plaintiffs were the consignees of a number of tractors shipped from Southampton to Stockholm, and the defendants were the charterers (and for the purposes of the action treated as the owners) of the vessel in which the tractors were carried. Some of the tractors were carried as deck cargo and during the course of the voyage one was washed overboard. The contract of carriage was contained in the bill of lading which stated (inter alia) that all the terms, provisions and conditions of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, were to apply to the contract, and that, if any term of the bill of lading was inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the Act, it should to that extent be void. The bill of lading also stated: “Steamer has liberty to carry goods on deck and shipowners will not be responsible for any loss, damage, or claim arising therefrom.” In an action for the value of the tractor lost overboard, HELD: (i) the clause in the bill of lading giving liberty to carry goods on deck did not amount to a “statement” that the tractor was being carried on deck so as to exclude it from the definition of “goods” in art. I (c) of the schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and, consequently, it was being carried by the defendants subject to the obligation imposed on them by art. III, r. 2, properly and carefully to load, stow, and carry it.

(ii) the second part of the clause in the bill of lading (excluding the liability of the shipowners for loss, etc.) was void as being contrary to art. III, r. 8, but the clause was severable and under the first part of it the defendants had liberty to ship cargo on deck but only subject to their obligation under art. III, r. 2, but, on the facts, they had not discharged that obligation.

(iii) in any event, the onus was on the defendants to prove that they had complied with art. III, r. 2, and they had failed to discharge that onus.

ACTION for the value of a tractor lost overboard.

The plaintiffs, a Swedish company, were the consignees of a batch of fifty tractors which were shipped in the motor vessel Glory. The defendants were the charterers of the vessel, but for the purposes of the action they agreed to be treated as the owners. Under the charterparty the period of hire was expressed to be “about eight to fourteen days” and the limits were expressed to be “for a voyage from Amsterdam to Stockholm via Southampton and Copenhagen.” Of the fifty tractors shipped, thirty-four were stowed below decks and the remaining sixteen were stowed on Nos. 1 and 2 hatches as deck cargo. His LORDSHIP found that three tractors were stowed on the port side of No. 1 hatch, with wheels interlocking and brakes on and in gear, but with no chocks behind the wheels. Two tractors were stowed facing forward and the third facing aft, and the three extended a little to starboard of the midship line. By about 6.30 p.m. on Oct. 16, the tractors were loaded and the Glory left her berth at Southampton, the tractors on No. 1 hatch being finally lashed and secured about an hour later while the vessel was proceeding down Southampton Water. During Oct. 17, the wind was from the south-west, varying between force three and force six of the Beaufort scale. Till 4 a.m. of Oct. 18, the Glory

- A course was altered to about north by east, and the wind, being from the westward, was on the vessel's port beam. During the 4 to 8 a.m. watch a tractor, one of the three tractors on No. 1 hatch which was to starboard of the others, was washed over the starboard side. The vessel then hove to and the remaining tractors were re-lashed. On arrival at Stockholm the master made a protest in which he said that on Oct. 17 the wind increased to force five to six and orders were given to inspect and secure all lashings, and that at 06.05 a.m. on Oct. 18, off the Haaksgonden, the vessel encountered several heavy seas which caused the lashings on No. 1 hatch partly to give way and washed one tractor overboard. His LORDSHIP found that the shippers knew that some of the tractors were stowed as deck cargo and made no protest, that the plaintiffs had no knowledge how the consignment was to be stowed, and that there was
- C no evidence that they had agreed expressly or impliedly to stowage on deck. His LORDSHIP also found that the contract of carriage was wholly evidenced by the bill of lading.

Cur. adv. vult.

- D June 11. PILCHER, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The bill of lading is, of course, subject to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and is expressed so to be. The clause in the bill of lading which incorporates the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act is in these terms:

- E "All the terms, provisions and conditions of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the schedule thereto, are to apply to the contract contained in this bill of lading and the carriers are to be entitled to the benefit of all privileges, rights and immunities contained in such Act, and the schedule thereto, as if the same were herein specifically set out. If, or to the extent that, any term of this bill of lading is repugnant to or inconsistent with anything of such Act or schedule, it shall be void."

- F There the matter is expressed, and, even if it had not been expressed, it would have been implied by law. The next clause to which I ought to refer is the following:

"Steamer has liberty to carry goods on deck and shipowners will not be responsible for any loss, damage, or claim arising therefrom."

- G The bill of lading contains on its face no statement that any particular goods were being shipped on deck, and that leads me to consider the section of the Act and the articles of the schedule which have been referred to in argument.

The Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, s. 1, is in the following terms:

- H "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the rules [in the schedule relating to bills of lading] shall have effect in relation to and in connection with the carriage of goods by sea in ships carrying goods from any port in Great Britain or Northern Ireland to any other port whether in or outside Great Britain or Northern Ireland."

Turning to art. I (c) in the schedule to the Act one finds the definition of "goods" set out as follows:

"'Goods' includes goods, wares, merchandises, and articles of every kind whatsoever, except live animals and cargo which by the contract of carriage is stated as being carried on deck and is so carried."

It was submitted on behalf of the defendants that while there was admittedly no specific statement on the face of the bill of lading that any of these tractors were being carried on deck, the clause in the bill of lading which I have already read, giving liberty to the vessel to carry goods on deck, amounted to an agreement between the parties that the steamer was entitled to ship goods on deck, and, it being common ground that the tractor which was lost was shipped on deck, the clause giving liberty to ship on deck amounted in all the circumstances to a statement that the tractor was carried on deck sufficient to satisfy art. I (c) of the schedule, and thus to exclude the tractor in question from the definition of "goods" to which the Act applies.

I do not propose to spend much time on that submission because, in my view, it is quite untenable. The intention of the Act and the schedule in relation to deck cargo appears to me to be reasonably clear. At common law a shipowner is only authorised to stow goods on deck in certain circumstances, and here I propose to quote a passage from SCRUTTON ON CHARTERPARTIES, 15th ed., p. 157, because the principle is there set out tersely and concisely, and, of course, perfectly accurately:

"The shipowner or master will only be authorised to stow goods on deck: (1) by a custom binding in the trade, or port of loading, to stow on deck goods of that class on such a voyage; or (2) by express agreement with the shipper of the particular goods so to stow them. The effect of deck stowage not so authorised will be to set aside the exceptions of the charter or bill of lading, and to render the shipowner liable under his contract of carriage for damage happening to such goods."

The policy of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act was to regulate the relationship between the shipowner and the owner of goods along well-known lines. In excluding from the definition of "goods" the carriage of which was subject to the Act, cargo carried on deck and stated to be so carried, the intention of the Act was, in my view, to leave the shipowner free to carry deck cargo, on his own conditions and unaffected by the obligations imposed on him by the Act, in any case in which he would, apart from the Act, have been entitled to carry such cargo on deck, provided, of course, that the cargo in question was, in fact, carried on deck and that the bill of lading covering it contained on its face a statement that the particular cargo was being so carried. Such a statement on the face of the bill of lading would serve as a notification and a warning to consignees and indorsees of the bill of lading to whom the property in the goods passed under the terms of s. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, that the goods which they were to take were being shipped as deck cargo. They would thus have full knowledge of the facts when accepting the documents and would know that the carriage of the goods on deck was not subject to the Act. If, on the other hand, there was no specific agreement between the parties as to the carriage on deck, and no statement on the face of the bill of lading that goods carried on deck had in fact been so carried, the consignees or indorsees of the bill of lading would be entitled to assume that the goods were goods the carriage of which could only be performed by the shipowner subject to the obligations imposed on him by the Act. A mere general liberty to carry goods on deck is not, in my view, a statement in the contract of carriage that the goods are, in fact, being carried on deck. To hold otherwise would, in my view, do violence to the ordinary meaning of the words of art. I (c). I, accordingly, hold that the plaintiffs' tractors were being carried by the defendants subject to the obligations imposed on them by art. III, r. 2, of the Act.

The next question is: Was the shipowner in those circumstances entitled to carry the tractors or any of them on deck? I have already referred to the clause in the bill of lading which purports to grant to the shipowner a liberty to ship goods on deck, but I may, perhaps, be pardoned for reading the clause again:

A The clause or sentence is thus in two parts, and, in my view, it is reasonably clear that the second part of the clause offends and must offend against art. III, r. 8, of the schedule to the Act and cannot be relied on by the defendants. Counsel for the defendants argued that on the analogy of W. R. Varnish & Co., Ltd. v. Kheti (Owners) (1), it was possible to say that the second part of the clause did not offend against the Act. I do not propose to deal at length with that argument because, in my view, that case is not an authority for any such proposition. It was a case which depended very much on its own facts; it was a case in which the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act was only B incorporated by contract, and a case in which a rubber stamp clause was superimposed on the bill of lading. I think it is a case which must be confined to its own facts, and, in my view, it is no authority at all for the proposition advanced by counsel for the defendants that the second part of this particular clause does not offend against the Act. I am quite clear that it does.

C If the whole is to be regarded as one clause, it is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the whole clause must be taken to offend against the Act, and that with the second part of the clause goes the first part which purports to give the ship liberty to take deck cargo. On behalf of the defendants, it was argued that the clause should be read disjunctively, and that, inasmuch as the first portion did not offend against the Act, it should be allowed to remain, and that it could not consequently be said that in shipping some tractors on D deck the owners had committed such a fundamental breach of their obligation under the contract of carriage as to disentitle them from relying on any of the statutory exceptions, and, in particular, on the exception of perils of the seas. The two portions of the clause under consideration are connected by the conjunction “and” without any stop. The second part offends against the Act and the first part does not. While, in the view which I take of the E facts, the point in this case has not any practical importance, I am inclined to think that counsel for the defendants is right, and I proceed on the assumption that the defendants had liberty to ship cargo on deck subject always to their obligations under art. III, r. 2, properly and carefully to load, handle, stow, carry, keep and care for the goods in question.

F In this state of affairs, and on the facts proved or admitted, the defendants are in some difficulty. The wind and sea conditions were, and were admitted by the master to be, normal for the month of October in the North Sea. The vessel’s course necessarily involved her getting the wind and sea on her port beam, and there was nothing odd or abnormal about that. The vessel was light of her marks, and, no doubt, with her deck cargo she rolled considerably. All these were matters which must or ought to have been anticipated by the G master. The master’s view was that there was inevitably a risk that deck cargo of this sort, even if lashed, with every proper precaution might come adrift and be lost overboard in normal conditions of wind and sea. While I do not agree with those views expressed by the master, even if they were correct, they would not, in my view, avail the defendants, because, if there was a real risk that the tractors, if loaded on deck with every proper precaution, H might yet be damaged or lost in normal weather conditions, the master in so loading them would be in breach of his obligations under art. III, r. 2, properly and carefully to stow and carry the goods in question, and his owners would be responsible for any loss or damage to the deck cargo as a result of the master’s breach. As I have said, however, I do not accept the view expressed by the master, and I am satisfied that, if properly lashed, these tractors could have been carried safely to their destination in the normal weather conditions which in fact prevailed. After the incident off the Haaksgronden, when the one tractor on No. 1 hatch was washed overboard and the other two tractors shifted, the two remaining tractors were re-lashed and carried to their destination without further trouble in spite of the fact that the force of the wind and strength of the sea remained the same for another twelve hours at least, and during a portion of that time the vessel was still on about the same course with the wind from about the same quarter. Another matter which, perhaps, is not unimportant is that this was the first occasion on which this master had ever carried tractors as deck cargo on this or any other vessel. The master gave evidence at some length; he was a Dutchman, but he spoke English very capably, and I think he was doing his best to assist the court. There were certain matters which I felt myself unable to accept in his recollection, and I have already referred to one of those matters, namely, the fact that, in my view, the tractors were stowed interlocked and not, as the master thought, wheel to wheel. There are other matters which I shall have to refer to on which I felt myself unable to accept the master's evidence. It is, perhaps, trite to say that the obligations of a shipowner when carrying deck cargo are not completed when the deck cargo is stowed and lashed at the port of loading. Through his master and crew, the owner has to ensure that the lashings are tended and tautened as necessary from time to time, because it is common knowledge that, as soon as deck cargo of any sort acquires any small movement owing to the fact that the lashings are no longer as taut as they were, if something is not done promptly and bad weather supervenes, the small movement will soon become a big one and it is more than probable that the lashings will go and the deck cargo or some of it will be lost overboard.

There is another matter on which I cannot accept the master's evidence. He said in the protest which I have already read that, apparently soon after passing the East Goodwin light vessel, which was twenty-two hours before the accident: "I ordered all lashings to be inspected and secured. They were found to be in order". When he was in the witness box the master said that he personally went down on to the hatch and inspected the lashings and found that they were taut and that nothing required to be done. I do not accept that. I prefer what he says in his protest which was made within a week or so of the accident. I think that, if he did anything, he merely told somebody to go and look at the lashings. The master did his best to explain how he came to say in his protest that he "ordered the lashings to be inspected", but I did not think that his explanation was a very satisfactory one, and I, accordingly, find that he did not himself go and look at the lashings. Moreover, neither in his evidence, nor in the protest, did he contend that anyone paid very much attention to the lashings once they were clear of the East Goodwin light vessel, and that was just the time when they started to run into bad weather. No doubt, the reason why they did not do that was that the fore deck was very largely flooded thereafter. Whether or not the lashings were originally sufficient—and I will deal with that point presently—I am not satisfied that any proper steps were taken during the last twenty-four hours before the casualty to tend and tauten the lashings which were there, and that is a matter which is just as important as providing lashings at the start which are sufficiently strong and properly disposed.

I do not propose to deal at great length—or at any length at all—with the master's account of how these three tractors were lashed, first of all to each other, and, secondly, to the vessel's hatches and bulwarks. The master drew a rough sketch of the way in which the lashing was done, and I am going to confine myself to saying that, having listened to the master's evidence, I was not satisfied that ropes of the size to which he spoke were used to secure the tractors to each other. In the course of his evidence he always spoke to the diameter of the rope, and I will refer to the diameter rather than to the more usual way of describing a rope by its circumference. I was not satisfied that ropes of three-quarters of an inch to one inch in diameter were used to secure the tractors to each other. Mr. Etheridge [the shippers' representative], who was on board the vessel and who said he saw the rope being used to secure tractor to tractor, put the size of the rope as half an inch in diameter, and I am inclined to think that he was right about that. I am not satisfied that the wires which were used to lash the tractors to the ring bolts on the coamings and bulwarks were of the size spoken to by the master.

- A The securing of these tractors on No. 1 hatch was criticised in three ways by the plaintiffs who suggested (i) that the wheels of the tractors should have been properly chocked, which they were not; (ii) that wires or stronger ropes should have been used to secure the tractors to each other; and (iii) that the block of tractors should have been cross-lashed. I say at once that I was not impressed with the plaintiffs' first criticism, namely, that no chocks were used. These tractors were stowed on their rubber tyres on top of one or more tarpaulins on the hatch cover, and I doubt whether it would have been practical or feasible to chock the wheels of a tractor in that position, and I say no more about that matter. With regard to the second criticism, which, I think, is an important one, namely, that either stronger ropes or wires should have been used to secure the tractors to each other, I think that criticism is justified.
- B It may well be that if the ropes in fact used had been more carefully tended and kept taut they would have been sufficient, but, relying on the evidence of Mr. Joseph—an experienced stevedore called on behalf of the plaintiffs—and on the evidence of Mr. Etheridge as to the size of the ropes, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs' second criticism is justified, and that the
- C ropes used were insufficient in strength and quite possibly not in their first youth. The third criticism made by the plaintiffs, namely, that the block of tractors should have been cross-lashed, is rather more difficult to explain in words than the other two matters. The principle, as I understand it, by which this block of three tractors was secured was this: First of all, the three tractors are secured to each other and then the block is secured from moving as a block
- D by wires made fast to rings fore and aft and on either side of the vessel. The master's reply to that third criticism was twofold. First of all, he said it was impossible to cross-lash a block of tractors of this kind—and by "cross-lashing" is really meant taking one wire from the starboard side of the block to the port side of the vessel and another wire from the port side of the block to the starboard side of the vessel, and similarly, I suppose, if necessary, fore and aft. The master said that that was not practicable because you could not lead the wires through appropriately. He also said that cross-lashing was forbidden by Dutch law because it rendered jettison of the cargo in an emergency extremely difficult. The master was not cross-examined about Dutch law and I feel a very grave doubt whether he was right about that, because I cannot believe that Dutch law can forbid a shipowner from cross-lashing
- E deck cargo; but I do appreciate that it may have been difficult to cross-lash these tractors. If, on the other hand, it was impossible to hold them securely in position without cross-lashing, then they ought not to have been stowed on deck at all. I am content to rest my conclusion with regard to the insufficiency of the lashing of this deck cargo on the fact that the ropes connecting the tractors to each other were insufficient in size or strength and were not
- F sufficiently tended. In addition to that, I feel that it is more than likely that the wires by which the block of tractors was secured—approximately, no doubt, as shown in the master's sketch, to ring bolts on the bulwarks—were not tended and tautened as they should have been.

I have indicated my view as to how this unfortunate accident occurred, but the case might almost have been decided on the principle of res ipsa loquitur. I appreciate that the mere fact that the force of the wind and the strength of the sea were not abnormal does not necessarily disentitle a shipowner, when cargo is lost or damaged, to rely on the exception of perils of the sea, but in order to be entitled to rely on this exception the shipowner must establish that the loss was fortuitous, that it was due to some unforeseen incursion of seawater, either over the deck or into the ship, which could not have been avoided by proper care on his part. In this case there is no evidence at all of any fortuitous or unexpected peril. The master seems to have encountered exactly the kind of weather he expected to encounter and exactly the type of weather which, in his view, might easily result in the loss of deck cargo, even though properly stowed and secured. One does not need to know a great deal about the sea to appreciate that a little coaster like the Glory, in the conditions of wind and sea which she is likely to encounter in October in the North Sea, may easily have her foredeck covered by the seas as she rolls, according to the direction of the wind in relation to her course. It is quite clear that that is what happened to the Glory, and it is exactly what the master expected. She shipped, I suppose, the normal amount of water which was to be expected over her deck and fore hatch; that is what was, and it should have been clear to the master, going to occur, and if it did occur it was imperative that he should take great care with regard not only to the original lashing of the deck cargo, but to the tending and tautening of the lashings as the voyage proceeded. If tractors which have a fairly high side and weigh about one ton each are loaded on the fore hatch of a little craft like the Glory, reasonable care demands that they should be most firmly secured. This tractor was swept away in normal conditions of wind and sea, and that in itself raises a very strong presumption that it was not adequately secured.

That leads me to consider quite broadly the question of the burden of proof. The position under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act in that respect is very conveniently set out in CARVER'S CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA, 9th ed., p. 185, where, dealing with the question of onus of proof in the case of damage or loss, the learned editor says this:

"The effect of those words [the words of art. III, r. 2] is that if the goods-owner proves that the goods shipped have not been delivered, or have been damaged after shipment, the carrier is liable unless he can prove affirmatively (i) that he has taken reasonable care of the goods while they were in his custody and (ii) that the loss or damage falls within one of the immunities specified in art. IV, r. 2."

It would have been sufficient for me to say that I am left profoundly dissatisfied in this case with regard to the care which was taken by the shipowner in securing these tractors and tending and tautening the lashings. I have already indicated why I think this tractor came adrift; it was really quite unnecessary for me to have done so, but I thought it was desirable because I have heard a great deal of evidence about it. I could have left the matter simply on the burden of proof, observing that the tractor had not been delivered to its destination, and considered whether the shipowner had satisfied me that he had in the circumstances exercised reasonable care, and found that he had not so satisfied me. He certainly has not, and I think that this tractor was lost owing to the lack of care in its original lashing and in the subsequent tending of the lashings by which it and the other two tractors on No. 1 hatch were secured.

The result, therefore, is that the plaintiffs succeed and are entitled to recover judgment for the sum claimed, namely, £316 4s. 2d., with interest.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 25, 1953.]

Trust and Trustee—Costs of trustee—Action by beneficiaries against trustee—Taxation as between solicitor and client—Disbursements from trust fund in excess of amount of taxed costs—Right of trustee to recoup himself out of trust fund.

The beneficiaries under a will commenced an action by writ against the the trustees, claiming an account of remuneration received by the trustees as directors of a limited company, on the footing that such remuneration was trust moneys. The court found in favour of the beneficiaries on some points and in favour of the trustees on others, and ordered that the costs of all parties should be taxed as between solicitor and client and retained and paid by the trustees out of the trust fund. On taxation, the taxing master disallowed on the trustees' bill of costs sums amounting to £437. The trustees nevertheless raised the full amount of their costs out of the trust fund, on the basis that they were entitled to an indemnity against costs.

HELD: while there was some truth in the view that trustees were entitled to their costs on an indemnity basis provided that the costs were incurred solely for the benefit of the trust estate, there was no such general rule in hostile litigation between the beneficiaries and the trustees, and in the present case the trustees were entitled to raise out of the trust fund only their costs taxed strictly in accordance with the order, and they must repay to the trust fund any sum raised in excess of that amount.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, having regard to an order made by WYNN-PARRY, J., dated July 5, 1951, the defendants as trustees were entitled to retain and pay out of the trust fund £437 which represented disbursements made by them in connection with an action and disallowed on taxation.

On Mar. 31, 1950, beneficiaries under the will of Thomas Frederick Dargie, deceased, issued a writ against the trustees of the said will claiming, inter alia, an account of remuneration received by the trustees as directors of a limited company in the shares of which trust moneys were invested. The proceedings were hostile, and WYNN-PARRY, J., having decided in favour of the trustees on some aspects, but against them on others, ordered (as to costs) " . . . that it be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client the costs of the plaintiffs and the defendants . . . and . . . that all the said costs when taxed be retained and paid by the defendants . . . as the trustees of the said will out of the estate of the said testator ". On taxation, the taxing master disallowed £437 from the trustees' bill of costs, and the trustees claimed to be entitled to recoup to themselves that amount from the trust fund, notwithstanding such disallowance.

VAISEY, J.: This is an originating summons brought by the plaintiff, Mrs. Florence Miller, who is one of the beneficiaries under the will of her father, Thomas Frederick Dargie. The three defendants to the summons are the trustees of that will. The question which I am asked is whether, having regard to an order made by WYNN-PARRY, J., dated July 5, 1951, in certain proceedings, the defendants, as trustees of the will, were entitled to retain and pay out of the testator's residuary estate £437 and whether they ought to account for and refund that sum to the residuary estate. That sum represented the excess of certain disbursements made by the defendants, or contracted to be made by the defendants, which was disallowed on taxation.

The action in question was brought by the present plaintiff, and other beneficiaries, as plaintiffs against the defendant trustees. The testator died on Apr. 8, 1942, and the action was commenced by writ issued on Mar. 31, 1950. In that action, which may properly be described as a hostile action, an action fought, I think, with a good deal of acrimony, the beneficiaries alleged that certain remuneration received by the trustees was remuneration from a limited company in which the testator had held large interests. The beneficiaries sought to have an account taken of the remuneration actually received by the trustees respectively and repayment of what might be found due on the account for the benefit of the testator's estate. Further relief was sought, the question being raised how the trustees ought to use the voting power which they had in this company by virtue of the shares of the testator, and an injunction and other ancillary relief being sought; and if and so far as necessary execution of the trusts of the will was asked for. The beneficiaries asked that the trustees should pay the costs of the action.

On July 5, 1951, WYNN-PARRY, J., pronounced a judgment which dealt with the whole situation, and declared what the rights and liabilities were of each of the trustees in relation to these sums of remuneration which they had been respectively receiving, or were claiming to receive, and generally as to the somewhat difficult situation which had arisen owing to the trustees of the will being directors of this company. The judgment was a long one and went in great detail into the circumstances of the case and WYNN-PARRY, J., referred to the disputes which had been debated in the action. Further, in his judgment he discussed the attack which was made against the trustees and the claims which were made against them personally in regard to the matters to which I have alluded. But it appears, and I need not go into the details, that to some extent the learned judge came to the conclusion that the trustees were right, and in other respects he came to the conclusion that their claims were not altogether well founded. At the end of the judgment, WYNN-PARRY, J., dealt with the costs and it is obvious from what he said that there would in strictness have had to be an elaborate splitting up of the costs as between various issues so as to adjust the matter, not only between the beneficiaries and the trustees, but as between the trustees inter se. WYNN-PARRY, J., said:

"If the parties cannot come to any arrangement, I shall have to make a long and complicated order . . . Unless the parties come to some arrangement I must make some order as to costs which will be most expensive and complicated."

Leading counsel for the trustees said:

"My Lord, here we have a case of an action brought against trustees, and all of those trustees have quite clearly behaved properly; nothing improper in their conduct has been alleged against any of them. They have behaved perfectly properly, and they were bound to defend this action. On the general principles, trustees should not be put to expense by reason of the fact that they have defended proceedings in their capacity as trustees, so one starts with the principle that the trustees should get their costs as between solicitor and client."

Later, he said:

"My Lord, as to the costs I say that the trustees should get their costs as between solicitor and client out of the estate."

Then he says that there ought to be some splitting up of the costs between the various issues in the action. Near the end of the discussion with which the judgment concluded, the learned judge said:

"I have listened to counsel on the question of costs, and if I make what might be called a strict order it would be of the utmost complication and I think it would result in nothing but more expense. The view I take is that part of the trouble has been caused by this action being started by writ instead of being brought before the court on an originating summons. On the other hand, there are certain costs—I do not know how much or what percentage they represent—which have been incurred by the trustees which, in the course the case took, though it might be said it is being wise after the event, need not have been incurred. Taking it by and large, it appears to me that, so far as the trustees are concerned, they as trustees ought to have their costs as between solicitor and client out of the estate. So far as the beneficiaries are concerned, I think on the whole, as they are the persons interested in income and contingently interested in capital and it is extremely difficult to analyse their costs, the best thing to do is to make a similar order as regards their costs. So, in effect, I shall order the costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the estate."

Leading counsel for the trustees asked that there should be a minute signed and there the matter stopped. The order, presumably drawn up by junior counsel, provided for the making of certain declarations by the court, with liberty to apply, and then finally:

"And this court doth order that it be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client the costs of the plaintiff and the defendants both of this action and of the said application by originating summons."

I ought to add that the originating summons referred to in the order was a summons which in the course of the hearing the learned judge directed to be taken out pro forma and the order was made not only on the action initiated by writ, but also on the ancillary subsidiary proceedings which were within the ambit of that originating summons. The order concluded with these words:

"And it is ordered that all the said costs when taxed be retained and paid by the defendants in the said action as the trustees of the said will out of the estate of the said testator."

The costs were in due course referred to the taxing master for taxation and, as I suppose happens on every taxation, a certain amount was disallowed on the bills both of the beneficiaries and of the trustees. The disallowances on the bill of costs of the trustees were, I think, all reductions in the amounts paid to counsel. There is no doubt that the leading counsel who appeared for the trustees is an extremely able practitioner and I have no doubt that the trustees were very anxious to get, with his help, the fullest possible protection. The result of the taxation has been that some £437 was struck off the amount of the disbursements, and the bill was reduced by that amount to the sum of £1,145 ls. 11d. The beneficiaries' costs were taxed, after some deductions, in the sum of £940 5s. 9d., and that sum was paid by the trustees to the solicitors for the beneficiaries in due course.

The point which arises in this case is whether the trustees were entitled to withdraw from the trust estate, and to retain as they have done, that sum of £437. It is said that the trustees are prima facie entitled to have their costs provided to such an extent and in such manner as to afford them a complete indemnity.

Several questions arise on that. First, did the learned judge who tried the action intend them to have a full indemnity for their costs? If this had been an action which was concerned solely with the benefits accruing, or intended to accrue, to the trust estate, in which the trustees had adopted a wholly disinterested and independent attitude, which is the normal attitude of trustees in such cases, I feel little doubt that WYNN-PARRY, J., if he had been asked, would, at any rate, have considered whether to give the trustees full indemnity, though I am bound to say that, reading the passages in his judgment which are relevant, I am inclined to think that the order for the taxation of the trustees' costs as between solicitor and client was something in the nature of a compromise or an adjustment, and, perhaps, rather a rule of thumb regulation of the position. I think that although this action was, perhaps, to some extent for the benefit of the estate, it was still more an action which was concerned with the rights of the trustees personally to obtain moneys for their own personal use. That the learned judge would have allowed them costs on a higher scale than that as between solicitor and client is very doubtful, and I find no sufficient indication in his words that he ever meant them to have more than that which the order stated, which was drawn up in conformity with the words used and in conformity with the interpretation of his intentions by the junior counsel who settled the minute. I find no sufficient indication that he intended the trustees to have more than that which he gave them by the precise terms of the order, i.e., costs as between solicitor and client.

The order of WYNN-PARRY, J., of July 5, 1951, was plain in its terms. The costs of all the parties to that action were to be taxed as between solicitor and client, and it must always be remembered that a taxation as between solicitor and client is not a taxation on an indemnity basis, but is, as was described by BUCKLEY, L.J., in Giles v. Randall (1) ([1915] 1 K.B. 295), "substantially a party and party taxation on a more generous scale." I think what the trustees were entitled to under the order of July 5, 1951, was an order for the taxation of their costs on a generous scale falling short of a taxation which was intended to secure for them a complete indemnity.

I know that there is a general idea that trustees are always entitled to their costs on an indemnity basis, and there is a certain amount of truth in that, provided always that the costs in question have been incurred solely for the purpose of benefiting the trust estate. There is no such rule—certainly I can find no trace of there being any such rule—where the litigation, for it is litigation that we are speaking of in this case, was designed to define and secure the personal rights of the trustees as individuals, and I cannot see on what ground it should be said that it would follow as a natural consequence that, if the judge had been asked, he would have said: "Oh, of course, as trustees they are entitled to be fully indemnified."

In an old case, Poole v. Pass (2), counsel was very careful to ask for some additional words to be put in to entitle his clients to more than the solicitor and client costs of an action, something for the extra costs and expenses incident to and arising out of the action. In the present case, the order was drawn up by junior counsel and no suggestion was ever made that the trustees ought to have more than their costs as between solicitor and client. It is said that where the trustees' expenses in connection with the action exceed the costs as so taxed, they can help themselves by putting their hands into the trust capital and taking out the difference. I do not think that is a matter to which I ought to give the slightest approval. The trustees would be saying to the taxing master: "Tax our costs as between solicitor and client. Disallow anything you like. It does not matter to us in the very least how you tax these costs because we shall, as a matter of right, take out of the trust estate and put into our own pockets the whole of our bill of costs whether you allow it or disallow it." It was extremely improper to allow the taxing master to tax their costs with the intention, possibly then not wholly formed, of disregarding the taxation altogether and treating themselves as being entitled, not only to the taxed costs, but also to the costs which had been taxed off.

A If they considered that there was a slip in the order of WYNN-PARRY, J., the trustees could have applied to the judge for an amendment to be made. Alternatively, the trustees might have applied for the taxation to be reviewed, asking for the restoration of some of the disallowed items on the ground that the taxing master, if he had borne in mind that he was taxing the costs of trustees, would have dealt with the bill in a more generous spirit. The taxing master might not have acceded to that application because he would have been met with the difficulty facing me, the terms of the order itself. But I think that there would have been some ground for saying that, as it was a solicitor and client taxation, while the beneficiaries' costs would be taxed on one footing, the trustees' costs would be dealt with on a wider footing, having regard to the well-founded and well-grounded principle that within reason trustees ought not to be put to any expense.

A good many cases have been brought to my notice, but I do not know that any of them is particularly helpful. The general proposition is that a trustee is entitled to be reimbursed out of trust property all expenses which he has properly incurred having regard to the circumstances of each particular case. In Poole v. Pass (2) an order was made for the payment of the costs of the suit by a mortgagor who was calling on the mortgagee, whose mortgage had been satisfied, to transfer the legal estate to him. At the end of the judgment of LORD LANGDALE, M.R., counsel asked (1 Beav. 604): "As trustee he will have trustee's costs, as between solicitor and client, and the costs of opinion taken?" The answer was: "Yes; I think no trustee would be safe unless such costs were allowed." Then the note is (ibid., 605):

"The defendant was decreed to execute to the plaintiff, or as he should direct, a surrender or assignment of the term, and the master was ordered to tax the defendant his costs of this suit, as between solicitor and client, and to tax him his charges and expenses, properly incurred, to be paid by the plaintiff."

It is the absence of those words from the order of WYNN-PARRY, J., which seem to me to be fatal to the trustees' claim to this £437.

I hesitate to mention, except very briefly, a case of my own, Re Robertson (3), which dealt with the small disallowance of a sum of £2 1s. which had been taxed off the shorthand writers' account in respect of the note which had been taken of the judgment. The taxing master had reduced the charge for that work from £7 13s. to £5 12s., a difference of £2 1s. The taxation had been directed as between solicitor and client. If the course taken by the trustees in the present case were the right one, then similarly in Re Robertson (3) the trustee could have said: "You have allowed me for my shorthand note £5 12s., reducing the charge of £7 13s. to that amount, and the £2 1s. I am entitled to appropriate out of the trust fund notwithstanding the taxation." I think that that case shows conclusively that, if any sum is disallowed from a solicitor and client taxation on a trustee's bill of costs, the trustee must not put the disputed amount in his pocket, but, if he is dissatisfied, must seek the directions of the court.

This action instituted by originating summons must succeed. I think that the proper course for me to adopt is to declare that, having regard to the order of July 5, 1951, the defendants, as trustees of the will, were not entitled to retained the disallowed items amounting to £437. They ought to account for and refund to the residuary estate the whole of the amount so paid and retained over and above the taxed costs. The costs of this application must be paid by the trustees personally as between party and party.

Order accordingly.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. CATTERMOLES (GARAGES), LTD. B

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), April 17, 20, 1953.]

Master and Servant—Liability of master—Liability to third person for act of servant—Act within scope of authority and course of employment—Authorised act done in improper manner—Servant employed as garage hand to move customers' cars in garage—Car driven on to highway in course of being moved from one place to another in garage—Servant having no licence and expressly prohibited from driving. C

The defendants, who were the owners of a garage, employed P. in a general capacity as a garage hand, part of his duty being to move cars in the garage so as to make way for other cars. He had no driving licence and he was forbidden to drive vehicles. In front of the garage were petrol pumps, and on Feb. 7, 1950, the attendant asked P. to remove a motor van, which was stationary in front of the pumps, so as to allow some motor lorries to obtain petrol. Instead of pushing the van out of the way, P. drove it. Finding that there was not sufficient space to drive straight into the garage out of the way of the lorries, he drove on to the highway, intending to turn there so as to come back to the garage behind the lorries. On the highway a collision occurred between the van which P. was driving and a van belonging to the plaintiffs, which was damaged. In an action by the plaintiffs for damages against the defendants, D

HELD: P.'s duty being to move cars in the garage, it was impossible to define the scope of his employment as that of pushing cars by hand in contradistinction to moving them by other means, including that of driving them, and, notwithstanding the fact that he was expressly forbidden to drive cars, his action in moving the van by means of its own engine, instead of by pushing it, was within the scope of his employment, being a wrongful and unauthorised way of performing an act which he was employed to perform; the excursion on to the highway was merely incidental to moving the van out of the way of other motor vehicles on the defendants' premises, the work for which P. was employed, and, therefore, although it was illegal for P. to drive on the highway as he had no licence, the fact that the accident occurred when he took the van off the garage premises on to the highway did not affect the result, and the defendants were liable in damages to the plaintiffs E

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of His Honour JUDGE DONE, made at Clerkenwell County Court, and dated Feb. 5, 1953.

- B The defendants were the owners of a garage situated on premises adjoining Pentonville Road, London. In the front of the premises, between the garage and the road, were petrol pumps. On Feb. 7, 1950, two motor lorries approached the premises to obtain petrol and the employee in charge of the pumps asked one Preston, who was employed by the defendants as a garage hand, to move a motor van which was stationary in front of the pumps. Preston got into the van, started the engine, and drove the van past the pumps into Pentonville
- C Road, intending to turn round there and come back behind the lorries so as to place the van in the garage out of their way. In Pentonville Road the van came into collision with, and damaged, a motor van belonging to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claimed damages, amounting to £23, against the defendants on the ground that the accident was caused by the negligent driving of a servant of the defendants in the course of his employment. The defendants contended
- D that Preston's employment was quite different from that of driving cars, that he had been expressly forbidden to drive cars, and that, therefore, he was not acting in the course of his employment at the time when the accident occurred. The learned judge held that Preston's act in driving the van was wholly unauthorised and he dismissed the action.

Coningsby for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal involves an illustration of the principle (not difficult to state, but by no means always easy to apply), which is found in SALMOND ON TORTS, 11th ed., p. 105. I refer to that passage because it was expressly approved by the Privy Council ([1942] 2 All E.R. 467) in Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. Lockhart (1) (it being then in the ninth edition, at p. 95). It reads:

- G "It is clear that the master is responsible for acts actually authorised by him: for liability would exist in this case, even if the relation between the parties was merely one of agency, and not one of servant at all. But a master, as opposed to the employer of an independent contractor, is liable even for acts which he has not authorised, provided they are so connected with acts which he has authorised that they may rightly be regarded as modes—although improper modes—of doing them. In other words, a master is responsible not merely for what he authorises his servant to do, but also for the way in which he does it . . . On the other hand, if the
- H unauthorised and wrongful act of the servant is not so connected with the authorised act as to be a mode of doing it, but is an independent act, the master is not responsible: for in such a case the servant is not acting in the course of his employment, but has gone outside of it."

In Lockhart's case (1) the facts before the Board were, briefly, these. To enable its employees to get conveniently from one place of work to another, the defendant railway company provided certain cars, known as "track motors", which proceeded on the company's rails. Some of the employees, however, found it more convenient, in getting from one job to another, to use their own motor cars on the road rather than the track motors of the railway company. Having experienced difficulties because the employees' cars were not always properly licensed, the company put up notices expressly prohibiting employees from using their own cars in connection with the company's business unless they were properly insured against, among other things, third-party risks. In disregard of the notice, one of the employees, a carpenter named Stinson, used his own motor car for the purpose of getting from one job to another, although the car was not properly insured. An accident occurred and the question was whether the railway company was liable. The Privy Council, applying the passage from SALMOND ON TORTS, 9th ed., p. 95, held that the company was liable. Their Lordships took the view that Stinson was doing an authorised act, namely, proceeding in the company's service from one job to another in his motor car, but doing it in an unauthorised way, namely, using his car when it was not properly licensed, in disregard of the prohibition. The judgment of the Board was delivered by LORD THANKERTON. At the close of the judgment, LORD THANKERTON used this language ([1942] 2 All E.R. 468), which was relied on by counsel for the defendants in the present case:

"If the prohibition had absolutely forbidden the servant to drive his motor car in course of his employment, it might well have been maintained that he was employed to do carpentry work and not to drive a motor car, and that, therefore, the driving of a motor car was outside the scope of his employment, but it was not the acting as driver that was prohibited, but the non-insurance of the motor car, if used as a means incidental to the execution of the work which he was employed to do."

As I read the judgment, LORD THANKERTON was not there expressing a final conclusion, but was suggesting the possibility of the argument. I have read the passage because it leads, I think, conveniently to the substance of the contention of counsel for the defendants that the job which Preston, the employee in this case, was employed to do was something quite different in its nature and character from the driving of motor cars, and that the accident which occurred arose from the fact that he was then engaged in driving a car and, therefore, was not acting in the course of his employment. In the note of his judgment the learned county court judge said:

"I found that Preston was employed as a general garage hand. It was part of his duties to assist in the movement of cars on the defendants' premises by pushing them or by giving guidance to the driver, e.g., when reversing. But he was not authorised to drive, i.e., to control the movement of vehicles under their own power. He was not competent to drive and had, in fact, been expressly forbidden to do so. I held that this was not a case where the defendants' servant was doing an authorised act in a manner which was unauthorised, but that the act in question, viz., the driving of a car, was outside the scope of what he was employed to do and was wholly unauthorised."

In my judgment, it necessarily follows from that passage that the view of the learned judge was in accordance with the argument which counsel for the defendants addressed to him, namely, that the driving of the motor car was an activity in character and kind distinct from the activity which Preston was employed to perform. With all respect to the learned judge, I have come to a different conclusion.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts in regard to the accident and continued:] The question, then, is: Was Preston, when he executed this manoeuvre, doing an authorised act, that is, something within the scope of his employment, in an unauthorised manner? Or was he doing something quite independent of his employment and altogether outside its ambit or scope? What, then, was the nature and what were the terms of the employment? The learned judge found that

"Preston was employed as a general garage hand. It was part of his duty to assist in the movement of cars on the defendants' premises by pushing them or by giving guidance to the driver, e.g., when reversing."

- A The judge went on to find that Preston was forbidden to drive and there is no question in this court that that was so. But is it true to say that the nature of his employment was of the somewhat limited and curious nature of what I will call man-handling motor cars, and, if so, was that something wholly distinct from moving them by any other means? We have been supplied with notes taken of the learned judge's oral judgment by both the learned counsel
- B who have assisted this court, and on this matter there is a close identity between them. The note of counsel for the plaintiffs contains this statement: "His job was to get cars out of the way of other cars and a great deal of that had to be done by hand". The note of counsel for the defendants is: "Part of his job being to assist in getting cars out of the way of other cars . . ."
- C We also have the judge's note of the witnesses' evidence, and I will turn at once to what the defendants' manager, Mortimer, said of the nature of Preston's employment. He said that he himself did not engage Preston, but that Preston's job was general garage hand and "assisting to shunt vehicles, that is, to assist drivers when reversing by standing behind the vehicles. It was not his job to drive vehicles.

- D At first he was not employed to grease. Then he was asked to fit in on the servicing side."

Then later, but this is not stated as part of the terms of the employment, Mortimer said:

"Preston was not employed to drive himself. I once saw him in a vehicle driving. I warned him if I saw it again I would dismiss him."

- E It appears to me tolerably clear that the terms of Preston's engagement were not very precise. He was employed in a general capacity as a garage hand and part of the functions of a garage hand were to move, or to help to move, cars in the garage so as to make way for other cars which wanted to get in or out. I think, from the evidence, that the prohibition about driving was not a limitation of the scope of his employment so much as a prohibition subsequently
- F insisted on (for obvious reasons) when it was discovered that he was not qualified to drive as he had not got a licence for driving in England. I think it, therefore, impossible to say that Preston was engaged for the defined job of pushing cars by hand, or, indeed, that such a job is one which can be sensibly supposed in contradistinction to moving cars by other means including that
- G of driving them. I am leaving out of account, for the moment, the circumstance, which has caused me a little difficulty, that the accident occurred when Preston was driving the van, not in the garage, but in Pentonville Road. ✓ To that matter I will return, but, for the moment, I confine myself to the general matter of moving cars by driving them under their own motive power as distinct from pushing them or using any other means for moving them. It
- H seems to me that, once the nature of the employment is regarded as I have stated it, then, as a matter of common sense, the result inevitably follows that the use of a motor car's own engine to do the shunting was not something independent of the job of shunting, but was an unauthorised or prohibited mode of doing an authorised job.

We have been referred to a number of cases and of all of them it may be said that, the facts being very different, they cannot be decisive in the present case. But I think that Lockhart's case (1) and Goh Choon Seng v. Lee Kim

Soo (2), also a decision of the Privy Council, tend to support the view that the court does not attempt narrowly to define the precise limit and scope of a man's employment by treating the particular prohibition, express or implied, as limiting the scope of the employment, as distinct from being confined in its application to modes of performance. In Goh Choon Seng v. Lee Kim Soo (2) persons who had been employed, among other things, to collect and set fire to rubbish, had thought fit to carry the rubbish on to someone else's land and set fire to it there. It does not appear that they were expressly prohibited in terms from going on to someone else's land, but, obviously, such a prohibition would be implicit. At least, it could not have been authorised. It was, nevertheless, held by the Board that the damage which flowed from the burning of rubbish on the land of a third party flowed from an act done by the servants in an unauthorised manner but in pursuance of their authorised task. I also cite a few words from the judgment of ROMER, L.J., in Beard v. London General Omnibus Co. (3) (a case in which the decision went the other way), as indicating what I have ventured to call the common sense of the matter. He said ([1900] 2 Q.B. 534):

"If one sees in the streets of London an omnibus admittedly belonging to the defendant company driven in the ordinary way by a person who appears to be a driver, the presumption is that he is authorised by the company."

So here, as it seems to me, if one sees a van on the premises of a garage company being driven by a garage hand, the presumption is that the garage hand is doing something which he is authorised to do. Apart, therefore, from the matter of the highway, to which I will come in a moment, it seems to me, with all respect to the county court judge, that the prohibition against moving cars by driving them did not amount to such a limitation of the scope of Preston's authority that it can be said that he was doing something outside the scope of his employment.

There remains the point that Preston moved the van, not within the precincts of the garage itself, but out on to the highway, on to the Pentonville Road, where, incidentally, he was doing something unlawful, having no licence to drive. The question, then, does arise whether the scope of the employment, defined in general terms as it was by Mortimer, did not extend to the movement of this van out into the street with a view to bringing it back behind the lorries into the yard. I think it is clear that nothing of significance was made of that particular matter in the court below. During the argument the question was asked: Supposing that Preston, obeying the command or request of the petrol pump attendant, had pushed the van on to the highway and then it had caused some accident, whose would the liability have been? All that was said that was material on this point was this by Mortimer, in cross-examination, in regard to whether Preston was permitted to push a car on to the road:

"Not on to the road; there would be nothing wrong for him to push it on to the ramp."

By the ramp, I understand, is meant not the inside of the garage but that part of the defendants' premises on which the pumps were. Again, it is important to bear in mind the circumstances of the accident. Preston himself said (and there seems to be no reason to doubt it, nor was he cross-examined on it) that originally he intended to move the car (albeit by the prohibited method of driving) out of the lorries' way, by going forward and then back again into a doorway, but the possibility of so doing was prevented by the fact that the lorries were too close behind him to enable him to get back, and, therefore, to get out of the way, he had to get out into the Pentonville Road. In the circumstances, it seems to me that the excursion on to the Pentonville Road is purely incidental to what Preston was doing. And what he was doing was something which he was engaged to do. In general terms, he was getting this van out of the way of two other motor vehicles. I do not, therefore, think that the result is altered by the circumstance that Preston took this van off the garage premises on to the Queen's highway.

A I said at the beginning of my judgment that the principle is not difficult to state. The difficulty has been in its application. Giving the matter the best attention that I can and applying (as I hope that I am entitled to do) some degree of common sense to the matter, I conclude (contrary to the view of the learned judge) that Preston was here doing no more than performing in an unauthorised way an act he was employed to perform. In my judgment, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and, accordingly, this appeal should be allowed.

B BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. My view of this case is that Preston's act, which has given rise to the dispute, was merely a wrongful and unauthorised mode of doing an act authorised by the employer. I think that the learned county court judge, in coming to the conclusion that he did, fell into a very pardonable error in regarding the act of driving, in itself, as being a conclusive thing. In Century Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Northern Ireland Road Transport Board (4) the driver of a petrol lorry threw down a lighted match while petrol was being delivered to a garage, and a fire broke out. LORD WRIGHT said C ([1942] 1 All E.R. 497):

D "The duty of the workman to his employer is so to conduct himself in doing his work as not negligently to cause damage either to the employer himself or his property or to third persons or their property, and thus to impose the same liability on the employer as if he had been doing the work himself and committed the negligent act. This may seem too obvious as a matter of common sense to require either argument or authority. I think that what plausibility the contrary argument might seem to possess results from treating the act of lighting the cigarette in abstraction from the circumstances as a separate act."

E With great respect to the learned county court judge, I think that is what he did in the present case, because, in the note of his judgment, the clear line of demarcation that he made was that Preston was not authorised to drive and, therefore, what he did was outside the scope of his employment, whereas, I think, the view which ought to be taken on the facts, and on the authorities which have dealt with similar facts, is that this was a wrongful and unauthorised mode of doing the act authorised by the master. In Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. Lockhart (1) LORD THANKERTON, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 468): F

"In these cases the first consideration is the ascertainment of what the servant was employed to do. The existence of prohibitions may, or may not, be evidence of the limits of the employment."

G The first consideration, therefore, is to gather the scope of the employment. The conclusion to which I come on the evidence is that the scope of Preston's employment was as a general garage hand, part of his job being to get cars out of the way so as to allow other cars to move freely in the garage. In SALMOND ON TORTS, 11th ed., p. 109, it is stated:

H "Even expressed prohibition of the wrongful act is no defence to the master, if that act was merely a mode of doing what the servant was employed to do."

Therefore, having arrived at a conclusion as to what was the scope of Preston's employment, my own view is that, notwithstanding the "expressed prohibition", the driving of the car in the circumstances of this case was not something outside the scope of his employment, but was merely a wrongful, improper, and unauthorised mode of doing an act which was authorised by the master, so as to make the master liable.

I confess that I was disturbed by the point, which was raised by ROMER, L.J., in the course of the argument, that, as the accident occurred, not in the defendants' garage, but on the highway, different considerations might apply. To drive on the highway without a licence, as Preston did, was to do an illegal act. That was something completely and entirely outside the scope of the employment, so the argument runs, and it could not be said to be an unauthorised way of doing an authorised act. On reflection, however, I agree with the view which has been expressed by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. A
On the facts of the case, driving the van on to the highway seems to be quite an incidental matter. It was not as if Preston was driving a customer's car some forty or fifty miles. It was part of the movement of the van to enable the business of the garage to go on. He was merely moving the van out of the way of the lorries, and, in the circumstances, it was impossible to fulfil that duty without taking the course that he did, which involved his going on the highway where the accident took place. Had he not done that, the accident would not have occurred, but I cannot think that the mere fact that he went on to the highway and that, as he had no licence, his act was illegal, makes any difference. I think the true view to take of the matter is that driving the van on to the highway was merely an incidental part of performing the act which he was employed to do, though it was an unauthorised way of doing it. For these reasons I agree with the judgment delivered by my Lord and that this appeal should be allowed. B C

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. I was troubled a little, at one time during the discussion, about the point which BIRKETT, L.J., referred to towards the end of his judgment, namely, the question whether the fact that the accident took place, not within the curtilage of the garage premises, but on the public highway outside, made any difference. The learned judge, in his short note of judgment, said: D

"It was part of [Preston's] duties to assist in the movement of cars on the defendants' premises by pushing them."

According to a note made by one of learned counsel, the judge also said: E
"Preston was authorised to push vehicles in the garage". It was not quite clear to me whether a point could not be made to the effect that a necessary inference from those statements of the judge was that anything that was done by Preston outside the defendants' premises was something done outside the scope of his employment. But the point does not appear to have been a great deal relied on in the court below. It was used for a somewhat different purpose, F and, certainly, I think, formed no foundation for the learned judge's decision. I think, on reflection, that counsel for the plaintiff was justified in submitting that the act of taking the van on to the road was not an independent act in itself, but was part of the act of getting the van out of the way. I do not think that the learned judge was intending to define the premises within which alone the defendants authorised Preston to do the work, and, accordingly, it follows G from the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs that the accident took place within the area of Preston's authorised activities. If that be so, I have practically nothing to add to what my brethren have said, because it seems to me that the facts bring this case clearly within the third proposition which was laid down by the Privy Council in Goh Choon Seng v. Lee Kim Soo (2), where judgment was delivered by LORD PHILLIMORE. I need not refer to the first of the two H heads which LORD PHILLIMORE laid down. The third one is ([1925] A.C. 554):

"... where the servant is doing some work which he is appointed to do, but does it in a way which his master has not authorised and would not have authorised, had he known of it."

That statement was afterwards elaborated and affirmed in the later decision of the Privy Council in Lockhart's case (1), and, applying it, it seems to me that, when Preston was told to keep the garage clear from other cars, it involved the movement of cars and the mode in which he chose to perform that duty was a subsidiary part of the function itself, and the fact that he chose what, after all, is a usual and not an abnormal method of doing it brings the matter within the operation of the law as stated in those cases. It was an unauthorised method of doing an authorised act, and, according to the law, as decided in those cases, the employer is liable for the consequences. I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

MCDONALD v. JOHN TWINAME, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), June 22, 23, 1953.]

C Master and Servant—Apprenticeship—Agreement in writing executed by apprentice—Name of master inserted by rubber stamp—Later acknowledgment and adoption by master of agreement—Apprentices Act, 1814 (c. 96), s. 2.

D On May 12, 1947, the plaintiff, then fifteen and a half years of age, entered the employment of the defendant company. Later, the defendants gave to the plaintiff a form of apprenticeship agreement headed: "Deed of Apprenticeship" which purported to bind the plaintiff for a term of five years. The plaintiff and his father executed the document. The defendants did not execute it, but an officer of the company inserted their name in the document by means of a rubber stamp. In December, 1949, the plaintiff applied to the Ministry of Labour and National Service for deferment of his national service on the ground that he was an apprentice under a five years' written agreement terminating on Oct. 9, 1952. The defendants certified that the plaintiff was such an apprentice, and on Jan. 16, 1950, sent to the Ministry a copy of the agreement which purported to show that the original had been properly executed by the defendants. On Nov. 16, 1951, the plaintiff was summarily dismissed on the ground of misconduct, but the court held that, although his conduct was in breach of one of the express terms of that deed, it was not such as to entitle the defendants summarily to dismiss him. On a claim by the plaintiff for damages for the wrongful determination of his apprenticeship agreement,

G HELD: from the date of its execution by the plaintiff the defendants took the benefit of the agreement and of such services as the plaintiff rendered; they must be taken to have adopted the agreement and to have affirmed its existence when they sent a copy to the Ministry; and, therefore, although they did not execute the agreement, they must be treated as bound by it as if they had executed it, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: since, under s. 32 (1) (a) and (b) of the Companies Act, 1948, an apprenticeship agreement need not be made under the seal of a company, but might be made on behalf of a company in writing signed by a person acting under its authority, by the insertion by one of their officers in the agreement of their name by means of a stamp the defendants had entered into the agreement within the meaning of s. 2 of the Apprentices Act, 1814, and so were bound by it.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE FENWICK at Workington and Cocker-mouth County Court, dated Apr. 2, 1953, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for £71 10s. damages for the breach by the defendants of an apprenticeship agreement. C

The plaintiff was born on Oct. 10, 1931, and on May 12, 1947, he entered the employ of the defendants with the object of learning the craft of plasterer. At some later date the defendants sent him a form issued by the National Joint Council for the Building Industry and entitled: "Deed of Apprenticeship. No. 1". In that form the defendants as masters had inserted their name and address by means of a rubber stamp in the recital of parties to the deed, had deleted the words at the end, namely, "In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written", and had inserted their name, again by means of a rubber stamp, in the space provided in the words "The Common Seal of . . . Limited, was hereunto affixed in the presence of". The plaintiff, as apprentice, inserted his name and address as party to the deed, and in the relevant spaces he inserted the word "plasterer" to denote his apprentice trade and completed the clause relating to the term of apprenticeship so as to read: ". . . for the term of five years to be computed from Oct. 10, 1947." The plaintiff signed the deed as apprentice in the presence of John J. Brown. The plaintiff's father, as guardian, inserted his name as a party to the deed, but in the space allotted to the representative selected by the local joint apprenticeship committee, and he signed at the end as parent in the presence of John J. Brown. The plaintiff returned the document to the defendants who made no additions or alteration to it. On Dec. 18, 1949, the plaintiff applied for deferment of his national service, and completed a form in which he described himself as an apprentice plasterer under a five years' written agreement. The back of the form was completed by the defendants, as employers, who certified that the plaintiff was serving as an apprentice. On Jan. 16, 1950, the defendants sent this form to the office of the Ministry of Labour and National Service and enclosed a copy of the "deed of apprenticeship" in which they made certain variations in the filling up of the blank spaces, viz., the name of the guardian was inserted in the correct space, the West Cumberland Building Trades Association was entered as the fourth party to the deed, the name "W. Sandwith" was inserted in the space at the end for the signature of their representative, and, finally, the words: "In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written", were not deleted, the name R. J. S. Atkinson was inserted in the space "The Common Seal of John Twiname, Ltd. was affixed in the presence of . . .", and the name John Twiname was inserted in the space for the signature of the master. D

On Feb. 14, 1950, the plaintiff was granted deferment until Dec. 17, 1950. On Nov. 28, 1950, and again on Oct. 25, 1951, the defendants certified that the plaintiff "who commenced his apprenticeship with this firm on May 12, 1947, is making satisfactory progress" and, as a result, further deferment was on each occasion granted to the plaintiff. On Nov. 16, 1951, the plaintiff was summarily dismissed.

- A By his particulars of claim dated Oct. 20, 1952, as amended on Apr. 2, 1953, the plaintiff claimed £71 10s. damages for the wrongful determination of his apprenticeship agreement. The defendants, by their defence, denied that the plaintiff was an apprentice, and, further, that they had wrongfully dismissed him. Further, or in the alternative, they said that, if the plaintiff was employed by them, such employment was properly determined by reason of his misconduct. The county court judge found that there was no enforceable contract for five B years, that the plaintiff had no greater rights than those under a normal contract of service, that the dismissal was justified, and that, therefore, the action failed. Accordingly, he gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

John Thompson for the plaintiff.

Sellers for the defendants.

- C SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: I will, first, deal with a submission made by counsel for the defendants, that, whether or not there was a valid and enforceable apprenticeship agreement, the conduct of the plaintiff (who appears after a time to have developed conceit and insolence and to have indulged in insubordination) amounted to subversive conduct of such a kind that his continued presence on the defendants' premises was an embarrassment, D not only to the management, but also to the workmen employed there, and was such that it entitled the defendants in any event to dismiss him summarily. I cannot help feeling sympathy with the defendants having regard to the findings of fact as to this young man's foolish conduct, but, in my opinion, assuming that the plaintiff was, in truth, an apprentice, his conduct was not such as entitled the master to exercise the remedy of summary dismissal. E Beyond doubt, on the assumption again that there was here an apprenticeship agreement, the plaintiff's conduct involved a breach of one of its express terms, namely:

- F "That during the continuance of the apprenticeship the apprentice will faithfully and honestly serve the master as his apprentice and be diligent to learn the craft aforesaid and will at all times willingly obey and perform the lawful and reasonable commands and requirements of the master."

- G But the document itself provides a remedy for the master in the event of his being dissatisfied with the behaviour of the apprentice. In other words, I think the case falls short of the extreme examples, to which reference was made in Waterman v. Fryer (1), cited by counsel for the defendants—for instance, Learoyd v. Brook (2) where the apprentice had the habit of stealing and so made the continued relationship of master and apprentice wholly impossible.

- H The only question, therefore, which remains is: Was there here at the relevant date an effective apprenticeship agreement? The plaintiff relies on the existence of an apprenticeship agreement or deed and alleges that it has been wrongfully broken. To discover what constitutes an effective apprenticeship agreement it will be necessary for me to refer briefly to the statute 5 Eliz. 1, c. 4 and the Apprentices Act, 1814. Until the Act of 1814 an apprentice had to be bound by deed, but that Act considerably modified that requirement. It is intitled

"An Act to amend an Act passed in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth, intituled 'An Act containing divers orders for artificers, labourers, servants of husbandry, and apprentices'."

Section 2 reads:

"And whereas by the said statute, divers rules and regulations were enacted respecting the qualifications of persons entitled to take and become apprentices, and the term of years for which such apprentices should be bound, and as to the mode of binding such apprentices; and it was also enacted by the said statute that all indentures, covenants, promises, and bargains of and for the having, taking, or keeping of any apprentice otherwise thereafter to be made or taken than is by the said statute limited, ordained, and appointed, should be clearly void in the law to all intents and purposes; and that every person that should from thenceforth take or newly retain any apprentice contrary to the tenor and true meaning of the said Act, should forfeit and lose for every apprentice so by him taken the sum of £10: And whereas it is expedient that so much of the said recited Act should be repealed: Be it therefore enacted, that so much of the said recited Act shall be and the same is hereby repealed; and that it shall and may be lawful for any person to take or retain or become an apprentice, though not according to the provisions of the said Act; and that indentures, deeds, and agreements in writing entered into for that purpose, which would be otherwise valid and effectual, shall be valid and effectual in law, the repeal of so much of the said Act as is herein last above recited notwithstanding."

The question of the exact extent of the repeal and of the subsequent enactment is not entirely free from obscurity, but this much is plain, that, whereas before the passing of this Act an apprenticeship deed was necessary, it now suffices if an apprenticeship agreement in writing is entered into by the parties to be bound by it. No other question as to validity arises in the present case, e.g., as to the length of service or otherwise.

With that premise I turn to the facts of this case. It appears that the plaintiff, then under sixteen years of age, offered himself to the defendants as an apprentice; he was taken on, but no agreement of any sort, recorded or evidenced in any writing, was then made and it was only after he had been in the service of the defendants for a time that the writing to which I shall refer came into being. I understand from counsel for the defendants that the reason for that procedure was that the defendants wanted to see more of the boy before they finally bound themselves and him by a written document which would last for several years. Subsequent events would, no doubt, have made it clear that the defendants misinterpreted the virtues of the boy, but it seems no less plain that during the period of probation he was acting as an apprentice though the statutory requirements had not been satisfied. There is no question, to my mind, of his having been employed as an ordinary servant or workman. [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the "deed of apprenticeship" and continued:] It appears that this document, with the name John Twiname, Ltd., impressed thereon, was sent to the plaintiff, executed by him, and by his father and returned. According to the evidence, it was then sent to the local area apprenticeship committee, but they returned it and nothing more was done in regard to it. It is, however, in my opinion, plain that from that time onwards the relationship between the defendants and the plaintiff was regarded by both as regulated, and that it was, in fact, regulated, by the terms of this written document. The execution by the plaintiff and his father, we must assume, was execution by them as their deed. It had not been executed at all by the defendants in the sense of having the common seal of the company affixed or otherwise (if at all) than by the placing of the stamped name of the company on it at the beginning and at the end.

If the matter had rested there, it would be a question of doubt, to put it no higher, whether the terms of the Act of 1814 had been satisfied. But the matter does not rest there. The relationship continued and eventually a question arose of the plaintiff being called up for military service. [His Lordship referred to the application for deferment and the copy deed of apprenticeship sent to the Ministry of Labour and National Service and continued:] The learned judge, I think, fell into an error in regard to the copy deed for he seems to have thought that the question was whether that document was admissible as evidence of the original document. That, however, is not so. The judge said:

- A "In 1950 Twinames wrote a letter to the Ministry of Labour. I have come to the conclusion that that document is admissible in evidence for the purpose of the Statute of Frauds. I so admit it and no further."

In my judgment, no question arises in regard to the Statute of Frauds. We are not concerned with the question whether there was an oral agreement of which there is a memorandum in writing. We are concerned to see whether s. 2 of the Act of 1814 has been satisfied, namely, whether there is a written agreement entered into by the defendants. The purpose of putting in evidence this document attached to the Ministry of Labour form is not to prove the contents of the original deed, which are not in doubt, but to prove an independent fact, namely, that in 1950 the defendants were showing by their certificate that the affixing to the original deed of the stamped name "John Twiname, Ltd." (which is a printed signature of a limited company) was done with their authority and either as equivalent to a signature or so as to indicate that the defendants were in truth entering into the apprenticeship document. That is the purpose for which the plaintiff seeks to use this document and for such purpose, in my judgment, the document is plainly admissible in evidence.

- D But there is, I think, a further ground on which the plaintiff here must be entitled to succeed. The facts which I have recited show that the original so-called deed was executed as a deed by the plaintiff and his father, but was not executed as a deed by the defendants. From the date of its execution, however, it seems to me plain that the defendants regarded themselves as governed in their relations with the plaintiff by the terms of the deed and took the benefit of it and of such services as he rendered. That is further shown by the circumstance that the defendants supported the plaintiff's application for deferment. In face of those facts I think that the two cases which counsel for the plaintiff cited in opening, R. v. St. Peter's-on-the-Hill (3), and R. v. Fleet (4), are authority for the view that the defendants, although they did not execute this deed, must be treated as bound by it, as if they had so executed it, so as to satisfy the requirements of the statute of 5 Eliz. 1, c. 4. I do not propose to take time to refer in detail to those cases. In each case a young person had been taken on by a master as an apprentice, the apprentice had executed a deed, but the master had not, and the master was held to be bound as though he or she had so executed. Counsel for the defendants made the point that there was an essential distinction between those two cases and the present. He said that in those cases there was never any relationship between the master and the apprentice until the deed executed by the latter came into existence, whereas in the present case there was the earlier relationship from the time when the plaintiff offered himself as an apprentice to the defendants. But although there is that difference in fact it does not, I think, provide a difference of significance. For the plaintiff was never taken on in any capacity other than as an apprentice, though until this document came into existence the statutory requirements in regard to apprenticeships had not been satisfied. I think, therefore, on the authority which those two cases provide, that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed and to make good his submission that the defendants must be treated in this action as though they had executed as a deed the document referred to.

I think, as I have already indicated, that the plaintiff might also be entitled to claim that the Act of 1814 was satisfied in that the insertion of the stamped name "John Twiname, Ltd." must be treated as having constituted an "entering into" a written agreement by the defendants—a fact which the later certificate of the defendants and the copy agreement attached to it seems to me clearly to have indicated. A limited company can sign a document by means of some duly authorised person putting its printed signature to it or impressing the printed name of the company on it. That will suffice as a proper execution except in cases where the common seal must be affixed, and the execution of an apprenticeship agreement, as I read s. 32 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948, is not such a case. On that ground I think the plaintiff might well succeed in showing that the defendants did enter into an agreement in writing in this case, but it is sufficient for the plaintiff to rest on his first point, namely, that there was here a deed or its equivalent, and, accordingly, that the defendants must be treated as bound by the terms of this so-called deed of apprenticeship.

The result of that conclusion is that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed in the action, that the judgment of the learned county court judge must be set aside, and that there should be judgment for the plaintiff for the sum claimed by him, £71 10s.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. There are two main questions to be determined. The first is whether the court is satisfied that there was, on all the facts and documents, a valid subsisting and enforceable apprenticeship agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants. The second is whether the conduct which is detailed in the evidence was of a character which justified the defendants in summarily dismissing the plaintiff. It is enough for me to say that I am of the same opinion as my Lord on both those questions.

It is plain from the evidence which has been recited here and that which was given in the court below that the plaintiff and his father executed the document to which we have been referred and that on that document appears a stamp giving the name and address of the defendants. It is plain, in my opinion, that, although they never executed the document in the full sense of that term, they most certainly must be taken on the evidence not only to have adopted it, but to have acted on it and to have affirmed its existence when they sent a copy to the Ministry of Labour. It was suggested in argument by counsel for the defendants that they had accepted no benefits under the document. It is clear that they did, and I do not think it can be reasonably contended that in the circumstances there was not a valid subsisting and enforceable apprenticeship agreement. Being of the opinion that, if that be so, the conduct of the apprentice in this case, however reprehensible it might have been, did not reach that scale which would permit the defendants summarily to determine the agreement, I think this appeal ought to be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. The principle on which counsel for the plaintiff relied as supporting his first point when he opened his appeal before us is stated in NORTON ON DEEDS, 2nd ed., p. 26, as follows:

"Though execution of a deed is necessary to bind the grantor, yet a party who takes the benefit of a deed is bound by it though he does not execute it."

The rule plainly has a very ancient origin, as can be seen by the references there to LITTLETON, s. 374, and to the Year Book of 8 Edw. 4 (1468), 8 b. The author proceeds:

"and such non-executing party can sue on covenants with him contained in the deed."

It is true that here no premium was paid and no money passed to the defendants, but it is equally true that they were entitled, from the moment that the plaintiff and his father signed the document, to the benefit of the covenants by them which the document contained, and that must be regarded in the eye of the law as consideration for the corresponding obligations which the defendants themselves undertook. I can see no answer to that point, on which counsel for the plaintiff relies, with the result that the document, whether or not, in fact, executed by the defendants, is binding on them by reason of the fact that they took the benefit of its provisions. That being so, it is not necessary to express any concluded view whether or not the defendants must be regarded as having entered into this written agreement. The Act of 1814 dispenses with the necessity of a deed, but there is authority: see, for example, Kirkby v. Taylor (5), that, notwithstanding the general terms in which the Act is framed, an agreement in writing is necessary. All I would say with regard to the question whether the defendants should be treated as having entered into an agreement of apprenticeship in writing is that I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., that there is much to be said on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that they should be so treated having regard to the presence of the rubber stamp and the subsequent confirmation and assurance which they gave on the occasion of the application by the apprentice for deferment. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

KING v. KING.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Davies, J.), July 6, 1953.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Decree of judicial separation already pronounced—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 23 (1).

On Jan. 28, 1953, the wife obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of the husband's adultery, and on May 7, 1953, she took out a summons under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), for a maintenance order, alleging that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. The husband entered a general appearance, but on June 5, 1953, he issued a summons for leave to amend his appearance to one "under protest, the [husband] disputing that the court has jurisdiction to entertain the [wife's] application" on the ground that, as the wife had already obtained a decree of judicial separation, the court no longer had jurisdiction to make an order under s. 23 (1).

HELD: the court had jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation, although, in view of the fact that she had already been granted a decree, no further decree could be granted her, and, therefore, the court had jurisdiction under s. 23 (1) of the Act to entertain the wife's application.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

Fairweather for the wife.

DAVIES, J.: On July 31, 1952, the House of Lords ([1952] 2 All E.R. 584) dismissed the husband's appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal, dated Oct. 25, 1951, reversing a decision of BARNARD, J., who had pronounced a decree nisi in favour of the husband on the ground of cruelty, exercising his discretion in respect of the husband's admitted adultery. On Sept. 3, 1952, the wife petitioned for a judicial separation on the ground of the husband's adultery. This petition was undefended, and a decree of judicial separation was pronounced on Jan. 28, 1953. The wife thereafter made no application for permanent alimony, but on May 7, 1953, she took out an originating summons under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), alleging that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her. It is admitted by counsel for the wife that the reason why she has chosen to apply under s. 23 (1), rather than to apply for alimony under s. 20 (2) is the fact that under s. 23 (2) the court has power to order that periodical payments shall be secured, but under s. 20 (2) there is no such power to order security for alimony. To the wife's originating summons the husband at first entered a general appearance, but, on June 5, 1953, by the present summons he applied for leave to amend his appearance by adding thereto the words "under protest, the [husband] disputing that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the application", and for directions as to the determination of the question arising by reason of such an appearance. This summons was adjourned by the registrar to the judge and came on for hearing before me in chambers on June 24 last.

The argument of counsel for the husband is essentially a short and simple one and is based entirely on the words of s. 23 (1) of the Act. That sub-section, so far as is material, provides:

"Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife . . . the court, if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation, may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just . . ."

The important words for the purpose of the point which has to be decided are: "if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation". The contention for the husband is that it is a condition precedent to the exercise of the jurisdiction given by this section that the court should at the date of the wife's application have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for a judicial separation, and that in the present case, as the wife has already obtained such a decree, which remains in full force and effect, the court would have and has no such jurisdiction. It is impossible, it is said, for a court to pronounce a decree of judicial separation between parties who are already judicially separated, and this is an objection which would go not merely to the merits of any such petition by the wife, but to jurisdiction. To construe the section in any other way would, it is said, be in effect to read into the section the word "had" between the words "have" and "jurisdiction".

Counsel for the wife, on the other hand, contends that the words on which the husband's argument is based do no more than define the ambit of the application of the section. If it were not for their presence, there might well be a doubt whether the jurisdiction depended on domicile, on residence, or on mere presence in this country. The effect of these words, it is said, is merely to provide that a wife may apply to the court under the section if the residence or domicile of the parties is such that the wife could petition for a decree of judicial separation. The mere fact that there is already in existence a decree of judicial separation would not prevent the court from entertaining another suit for the same relief, though it would, no doubt, prevent the court from granting a decree. It is also suggested that the legislature, when enacting the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 5, which was, of course, the precursor of s. 23 of the Act of 1950, must have intended to give an adequate remedy and to include the right to ask for a secured provision to wives who are unwilling either to divorce their husbands or to adopt the often insincere device of a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, and that it could not have been intended that a wife who has obtained a decree of judicial separation should be able to apply to a court of summary jurisdiction, whose powers are limited in amount, for an order on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain—as she, undoubtedly, can: Cooper v. Cooper (1)—but should in precisely similar circumstances be prevented from applying to this court where there is no financial limit.

I confess that I do not find that last argument particularly convincing. The intention of the legislature is a matter on which it is frequently dangerous to speculate, and, as counsel for the husband pointed out, it is equally possible that the legislature, when enacting s. 20 (2), may have deliberately intended not to empower the court to order security and to give merely a power similar to that of courts of summary jurisdiction to order payments to be made. Moreover, it is plain that the present problem could not arise in connection with the exercise of the powers of a court of summary jurisdiction, for the relevant words of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4, are:

“Any married woman . . . whose husband shall have been guilty of . . . wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her . . . may apply . . .”

In the course of the argument three authorities were cited: Rusby v. Rusby (2) where LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1950] W.N. 349):

“Before the court entertains an application of this sort [under s. 23 (1)] it is first of all necessary for it to satisfy itself that it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation. [Counsel for the husband] has rightly refrained, in my opinion, from suggesting that that means that one has to enquire whether the circumstances are such that a decree of judicial separation should be pronounced. What is meant is that the status of the parties as regards domicile, residence or the like is such that the court would have jurisdiction as between those parties to pronounce a decree of judicial separation. If that condition is satisfied, then it has jurisdiction to entertain an application of this kind.”

That decision was followed by WILLMER, J., in Woodward v. Woodward (3). In that case a respondent to a summons under s. 23 (1) took the preliminary point that, as the wife alleged that the respondent had deserted her for a period of less than three years, the court would not have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for judicial separation based on such desertion, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under s. 23. WILLMER, J., decided against the husband's contention and said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 226):

“In my judgment, the argument, attractive as it is, is entirely fallacious, because it confuses the question whether there is jurisdiction to entertain proceedings with the question whether there are in fact good grounds for proceedings. Merely because, in a particular case, the wife would necessarily have failed had she instituted proceedings for judicial separation, it does not in the least follow that the court would have no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings. The jurisdiction to entertain proceedings depends on domicile and residence of the parties. That is quite a separate matter from the merits of the claim that is put forward. It seems to me that any other view would involve that this new enactment added nothing to the remedies already open to the wife. Yet, quite clearly, I should have thought, s. 23 (1) was intended to confer a new remedy.”

Finally, I was referred to an observation made by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in the course of his judgment in the Divisional Court in Cooper v. Cooper (1). The actual point decided in that case was, as I have already indicated, that a wife who has obtained a decree of judicial separation is entitled to apply to a court of summary jurisdiction for an order on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain, but in the course of his judgment the learned President said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 861):

“ . . . apart altogether from any proceedings which she could take for alimony in the suit for judicial separation, under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), she has the right to sue in the High Court for wilful neglect to maintain.”

It is true that that observation of the learned President was obiter and that this particular point was not argued, but I am sure that the observation was not made without due consideration, and it is obvious that any dictum of the President on a matter of this sort is one to which great weight must be given. If the President's view is right, it is conclusive in the present case.

After having had the benefit of a full argument, I confess that I do not find the point easy, and I cannot help feeling that the wording of the statute might with advantage have been clearer, but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the present case is covered by the decision of WILLMER, J., in Woodward v. Woodward (3), and that the contention of the wife is correct. As it seems to me, there is no essential difference on this issue between the position of a wife who petitions for judicial separation on a ground which in law does not entitle her to such a decree, as was notionally the case in Woodward v. Woodward (3), and that of a wife who petitions for judicial separation when by reason of the existence of a previous decree she cannot hope in the event to be successful. If the objection in the former case is one which goes only to the merits and not to jurisdiction, as WILLMER, J., held, so, in my judgment, must be the objection in the latter case. In both cases, as it seems to me, the court can entertain the petition, though in neither case would a decree be pronounced. In my opinion, therefore, the husband's preliminary objection fails, and the wife is entitled to proceed with her application under s. 23 (1). Needless to say, I am fortified in the conclusion at which I have arrived by the observation made by the President in Cooper v. Cooper (1), to which I have already referred.

There is, in my opinion, one other consideration which supports this conclusion. It is, as I understand it, conceded on behalf of the husband that where the parties are, for example, resident within the jurisdiction, the wife would have a right to apply for, and might succeed in obtaining, an order under s. 23 (1), even though on the facts and the merits she would have no hope of obtaining a decree of judicial separation. If that is so, it would indeed be remarkable if a wife who has on the merits established her right to such a decree, is to be shut out from the remedy given by the section. In the result the husband's summons will be dismissed with costs.

Summons dismissed.

R. v. SIMONS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.),
July 6, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Taking into consideration offence not within jurisdiction of court passing sentence—Offence only triable on indictment by election of defendant—No election by defendant.

A Street Traffic—Offence under Road Traffic Acts—Outstanding offence—Taking into consideration on conviction of some other offence.

The applicant was convicted at quarter sessions of various offences and was sentenced to three years' corrective training. In sentencing him an offence of driving a motor vehicle while disqualified was taken into consideration. The magistrates had committed him for trial for that offence, but he was not indicted for it at quarter sessions as there was some doubt whether he had exercised his right to be tried by a jury under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (1).

C HELD: in the absence of a claim by the applicant to be tried by a jury quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to try him on the charge of driving while disqualified, and, therefore, ought not to have taken that offence into consideration when passing sentence for the offences which that court had power to try, but, in the circumstances of the case, the court would not interfere with the sentence passed on the applicant.

D Per curiam (i): offences against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, in relation to the driving, insurance, or otherwise, of motor vehicles ought not to be taken into consideration when passing sentence on a conviction of some other offence. They should be prosecuted separately, because there are special provisions in the Act relating to indorsement or disqualification for holding a licence which can only follow on a conviction.

E (ii) if there has been a committal for trial at quarter sessions for an offence and there is doubt whether the prisoner has elected to be tried on indictment, the committal cannot be quashed. The indictment should contain a count for the offence and the court should quash that count.

AS TO TAKING OTHER OFFENCES INTO CONSIDERATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 258, para. 365; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 472, 473, Nos. 5070-5103.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against sentence.

G On Apr. 16, 1953, the applicant, Kenneth Alfred Simons, was charged at Leicester City Quarter Sessions with taking and driving away a motor vehicle without the owner's consent (contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 28 (1)), dangerous driving, storebreaking, and larceny. He pleaded Guilty to taking the vehicle, to receiving, and to dangerous driving, and was sentenced to three years' corrective training. One other offence of driving while disqualified was taken into consideration.

No counsel appeared.

H LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court in which he stated the facts and continued: It is with regard to the offence that was taken into consideration that this court desires to make a comment, because we are not giving leave to appeal. The applicant had also been charged when before the magistrates with driving a motor vehicle while disqualified, which is a summary offence punishable with six months' imprisonment under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 7 (4). The applicant was committed for trial by the magistrates for driving while disqualified, but he could only be tried on indictment for that offence if he claimed the right to be tried by a jury under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (1) (now the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 25 (1)), which provided that, if a person is liable to be sentenced to more than three months' imprisonment, he can elect to be tried by a jury. When the case came before quarter sessions, the applicant was not indicted for that offence because there seemed to be some difference of opinion whether or not he wished to be tried by a jury, and the learned recorder was asked to quash the committal. I do not know how you quash a committal, and I do not think you can. The only thing the court can do is to quash the relevant count in the indictment. As he had been committed for trial, and as there was a doubt whether he had elected to go for trial, it would have been better in the circumstances to have included a count for that offence in the indictment. If he had been indicted, as he ought to have been, evidence could have been given whether or not he had elected to go for trial by calling the magistrates' clerk, and, if the recorder had come to the conclusion that he had not elected to go for trial, he could have quashed the count. After the conviction of the other offences, the recorder took into consideration this offence of driving while disqualified. There are two objections against doing that. The first is that, if quarter sessions have no power to try the offence, they cannot take it into consideration when passing sentence for another offence. Secondly, this court has laid down in unmistakable terms in R. v. Collins (1) that offences in relation to the driving of motor cars ought not to be taken into account in any court where there is a conviction of some other offence, for the reason that there are special provisions in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 7 and s. 8, with regard to indorsement of or disqualification for holding a licence, and the disqualification or the indorsement can only follow on a conviction. When the court says it takes a matter into consideration, that does not amount in law to a conviction. The court would like to repeat (i) that, if a court has no jurisdiction to try a particular offence, it ought not to take that offence into account when passing sentence for an offence which it has power to try, and (ii) that offences against the Road Traffic Acts in relation to the driving, insurance, or otherwise, of motor vehicles, ought not to be taken into account when sentence is being passed for other offences, but should be prosecuted separately because the law requires magistrates to take certain steps with regard to indorsement or disqualification for holding a licence which can only be taken if there is a conviction. But there is no ground for interfering with the sentences passed in this case and, therefore, this application for leave to appeal is refused.

Application dismissed.

BULL v. BULL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 23, 24, 1953.]

Divorce—Desertion—House occupied by both parties—Desertion by wife—Return to matrimonial home—No resumption of cohabitation.

A A wife deserted her husband for two periods, in 1946 for approximately six months and in 1947-48 for approximately twelve months. In 1948 she returned at her husband's request to the matrimonial home and subsequently cooked his meals and did occasional mending for him, but otherwise had as little communication with him as possible. There had been no sexual intercourse between the parties since 1936. On Sept. 9, 1952, the husband petitioned for a decree nisi on the ground of his wife's desertion, and he contended that where there had been an initial period of desertion it was no longer necessary to establish that the spouses, while living under the same roof, had done so as two separate households.

B HELD: in the circumstances the wife was not in desertion, notwithstanding the periods of desertion by her in 1946 and 1947-48.

E APPEAL by the husband from an order of His Honour JUDGE HOWARD, sitting as a divorce commissioner, dated Jan. 20, 1953.

F The parties were married in August, 1930, and there were two children of the marriage, born in 1931 and 1933. From 1936 onwards there was no sexual intercourse between the parties, who occupied separate bedrooms. In June, 1946, the wife left the matrimonial home and stayed away until Christmas of that year. After she had returned she bought her husband's rations and cooked his meals which usually he had with one of his children, but she had no conversation with him other than to ask him what he would like to eat, and she always refused to go out or have her meals with him. Early in 1947 the wife left the matrimonial home again and remained away for about twelve months. In 1948 she returned at her husband's request and they resumed a relationship similar to that which they had had after the wife's return in 1946. By his petition, which was undefended, the husband sought a decree nisi for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, but the learned commissioner dismissed the petition.

Loudoun for the husband.

H The wife was not represented.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The petition is dated Sept. 9, 1952, and the relevant three years from that date take us back to Sept. 9, 1949. During the whole of that period the husband and the wife have been living under the same roof in the circumstances which have been described. The learned commissioner was not satisfied that the husband had made out a case of desertion. Counsel for the husband did not suggest that the circumstances in which the parties were living under the same roof would justify us in coming to the conclusion that there was no longer one household but two households, to use a phrase taken from the judgment of DENNING, L.J., in Hopes v. Hopes (1). Prima facie if a husband and wife are living under one roof, neither can say that the other has deserted, although, of course, there may be limitations and restrictions on the normal and ideal marriage relationship which make it very far from a full or satisfactory marriage. Hopes v. Hopes (1) shows that where the parties are living under the same roof it must be established that they are living as two households in order for one to succeed on a petition for desertion. It is not suggested that the circumstances which prevailed throughout the whole of the three years prior to the petition in the present case would justify any such finding.

It was, however, submitted by counsel that the test is entirely different if there has been an initial desertion, that is to say, an initial period where one party has been away from the matrimonial home in circumstances in which the court would hold that there had been desertion during that period. He relies for that principle on Bartram v. Bartram (2) where a wife had deserted her husband for some years. She then had to leave the house where she was, and there was nowhere else where she could go except to the house where her husband was living. Although one gathers that when she went there there were not two separate households as in Hopes v. Hopes (1), it was held that her presence under that roof did not stop the desertion running. The question is whether that decision was based on the principle for which counsel contends or whether it was based on some narrower ground. Undoubtedly, there are words in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., which at any rate tend to support the wider principle for which counsel contends. He said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 273):

“Once the period of desertion has begun to run, it does not cease to run simply because the parties attempt a reconciliation and for that purpose come together again for a time”, and he refers to Mummery v. Mummery (3). Speaking for myself, I think Mummery v. Mummery (3) and Perry v. Perry (4), where it was held that occasional acts of sexual intercourse may not, having regard to the circumstances in which they take place, prevent the period of desertion running, do not assist in the present case. BUCKNILL, L.J., in his judgment, refers (and, if I may say so, with respect, rightly refers) to the fact that actual desertion by the wife had been established for many months. He said (ibid., 272):

“The wife does not suggest for one moment that she brought it [her desertion] to an end. The question is: Do the facts proved establish that it was brought to an end? In my view, it can only be brought to an end if the facts show an intention on the part of the wife to set up a matrimonial home with the husband. If the facts do not establish any intention on the part of the wife to set up a matrimonial home, the mere fact that, as a lodger, she went to live under the same roof as her husband, because she had nowhere else to go, does not remove the desertion which she had already started and which continued to run.”

ASQUITH, L.J., regarded the case as a border-line case of very great difficulty. I think it is clear from his judgment that he found it possible to hold that the desertion had not been interrupted simply because the wife was not a free agent, but was acting under the spur of necessity in returning to live under the same roof.

If I am right in thinking that that was the ratio of those two decisions, the cases differ completely from the present case where the wife was under no spur of necessity, but came back, indeed, at the request of the husband. All this happened before the material three years, and there is force in the consideration which the learned commissioner had in mind that the husband asked her to return knowing what had been the previous relationship but with the hope that that relationship would improve. Therefore, I do not think that Bartram v. Bartram (2) supports the wide proposition for which counsel contended, nor do I think in principle that any such proposition could be accepted or laid down. We are dealing simply with the present case and in the present case during the relevant three years the parties were living under the same roof as part of one household. Periods of physical desertion prior to the three years may in certain circumstances be relevant in considering the issue, but in the present case I do not regard them as establishing that during those three years there had been desertion when plainly, applying the normal "one roof" principle, it is not open to the husband to say that his wife had deserted him. For these reasons I think the learned commissioner came to a right conclusion and I would dismiss the appeal.

- B JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Where one spouse presents a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion by the other and it appears that during the period of alleged desertion the parties have been living under the same roof, the question at once arises whether during that period the allegedly deserting spouse was still in desertion. I think one may say that prima facie the fact that they have been living under the same roof is a circumstance against the view that there has been continuous desertion. Nevertheless, that circumstance is not necessarily fatal, as appears from Bartram v. Bartram (2), where, in the circumstances of that case, this court came to the conclusion that the period of desertion had not been interrupted by the time during which the wife was living under the same roof as the husband. My Lord has referred to the facts in Bartram v. Bartram (2), which show that there were many years of desertion during which the wife lived in a different house from the husband. Her residence in that house, which belonged to the husband, was put an end to by the husband's selling it with a view to forcing her to come and live with him. There was no house other than the one occupied by the husband in which she could live consistently with her continuance in the employment in which she was engaged. She, therefore, against her will went and lived in the same house as the husband. The terms on which she lived in the house were that she refused to sleep with the husband and slept with the adopted daughter of her husband's mother. She never went into his rooms, and she paid no attention at all to him as a husband, never mended his clothes, cooked for him, or went out with him. She never treated him in any way differently from the way she would treat a lodger whom she disliked. At times, however, she sat at the same table with her husband and ate the common food provided for them.

- Those were the facts to which the decision in Bartram v. Bartram (2) was addressed, and we are now asked to apply the principle said to be deducible from that case to the very different facts of the present case. In the present case there were two periods of what may be described as actual desertion by the wife, one from June, 1946, for a matter of six months, and the other from the spring of 1947 for a matter of twelve months. Ever since the end of the latter period the parties had, in fact, been living under the same roof. The petition was presented on Sept. 9, 1952, so that the last period of actual desertion was some four and a half years before the presentation of the petition. As to the circumstances in which the husband and wife had been occupying the same house since the end of the second period of actual desertion, it appears that there had been no sexual intercourse since about 1936 (which was, of course, before the first period of actual desertion), and that the wife cooked meals for the husband and occasionally did mending for him, though not often, but, so far as she could while living in the same house, she arranged to see as little as possible of him. The two children of the marriage came and stayed for their holidays from time to time in the house, but the family, apparently, never had meals together. The conditions in which the parties have been living for many years now are certainly unsatisfactory and uncomfortable from the husband's point of view and I share the sympathy expressed for him by the learned commissioner. Nevertheless, it would, in my view, be difficult on the evidence to hold that there were here two separate households. The circumstances relied on in support of that view are weaker than those in Bartram v. Bartram (2), and the element of compulsion on the wife to live under the same roof as the husband, which was a decisive factor in that case, is wholly absent here. I think the parties must be taken to have been living in one and the same household on the facts of this case, albeit it was not the kind of household normally kept by a happily married couple. Having lived with his wife on the same terms for some four and a half years preceding the presentation of the petition, the husband now says that on the strength of the initial actual desertion in 1946 the wife has ever since been in desertion from him. In my view, so to hold in the circumstances of this case would be an unwarrantable extension of the decision in Bartram v. Bartram (2). I agree with my Lord that on the facts of this case the learned commissioner came to a right conclusion in holding as he did that the requisite period of desertion had not been made out. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

Family Provision—Infant children—Change of circumstances after death of testator—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (c. 45), s. 1 (1).

In 1947 the testator's marriage with G. was dissolved. In 1949 an order was made which withdrew from G. all right of access to the two children of the marriage, both of whom were then under ten years of age. In the same year the testator married M. In 1950 the testator made a will in which he appointed M. the guardian of his infant children and left the whole of his property to her, or, if she predeceased him, then to his children. In August, 1950, the testator died, leaving an estate of the total value of about £2,500. M. was seriously ill after the testator's death and the children went to live with G. (who had no private means of support). Application was now made under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), on behalf of the children for provision to be made for them out of the testator's estate.

Held: although in deciding whether the testator had made reasonable provision for the children the circumstances to be considered ought to include those which could reasonably have been foreseen by the testator at the moment of his death, his dispositions of his property ought not to be judged exclusively in the light of circumstances occurring after his death, which might have altered the situation; it could not be said that the testator's dispositions were unwarranted in the circumstances which presented themselves to him; and, therefore, the provision for the children was not unreasonable, and no provision would be made for them under s. 1 (1).

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, the infant children of Frederick George Howell, deceased, from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated Mar. 4, 1953, dismissing their application for reasonable provision to be made for their maintenance under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), on the ground that the testator had not acted unreasonably in giving by his will all his property to his second wife.

J. W. Mills for the plaintiffs, the infants.

A. C. M. Kerr for the defendants, the executors.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: On the whole I do not think we should interfere with the order which ROXBURGH, J., made, though the case has, to my mind, that difficulty which is characteristic of all cases which relate to the fortunes and affairs of young children.

The application is made under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, on the footing that here the testator was unreasonable in having made no direct provision whatever for his two small children. The children in question, the applicants by their guardian, were aged eight and ten respectively, and they are the children of the marriage between the testator and their mother, whom I will call Mrs. Gladys Howell. That marriage was dissolved on the petition of the husband in April, 1947, on the ground of the wife's cruelty to the husband. In 1949 BARNARD, J., made an order which withdrew from the children's mother all right of access on her part to the children, then living with the testator and his second wife, Mrs. Marjorie Howell, whom he married in March, 1949. Those conditions remained until the testator's death in August, 1950.

The testator had, by his will made in 1950, left the whole of his property to his second wife who is now his widow, and he also appointed Mrs. Marjorie Howell to be guardian of the infant children, the effect of that appointment being, by virtue of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 4 and s. 5, that she, the widow, was joint guardian with the mother, subject to any directions that the court might give on application to the court by either the natural or the testamentary guardian. It is not insignificant to point out that the testator had his children in mind, for his will contained the further provision that in the event of his wife predeceasing him all his property should go to his children.

The testator was not a man of property. He carried on business as an optician, and substantially his estate consisted of that business and the assets connected with it, including the premises where it was carried on. The total value of the estate is stated to be £2,500, and, broadly speaking, the estate stands in this way. That part of the premises on which the business was carried on has been let to the man who bought, for £1,000 payable in ten yearly instalments of £100 each, the goodwill of the business. He also pays a rent of £104 per annum for the use of that part of the premises. The widow herself lives in the residential part of the same premises, 43, Milton Street, Portsmouth, and it seems tolerably clear that that is the best arrangement for her, because she has thereby a home, and, through the arrangement made about the business, some means of support. There is nothing else available. Mrs. Marjorie Howell, the widow, has been seriously ill since the testator's death, and the evidence shows that her state of health is such as to make her now, in the technical sense, unemployable. But the financial hardships are equally shared at the moment by Mrs. Gladys Howell, who, again, is without property, though she appears not to be in so poor a condition of health; she is slightly the older of the two ladies, and is said to be a woman of some education who normally would be able to earn an income. An effect, as I gather, of the widow's illness immediately following the testator's death was that the children returned to their mother, who now has them with her, and DANCKWERTS, J., on an application to make the children wards of court took the view that there was no good ground for disturbing that state of affairs, and so they remain with their mother.

The facts as to the estate show, I think, quite plainly the unhappy limitation on anything which the court could in any circumstances achieve. The statutory limit imposed of two-thirds of the income, even if the power were exercised to its maximum extent, would provide a very small weekly sum for each child. There is in addition the difficulty to which ROXBURGH, J., alluded and about which I do not feel competent to express any very decided opinion, that if something is provided for the children, it may well be that the effect of that provision will, on the one hand, be to reduce what the children's mother is getting under the National Assistance Act, 1948, and, on the other, to impose on the State an increased liability, or a liability, to make similar provision for the widow. It was expressed picturesquely—and though I think it was clear what the judge had in mind, it was, perhaps, not entirely accurately expressed—when the judge referred to the matter as being out of which pocket the State was to pay. I do not myself think that it is right or necessary to deal with this case on the footing that, assuming the jurisdiction was exercisable, there is nothing very much that the court can do. If on that ground I were disposed to follow the judge in saying what he did, I am aware of the argument that I should be in one and the same breath saying that I thought the testator had acted unreasonably in making no provision for the children, and thereupon acting unreasonably myself by doing exactly the same thing.

I, therefore, go back to the first point, viz., the premise on which any exercise of jurisdiction must depend—whether the court can rightly say that the testator here, in the circumstances as they were when he died as well as when he made his will, acted unreasonably in giving the whole of his property to his wife if she survived him. The learned judge took the view that the testator had not acted unreasonably, and, as I have indicated, on the whole I have come to the same conclusion.

The words of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1938, so far as relevant, are:

“Where, after the commencement of this Act, a person dies domiciled in England leaving . . . a wife [and infant children] and leaving a will, then, if the court on application . . . on behalf of [the dependants] is of opinion that the will does not make reasonable provision for the maintenance of” the dependants, then the court may make orders under the Act. At first sight that sub-section might appear to indicate that the function of the court went so far as this, that, if a judge sitting (as has been said) in the armchair of the testator would have thought it better to make some provision different from that which the testator made, the court might say that the testator in making his dispositions acted unreasonably, but it is, I think, clear that the function of the court is of a more limited character.

In Re Styler (1) MORTON, J., in his judgment said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 204):

“There are one or two observations in the cases decided on this Act to which I desire to refer, although I fully appreciate that every case must rest upon its own facts. In Re Brownbridge (2) BENNETT, J., said that the Act did not throw upon the testator a duty to make provision for his dependants. It only gave the court the right to interfere if it came to the conclusion that the dispositions which were made were unwarranted. In that particular case BENNETT, J., did not think it right to interfere with the testator's disposition. In respectfully agree with those observations. I do not think the court should interfere with a testatrix's or testator's dispositions merely because the judge may think that he would have been inclined, if he were in the position of the testator or testatrix, to make some provision for a particular person. I think the court has to find that it was unreasonable on the part of the testatrix or the testator to make no provision for the person in question or that it was unreasonable not to make a larger provision."

- A That view of the intention of the Act has, so far as I know, been consistently acted on since and should, in my judgment, be followed now. The question then is posed: In making this will containing the provision which I have indicated, did the testator make unreasonable provision for these children? The matter could equally well be put: Was the series of dispositions unwarranted in the circumstances as they presented, or should have presented, themselves to the testator at the moment of his death? For I think, prima facie at any rate, it must be right to judge this matter, whether the testator was unreasonable, in the light of the circumstances which did present, or should have presented themselves, to him up to the moment of his death. No doubt the circumstances must include eventualities reasonably to be foreseen, but the testator ought not to be judged exclusively in the light of circumstances happening after his death, which might very much have altered the situation.

- B I have referred to the state of affairs at his death, and I think, within the very limited range in which the testator could make dispositions, it is not possible to say that this direction of the testator that if his widow survived him she should have everything was unreasonable or unwarranted. I was myself attracted by the way counsel for the executors put it when he said that
- D on the facts as they were the only adequate provision which the testator could make was by securing that there was a home available where his widow would live, it being the fact, and known to him to be the fact, that she would make provision for the children and would look after them as she had been doing for some little time before he made his will.

- E One does not, I think, improve on a case of this kind by attempting elaboration. I have indicated the considerations that have influenced my own mind, and, for these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal. I confess I do so, perhaps, with a greater readiness (if I may use that phrase) because I think, generally speaking, applications under this Act are of such a kind that this court should not readily entertain appeals interfering with decisions of judges below—though that is not to say that, if this court was convinced that the judge had erred, it would
- F not be its duty to interfere with the order made below.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. Applying the principles of law which have been laid down with regard to the interpretation of the Act of 1938, and considering the whole of the facts in this case, I think there is no other conclusion to which this court could come, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

- G ROMER, L.J.: I agree, and I would only add, as, indeed, my Lord has already indicated, that questions under the Act of 1938 are very much matters for the exercise of the judge's discretion, and appeals to this court, at all events in the case of small estates, should not be encouraged.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.),
May 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, July 1, 1953.]

Gift—Inter vivos—Advancement—Father and children—Evidence to rebut presumption of advancement—Subsequent acts or events—Allotments of shares in names of children—Shares subsequently sold and proceeds treated by father as his own moneys—Other provision made for children.

The testator had three children—P., born in 1901, W., born in 1906, and D., born in 1913. In 1929 the testator decided to go into the business of speculative building, and he and one M. promoted five private companies and divided the share capital between their respective families. Allotments of shares were made in the names of D. and W. without their knowledge. In 1934 the testator and M. promoted a public company to acquire all the shares of the five private companies for £700,000, partly in cash and partly in shares of the new company. Half the consideration went to each of the two families. The consideration for the shares standing in D.'s name was some £45,900, and for W.'s shares some £26,700 in cash, and, in addition, forty thousand shares of £1 each were allotted to each of them. D. and W. signed the sale agreement, but denied any knowledge of the transaction, as they were in the habit of signing many documents on the testator's instructions without inquiry. The recital to the sale agreement contained a statement that the members of M.'s family held their shares as nominees for him, but there was no similar recital in regard to the testator's family. The testator, having procured authorities from D. and W. to the public company to pay direct to him their shares of the cash proportion of the purchase consideration, placed the sum received by him in a banking account in his own name, and later transferred part to deposit accounts in the names of D. and W. He then sold the share consideration passing to D. and W., and credited the amounts received to their deposit accounts. Having procured from D. and W. authorities requesting the bank to honour withdrawals by him from their deposit accounts, by the end of 1935 he had withdrawn the whole of the sums to the credit of their accounts. In 1935 he promoted another private company, of which he had the sole control. He distributed the shares of the company which were paid for out of money drawn from W.'s deposit account, equally among the members of his family, viz., his wife (the children's stepmother), his eldest child P., and D. and W. Further sums drawn from D.'s and W.'s deposit accounts were used to buy real and leasehold property in the company's name. Between 1935 and 1939 he caused entries to be made in the books of the company showing D. and W. as creditors to the extent of some £47,000 and £50,000, respectively, on loan accounts. D. and W. knew of the loan accounts, but throughout the testator's lifetime they remained ignorant of the allotments of the shares to them in 1929, of the transactions in 1934, and of the deposit accounts. From time to time, the testator purchased houses in the names of his children and informed them, as soon as each was of age, that these purchases were gifts to them. In 1949 the testator died, and D. and W. now claimed as creditors certain sums against the testator's estate on the ground that the allotments of the shares of the private companies in their names in 1929 must be regarded as advancement to them by the testator, that the testator was a trustee of the price of those shares received by him in 1934, and that his estate was accountable to them for the proceeds of the testator's dealings with the trust money, and they contended that evidence of the events in and after 1934 was inadmissible to rebut the presumption of advancement.

HELD: (i) on the facts the plaintiffs had failed to establish that the moneys withdrawn from their respective deposit accounts which represented the proceeds of sale of shares were trust moneys in the testator's hands or that the testator's estate was otherwise accountable to them for such moneys, and, therefore, they were not entitled to succeed.

A (ii) evidence of acts and statements of the testator in and after 1934 was admissible per DENNING, L.J.: because, as regards acts, whenever the court had to ascertain the intention of a person when doing an act it was always permissible to look at his subsequent conduct to throw light on his intention, and, as regards statements or declarations, evidence of such was admissible at common law if they were against the interest of the testator's estate, while, in the case of a written statement, in any event the statement would be admissible under the proviso to s. 1 (1) of the Evidence Act, 1938; per ROMER, L.J.: the relevant acts were so associated with the original transaction as, in effect, to form part of it.

B Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: It was not suggested that evidence is inadmissible of conduct of an alleged donor subsequent to the alleged gift which tends to show recognition or affirmation of the gift. It is, in my view, clear that, if regard is to be had to that evidence, there cannot be excluded such parts of the story as tend in the other direction. If the testator's dealings in 1934 and 1935 are to be considered at all, they must be considered in their entirety. It cannot be legitimate to pick out such parts of the whole narrative as support the plaintiffs' claim in isolation from their context.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Feb. 19, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 569.

By their action the plaintiffs, Richard David Shephard and Winifred Cartwright, the younger son and daughter of the testator, Philip Edward Shephard, who died in 1949, claimed against his executors a decree for general administration together with a number of special accounts and inquiries designed to investigate their claims made or pending. The plaintiffs claimed as creditors certain moneys and property said to arise out of gifts (viz., allotments of shares in limited companies) made to the plaintiffs in or about 1929. The allotments of the shares were in the plaintiffs' names and raised the presumption of advancement existing between a father and his children, and it was contended by the plaintiffs that evidence of subsequent events was inadmissible to rebut the presumption of advancement. The plaintiffs' claim was opposed by the eldest son. HARMAN, J., admitted evidence of subsequent events, and came to the conclusion that the testator did not in the allotments of shares intend to commit himself irrevocably by way of out and out gifts.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 1. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The questions which the court is called on to determine on this appeal are those asked by the three inquiries numbered 5, 7 and 10 in the order for general administration made in this action on Jan. 12, 1953. They are questions of great complexity and difficulty, and I find it, therefore, useful to set out at the beginning of my judgment the three inquiries. They are:

"5. An inquiry whether any and which of the children of the testator derived or received from the testator in his lifetime any and what sums of money or other estates or property in the nature of advancements.

7. An inquiry whether the plaintiff Richard David Shephard is entitled to a first charge or any charge on 580 shares of £1 each in Woodside Park Garden Suburb, Ltd., standing in the testator's name at the date of his death to secure the sum of £23,960 8s. 9d. or some other and what sum. 10. An inquiry whether, subject to what may be found on the inquiry numbered 14, the plaintiff Winifred Maud Cartwright is entitled to all or any and if so which of the 450 shares of £1 each in Philip Edward Shephard Estates, Ltd., registered in the name of the testator at his death."

As will later appear, the inquiries numbered 7 and 10 are relatively of a subsidiary character. The main debate has been on the first inquiry numbered 5 in relation to the two plaintiffs in the action, for their elder brother, the party attending these proceedings, has made no claim in this action, though there are in fact circumstances available to him comparable with those on which the plaintiffs relied. But, in my judgment, the real question involved in the appeal is in truth distinct from inquiry No. 5 and is not necessarily solved by an answer to it.

I have already said that the order of Jan. 12, 1953, was an order for general administration. The history of the litigation has not been uneventful—it was the subject of comment in the opening paragraphs of the judgment of HARMAN, J.,—but it is essential to bear in mind that the writ in the present proceedings was issued on June 19, 1951, and that the two plaintiffs thereby claimed to be entitled as creditors of the estate of the testator, Philip Edward Shephard, who was their father, for very large sums of money, together far more than sufficient to exhaust entirely the assets in the hands of the executors. HARMAN, J., therefore, having ordered amendment of the proceedings so as to entitle them in the matter of the testator's estate, made the order I have mentioned in the form appropriate to a creditor's administration suit and thereafter proceeded to deal (inter alia) with the three inquiries as though they had been adjourned direct to him in open court before certificate.

- A I have mentioned these matters before referring to any detail because it is, in my judgment, necessary to state and to emphasise that the plaintiffs in the action claim as creditors (between them for the sum of over £100,000, the claim of the first plaintiff being approximately double that of the second) of their father's estate. They say that their father's estate owes to them this large sum of money, and so asserting it is plain that the onus lies heavily on them to prove their case. How, then, do they claim that the debt arises? They answer: Out of certain dealings or transactions in 1934 and 1935. The testator died in 1949, and there is no question but that the claims were made for the first time after his death. Prima facie, therefore, the Limitation Act, 1939, must in any event provide a complete answer to any common law claim in debt or for money had and received, but it is the case of the plaintiffs that the dealings in 1934 and 1935 were dealings by the testator with moneys which, because they were the proceeds of absolute and unconditional gifts previously made to the plaintiffs by the testator himself, were, to the testator's knowledge, the plaintiffs' moneys, and for the use of, or dealings with, which the plaintiffs had given to the testator no, or no valid, authority. If this allegation is well founded, then the Limitation Act, 1939, is not available to the executors. The testator must be regarded on this basis as a trustee to whose hands trust moneys will have come. The plaintiffs were even prepared to contend, if necessary, that the testator must be held to have acted in concealed fraud of the plaintiffs and so to have deprived himself and his estate of any defence under the Limitation Act, 1939. For this purpose they relied on Beaman v. A.R.T.S., Ltd. (1). As the plaintiffs in their evidence stated that their father was a man of scrupulous honour, I propose to say no more on this last contention than to hold that on the facts of the case it is, in my opinion, insupportable.
- E It is clear from what I have said that it is an essential foundation to their claim for the plaintiffs to prove the gifts to which I have referred. For, unless such gifts are established, then the subject-matter of the testator's dealings in 1934 and 1935 was not the plaintiffs' property at all, and their claim fails in limine. The significance of the fifth inquiry directed by the learned judge thus appears. It is also made apparent in what respect the present case differs
- F so greatly (as the judge observed) from the more usual case where the question, aye or no, of an advancement by a parent to a child falls to be determined. In the more usual case, the question arises whether some item of property found to be legally vested in a child is beneficially the child's own property. In this case, the subject of the alleged gifts, viz., shares in certain private companies, was, undoubtedly, so vested originally—in, or shortly after, 1929—
- G but it was so vested in circumstances and on conditions such that the testator was always able to exercise (as he did) unlimited control over the disposition of the shares and also over the whole of their proceeds of sale in 1934 (which proceeds in May, 1934, were placed to the credit of deposit accounts with Barclays Bank, Ltd., in the plaintiffs' respective names). This control was exercised in various ways by the testator for the benefit of his family, including
- H himself, and in so far as certain of the proceeds of sale were ultimately utilised by the testator in creating benefits of a different character for the two plaintiffs, they have been prepared to give credit accordingly, on the footing that to that extent the testator has been able to discharge himself from the obligation which (they say) rested on him to account to them strictly for the whole of the original proceeds. It is part of the plaintiffs' case that they never knew anything whatever about the existence of the property, i.e., the shares in the private companies, or about the vesting of it in their names, or the placing in their names on deposit account of the proceeds of the realisation of the shares, until one or other of the defendants told them about these matters after their father's death. This ignorance is, indeed, remarkable, for each of the plaintiffs signed powers of attorney and other documents in relation to the shares alleged to have been given to them and in relation to their proceeds of realisation, including directions to Barclays Bank to honour cheques drawn by their father on their respective deposit accounts to the credit of which there was at one time, as they say quite unknown to them, over £200,000. The directions or authorities to the bank are short and simple documents. It is plainly understandable that their execution might have been forgotten after a period of nearly twenty years, but it is not easy to comprehend how any reasonably intelligent or educated human being could have executed such documents without becoming aware of their nature, and neither plaintiff has denied execution or raised a plea of non est factum in regard to any of the documents which he or she executed. I assume, however, that the learned judge accepted the testimony of the plaintiffs that they were in fact at all times wholly ignorant of the character of the documents which they were content to sign without observation or inquiry, though I observe that he described their respective affidavits as "very uncandid documents."

It may, therefore, be that the judge was right in his view that once the gifts were proved everything else followed in the plaintiffs' favour—if the judge meant thereby gifts absolute and unqualified. It is the fact that when the first plaintiff executed the various documents put before him by his father he was but twenty years old, though he was of full age when the bank acted on the authority which the first plaintiff had executed (on the evidence, without any further reference to him) and permitted his father to withdraw large sums, on one occasion over £70,000, from the first plaintiff's account. If those sums withdrawn were, in the eye of the law, trust moneys in the testator's hands, it is not easy to see how, in the circumstances and on the facts which, I think, HARMAN, J., found, the testator ever discharged himself in respect of them. The second plaintiff is, however, to my mind, in much greater difficulty. She was of full age when she signed the authority to the bank, and the bank in fact acted on that authority from time to time by using the moneys to the credit of her account in or towards the discharge of the testator's overdrawings on his own account, the sums so used being relatively small in amount, i.e., round figures of £1,000 and £2,000 at a time. Substantially the whole amount originally standing to the credit of the second plaintiff's account was so used over a period of about twelve months from January, 1935. In her case, therefore, I am not for myself satisfied that the second plaintiff could, whatever may be the proper answer to inquiry No. 5, successfully establish that any of the moneys withdrawn from her account became trust moneys in the testator's hands, or that she could otherwise deprive the testator's estate of the benefit of the Limitation Act, 1939, as a defence to her claim on his executors to account.

But these questions only arise if, in the first instance, absolute and unqualified gifts are established. The learned judge on this issue, the issue directly raised by inquiry No. 5, found against the plaintiffs. My brethren, whose judgments I have had the advantage of reading in advance, are also both of opinion that the plaintiffs fail on this essential issue. I agree with them that the plaintiffs have failed to establish such absolute and unqualified gifts as are essential to their case, but since I have, perhaps, reached the same conclusion by a slightly different route, I have thought it proper to attempt an explanation of my own reasons. In particular, I have thought it of great importance to a proper apprehension of the plaintiffs' claim to state the matters which I have set out above. In the first place, and having regard to those facts, the onus of proof, in my judgment, rests, as I have already indicated, heavily on the plaintiffs to establish the making of absolute and unqualified gifts by their father to them and so to establish the further and essential proposition that the several sums drawn out from their deposit accounts and used by or for the benefit of the testator and his family were trust moneys in his hands. There is a second reason, in my judgment, for the significance of the matters I have stated, which is consequential on the first, and may be an expansion of it or a different way of stating it. Where the question of advancement arises in respect of an item of property found in the name of a child, and in the more usual case after the parent's death, then the question is relatively straightforward, viz., whether, on all the facts of the case, the property is held subject to a resulting trust in the parent's favour, or whether the child is, at the time when the proceeding is brought, beneficially entitled to the property, and, in the latter event, it is irrelevant if, during the parent's life, he or she may have received and made use of the income of the property, to determine the exact circumstances and the precise qualifications which must be treated as having attached to the original vesting of the property and as having justified such use on the parent's part, for in none of the many cases which have been cited to us has any claim been made by the child to recover as a creditor from the parent's estate the equivalent of any such interest which the parent may have received, and, as DENNING, L.J., observes in his judgment, there is strong authority for the view that such a claim would not be lightly entertained. It seems, then, to follow that the vesting by way of advancement of property in the name of a child may not be inconsistent, at any rate, with the retention by the parent of a right to receive and enjoy the interest on the property during his own life. In the present case it is not sufficient for the plaintiffs to prove an intention on the testator's part to make to them advancements to operate in some way at some time and subject to some powers of control or revocation. They must show that, notwithstanding the steps that were taken at the time when the various acts were done which are relied on as constituting or recognising advancements, but which effectively preserved (as they were obviously intended to do) complete liberty of action to the testator to deal with the subject-matter "advanced" during his lifetime, the testator must be treated as having made to each of the plaintiffs absolute and unqualified gifts operating immediately. It is to be noted that if the plaintiffs are right in so claiming (as they must be to succeed at all), then equally they should be entitled to claim against their father's estate an account of all income or interest received by him attributable to the property in question or its proceeds. In my judgment, it is this full but essential claim that the plaintiffs have failed to establish.

The conclusion of the learned judge after he had carefully considered all the material before him was as follows ([1953] 1 All E.R. 579):

"Considering the evidence as a whole, and doing my best to weigh the circumstances on both sides, I feel obliged to come to the conclusion that the testator did not in the earlier allotments of shares, any more than in the transactions with the businesses, intend to commit himself irrevocably by way of out and out gifts."

If, by that observation, the learned judge meant no more than to hold that the plaintiffs had not established any absolute and unconditional gifts, I respectfully agree entirely with him, but he proceeded to answer the fifth inquiry in the negative, and I am unable to accept (as I do not think the judge accepted) the inference from that answer that there was never any advancement (in the sense of any intention to benefit the two plaintiffs) at all. The learned judge, in the earlier part of his judgment, so fully recited all the facts and all the evidence before him, that I find it unnecessary to repeat in detail those matters. The story, and the figures involved, are highly complex, and save in two relatively minor matters, the plaintiffs have not quarrelled with the learned judge's recitals. It is, however, important to notice that the gifts alleged were made in, or shortly after, 1929, and consisted of the placing (as I have already stated) in the names of the two plaintiffs (and also in the names of the testator's wife and his elder son, the party attending these proceedings) certain shares in six private companies which he formed about that time. The names of the companies and the numbers of the shares so placed in the names of his wife and children and also in his own name are conveniently set out in para. 10 of the joint affidavit of the two defendants to this action filed on June 16, 1950, in certain earlier proceedings, and I refer to, but do not repeat, that table in this judgment. The formation of those companies appears to have been the testator's first excursion into the business of building and property owning, and counsel for the plaintiffs in this court naturally and forcibly relied on what he called the pattern which the distribution of the shares presents. The case is not one where a father has put a few shares into the names of his wife or children to qualify them as directors or to increase the numbers of his supporters at a general meeting. Thus, whereas the number of shares which he himself held in all the companies amounted together to 725, those put in the name of the first plaintiff amounted to 875, and those put in the name of the second plaintiff to 425—the larger number put in the name of the former being attributable to his large holding (450 out of 750 together held by the testator's family) in one particular company which carried on a road-making business, the type of business in which the first plaintiff was himself actually employed. On the other hand, as the judge found, neither of the plaintiffs knew anything about the formation of these companies or, at least, of their alleged interest in them, and no certificates or documents of title to the shares ever appear to have been issued to the plaintiffs or, indeed, issued at all. It seems clear that the testator, together with his associate, Mr. Meyer, who, and whose family, held equivalent amounts of shares in these companies, completely controlled their operations. By what means, if at all, any voting rights attaching to any of the shares held by members of the testator's family other than himself were ever exercised does not appear. There is no evidence that any single piece of paper relating to their holdings ever reached the hands of the plaintiffs or either of them, and against the conclusion which counsel for the plaintiffs sought to draw from the so-called "pattern" of the shareholding must be set the circumstance that, as regards the Meyer holdings which were similarly distributed, the evidence showed that the shares placed in the names of members of Mr. Meyer's family other than himself were placed in their names as nominees for Mr. Meyer. But whatever might have been the proper inference to be drawn from the very limited circumstances known about the formation of these six companies and the placing of their shares in the plaintiffs' names, the matter is, in my judgment, carried appreciably further in the plaintiffs' favour by the events of 1934. I venture, however, to emphasise again that the only gifts alleged were those of the shares themselves by the placing of them in the plaintiffs' names. It has never been suggested that any further or independent gift was made in 1934. The events of 1934 are relied on by the plaintiffs solely as evidence of a recognition or affirmation by the testator of the gifts previously made.

What I have called "the 1934 events" consist broadly of two separate matters: first, the fact that in the case of one of the six companies a dividend was declared in respect of the shares, being the only dividend ever declared by any of the companies prior to the sale of the shares presently mentioned. The full amount of the dividend attributable to the shares held by the testator and his three children (for there were no shares in his wife's name in this company) was received by the testator and used by him to discharge a debt due by him to that company, and neither of the plaintiffs ever knew anything about such dividend till after the testator's death. At a later date, however, in 1936, the testator instructed the defendant Dunk, who acted as his accountant, to state in answer to an inquiry made by the Inland Revenue, that the two plaintiffs (and their brother, the party attending) were beneficially interested in so much of the dividend as related to the shares in their respective names.

But more significant was the second matter which occurred in 1934, viz., the sale which the testator and Mr. Meyer negotiated of all the shares in all six companies to a public company for a very large consideration payable partly in cash and partly in shares. Again, the plaintiffs say that they had no knowledge of this transaction whatever in spite of the agreement presently mentioned. They executed powers of attorney and authorities to each of the six companies which enabled the testator (with Mr. Meyer) to carry out the sale, and by these or other means the whole of the consideration attributable to the shares held by the testator or members of his family was received by the testator himself. But for the purposes of the sale an agreement was entered into (which the plaintiffs, among others, duly, if submissively, executed) and that agreement contained the significant recital that the shares held by members of Mr. Meyer's family other than himself were held by them as nominees for Mr. Meyer, there being no corresponding recital in regard to the shares held by members of the testator's family other than the testator. Further (and, perhaps, most significant of all), the testator appears, following a conversation with Mr. Dunk, to have placed to the credit of the plaintiffs respectively with Barclays Bank, Ltd., the exact amounts expressed in shillings and pence, after allowing for certain other payments which can be identified and regarded as paid on behalf of the respective plaintiffs, of the total cash consideration attributable to the two plaintiffs' shares and also the approximate equivalent of the proceeds of the share consideration similarly so attributable. The testator similarly dealt with the cash and share consideration attributable to the shares held by the party attending, the plaintiffs' brother, Philip, and also the consideration attributable to the shares held by the testator's wife. As regards the testator's wife, it is one of the two matters in which the learned judge appears to have been in error that he said that the testator's wife never received the consideration due to her, viz., £5,000 in cash, and I mention it in case it should have influenced the judge in reaching a conclusion that the various actions of the testator in 1934 were not sufficient to constitute a recognition or affirmation of previous gifts.

The learned judge took account of all these matters, but did not, as I understand him, regard them singly or in combination as of substantial significance. In my judgment, their combined effect, at least, is formidable, and I have, for my part, found it impossible to deny that they constitute a recognition or affirmation of some gift or advancement in 1929. But it does not follow, in my view, that they are consistent only, as counsel for the plaintiffs would have it, with an absolute and unqualified gift of the corpus (at any rate) of the original shares. For the acts relied on as constituting recognition of the previous gifts were accompanied by other acts which left (and must have been intended to have left) with the testator a control over the disposition of the proceeds of sale of the shares as complete and unlimited as he appears to have had over the shares themselves.

I have already observed that the cases provide illustrations of gifts to children of such character as do not appear to impose any liability on the parent to account for the income or interest received by him during his life. In the present case, the qualified character of the advancement is more far reaching, for it left with the testator a power of control, if necessary a power of revocation, a "dominion" over the subject-matter "advanced": see Devoy v. Devoy (2); which enabled him during his life to make such use thereof as he thought fit for the general benefit of his family, including himself. But I can see nothing repugnant or illogical in this result which is not only consistent with his general conduct over a long period of time, but also seems natural enough to a father who might well not, and I think, as his will showed, did not, desire to produce substantial inequality between his children. Owing to what must be regarded as accidents, including the varying fortunes of the six companies and the times at which the testator sold the share considerations, the proceeds attributable to the first plaintiff's shares greatly exceeded those attributable to the second plaintiff's. As HARMAN, J., noted, the withdrawals from his children's deposit accounts were (apart from their application directly by the bank in reduction of his own over-drawings) substantially used or wanted by the testator for acquiring new properties for the property company which he formed known as Philip Edward Shephard Estates, Ltd., and the final result was that each of the plaintiffs was credited on loan account with that company with sums of more nearly equal amount.

I have more than once referred to the fact that shares were originally placed also in the name of the eldest of the testator's three children, the party attending, and that a deposit account was likewise opened in his name which was also withdrawn by or used for the benefit of the testator and his family in the same way as the two deposit accounts of the plaintiffs. The party attending makes no claim in this action, but it is clear (and there was no argument before us to the contrary) that no inference favourable or unfavourable to the plaintiffs can be drawn from that fact or from any distinction that might on investigation be found between the treatment of the party attending, on the one hand, and the plaintiffs, on the other. Nor have I been able to derive assistance from the circumstance that other properties, in some cases businesses, in others real properties, were from time to time put into each of the plaintiff's names, though counsel for the party attending contended that there was an essential distinction between the vesting of real properties in the children's names, on the one hand (which he conceded were gifts), and, on the other, the vesting of business properties, including shares (which he contended were not). It is true that, for some business purposes, the testator may have used the names of his children because his own employment by the Royal Exchange Assurance disabled him from personally engaging in those businesses, but in other cases it is far from clear to me to what extent he may not have intended his children to be beneficially interested in the many business enterprises for which he was responsible. And as regards the real properties which he acquired in the names of his children, though he did inform them of such purchases, he does not appear to have done so until some time after the actual dates, and then he told them (according, at any rate, to the second plaintiff) that such properties would "eventually become" theirs. In practice, he kept the entire management in his own hands and neither of the plaintiffs enjoyed during their father's life the income produced by the properties.

The result, in my judgment, is that though the plaintiffs establish "advancements" in the sense that the testator, when he put the shares in the six companies in their names, intended to confer benefits on them, they fail to establish that the moneys withdrawn from their respective deposit accounts which represented the proceeds of sale of the shares were trust moneys in their father's hands or that the testator's estate is otherwise accountable to them for such moneys, and since, as I have said, the onus lies, and lies heavily, on the plaintiffs, it is unnecessary for the executors to show, or for the court to find, what precisely were the terms or qualifications of the original "advancements". It is enough that any "advancements" which the plaintiffs can establish were not of such an absolute character that the testator's estate is now accountable for all sums withdrawn from the relevant deposit accounts.

This conclusion is sufficient to dispose of the appeal and makes it unnecessary to deal with the seventh and tenth inquiries, for the claim which underlies each of those inquiries is based on the ability to trace trust moneys into that which now represents them, and, if I am right so far, there never were any such trust moneys. In the case of the first plaintiff, Richard (inquiry No. 7), the claim rests on the circumstance that over £37,000 which was withdrawn from the first plaintiff's deposit account was in fact so withdrawn for the purpose of acquiring 880 shares in Woodside Park Garden Suburb, Ltd., of which only three hundred were afterwards put in the first plaintiff's name. But the case of the second plaintiff (inquiry No. 10) again is fraught with much greater difficulty, for I am by no means satisfied that even if she were able to establish that the moneys standing to the credit of her deposit account were absolutely hers, she could further trace any of the sums withdrawn from that account (which were, as I have said, withdrawn by being from time to time transferred by the bank to the credit of the testator's own account) into shares in Philip Edward Shephard Estates, Ltd. Though I do not desire to attach much importance to the point, the peculiar difficulties with which the second plaintiff is faced on any view may reflect legitimately, in my opinion, on the claims generally of the two plaintiffs.

The question was discussed during the argument whether it is legitimate to take account of conduct on an alleged donor's part, subsequent to the date of the alleged gift, which tends to show that no gift was intended. It was not suggested that evidence is inadmissible of conduct of an alleged donor subsequent to the alleged gift which tends to show recognition or affirmation of the gift, and in the present case the testator's dealings with the one dividend received and in connection with the sale and the proceeds of sale of the shares were strongly relied on by the plaintiffs to support their claim. It is, in my view, clear that, if regard is to be had to that evidence, then, whatever be the answer to the general question, there cannot be excluded such parts of the story as tend in the other direction. If the testator's dealings in 1934 and 1935 are to be considered at all, then they must be considered in their entirety. It cannot be legitimate to pick out such parts of the whole narrative as support the plaintiffs' claim in isolation from their context.

It is, therefore, in my judgment, in the present case unnecessary to answer the general question, and I prefer not to do so, particularly having regard to the authorities, including the authority of the text-books, to which I later refer. In any given case, the question will arise in regard to some particular matters of fact, and whether such matters of fact are, or are not, admissible in evidence will in practice be likely to depend on many circumstances, for example, whether they may also constitute admissions on the part of the donee, whether they are evidence of a continuing habit or practice of the alleged donor, or whether (as in this case) they are intimately connected with other conduct of the donor which is clearly admissible in evidence. I do not, therefore, desire to go further in this case than to decide what the circumstances of this case require to be decided.

HARMAN, J., was of opinion that a distinction could properly be drawn between subsequent declarations and subsequent conduct or subsequent "events" tending in each case in the alleged donor's interest. I agree with him, that, according to the general rules of evidence, the former, whether oral or written, could not, after the declarant's death, be given in evidence (apart from the Evidence Act, 1938), but that there is nothing in those general rules to exclude the latter, whatever might be their weight. Counsel for the party attending was also, as I understood him, disposed to agree that, however slight might, and frequently would be, its weight, evidence of relevant events, i.e., of the alleged donor's conduct as distinct from declarations made by him orally or in writing, would always be admissible in proof of his intention at the earlier date of his alleged gift, and in many of the cases such evidence seems in fact to have been received, for example, by LORD NOTTINGHAM, L.C., in Lord Grey v. Lady Grey (3).

There is, however, authority the other way. In Sidmouth v. Sidmouth (4) and in Christy v. Courtenay (5), LORD LANGDALE, M.R., expressed, more strongly in the first of them, the contrary view, and those cases have been treated as authority for the exclusion of evidence of subsequent conduct in the text-books:

see, for example, UNDERHILL'S LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, 10th ed., p. 187, LEWIN ON TRUSTS, 14th ed., pp. 156, 157. The exclusion of a subsequent will of the "donor" tending against the gift may in any case be justified in so far as it constitutes an express or implied declaration: see Crabb v. Crabb (6). But nice distinctions might arise between the terms of the will or deed as constituting a declaration, on the one hand, and the fact and character of the disposition, on the other, on which we have in the nature of the present case heard no argument. Finally, our attention was drawn to the observation of MORTON, L.J. ([1944] 2 all E.R. 473), in regard to subsequent declarations in Warren v. Gurney (7) that: "If the rule were otherwise it would be extremely easy for persons to manufacture evidence" which it was said was no less applicable to subsequent conduct. No doubt, a donor can, in a sense, "fabricate" conduct subsequent to a gift by him for the purpose of showing that no gift was intended. But the further argument based on the circumstance that he cannot be cross-examined after his death is at least less significant in regard to conduct.

If the matter were free of authority I should be disposed, as at present advised, to agree with HARMAN, J., but having regard to the authorities I have mentioned, and since the general question does not require our decision in the present case, I prefer, as I have said, to express no opinion one way or the other on it. I only add that in the somewhat analogous case, where the question was whether a testatrix had intended in her lifetime to make to another an out and out gift of a chattel or merely to promise to give it at some future time, the Court of Appeal recently in Jackson v. Rodger (8) received and considered evidence of subsequent conduct of the alleged donor which tended to disprove the intention to give, but the authorities in regard to advancements were not cited to the court.

The conclusion of the whole matter is, in my judgment, that this appeal ought not to succeed. For reasons, however, which I have already sufficiently indicated, I am not satisfied that the matter can be properly dealt with merely by answering the three inquiries numbered 5, 7 and 10, and I should, therefore, desire to hear counsel on the form of order proper to be made.

DENNING, L.J.: Before us counsel for the party attending took a preliminary point. He contended that, whether there was an advancement to the children or not, they had no claim to be creditors because their claims were statute-barred. In order to test this point, I propose to assume that there was an advancement by the father to the children, not only of the original shares, but also of the money which he put into deposit accounts in their names. On that footing, the money was just as much theirs as if it had come to them, not from their father, but from another source, for instance, by deed of gift from an uncle, and put into their names at the bank. Suppose, then, that in such a case the father had got the children to sign documents authorising him to draw on their banking account, what would be the legal result?

In considering this question, a distinction must be drawn between the two children, because the son was under age at the time when he signed the authority, whereas the daughter was not, but in regard to both of them, the judge has found that they had no inkling of the transactions. They signed whatever documents were put before them without any inquiry whatever. They remained throughout the father's life ignorant of the original allotments, and of the sale agreement, and of the deposit accounts. So far as the son is concerned, I think that the authority signed by him was absolutely void. It was, on the face of it, an authority to the bank authorising them to honour the father's signature to withdrawals from the son's deposit account. In other words, the son authorised the father to draw out the son's money. That is a transaction so manifestly prejudicial to the son that the law regards it, not merely as voidable, but as void. It is very like the appointment by an infant of an agent, which has always been held void. It has been the law of this country for many centuries that an infant cannot appoint an agent to act for him, neither by means of a power of attorney, nor by any other means. If he purports to appoint an agent, not only is the appointment itself void, but everything done by the agent on behalf of the infant is also void and incapable of ratification. The reason for this rule is because an infant has not sufficient discretion to choose an agent to act for him. He is all too likely to choose the wrong man, and so the law, rather than have any argument on the point, declares him to be incapable of choosing an agent at all. If he is to enter into any legal transaction, he must enter into it by himself and not by an agent, and then the law will look into the transaction and see whether it is binding on him or not. This distinction—between a transaction entered into by the infant himself and one entered into by an agent on his behalf—is taken in all the books. It is taken by LORD MANSFIELD himself in the leading case of Zouch d. Abbot & Hallet v. Parsons (9) where he says that the powers of attorney given by infants are void, and also all deeds by an infant which “delegate a mere power and convey no interest.” The same distinction is taken by PARKE, B., in Doe d. Thomas v. Roberts (10) where he said (16 M. & W. 780): “. . . an infant cannot appoint an agent . . . an agreement by an agent cannot bind an infant.”

Applying these principles, it seems that the power of attorney given by Richard David Shephard to his father on May 2, 1934, was void, so also the authority dated May 14, 1934, by which he authorised the purchasing company to hand over the money and shares to his father on his behalf, and in addition the undated authority by which he authorised his father to withdraw money from his deposit account, because he was at all those times under age. None of those documents conveyed any legal interest. They duly authorised other people to affect the legal interest of the infant. As such they were absolutely void. On the assumption that there was initially an advancement, the money subsequently received by the father by virtue of the void authority was money had and received to the use of the son.

The authority signed by the daughter Winifred stands in a different position, because she was of full age. She cannot say it was not her document. The plea of non est factum is not open to her, but she can assert that she was her father's daughter and that she was under her father's influence when she signed it and in receipt of no independent advice. That is sufficient to negative any idea that there was a gift by her to the father. And if the authority did not operate as a gift to the father, what was its effect? I cannot myself regard it as a loan, for the simple reason that a loan is a contract, and there is no evidence of any such contract. It seems to me that, on the assumption that there was initially an advancement, any money which the father withdrew from the daughter's account by virtue of the authority was money had and received by him to her use.

If there was initially an advancement, the son and daughter would have had a good cause of action against the father for money had and received. But what about the Statute of Limitations? It seems to me that the father would here be in a dilemma. When he drew the money from the bank, either he intended to use the children's money as his own, or he did not. If he did intend to use it as his own and told them nothing about it, then the very nature of his dealing amounted to a fraudulent concealment from them of their right of action, and the period of limitation did not start to run until the children discovered it: see the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 26, and Beaman v. A.R.T.S., Ltd. (1). If the father did not intend to use the money as his own, but on behalf of the children as he ought to have done, then he was a trustee of it and he has since converted it to his own use, and the children are not bound by any period of limitation: see Lyell v. Kennedy, Kennedy v. Lyell (11) (14 App. Cas. 457) and Soar v. Ashwell (12) ([1893] 2 Q.B. 394); see also the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 19 (1) (b).

In my opinion, therefore, the point raised by counsel for the party attending fails. I find myself in agreement with HARMAN, J., when he said that if the original allotments in the names of the children are to be treated as advancements "the rest of the claims follow logically", and also with his view that "having regard to the claimant's ignorance" the Statute of Limitations would not have afforded a defence.

This brings me, therefore, to the real question in the case, which is this: When the father put these shares into the names of the children, did he intend them as advancements to the children or not? And on this question we have heard much argument about the admissibility of evidence. It is said in some of the text-books that the contemporaneous acts and declarations of the father are admissible, but not subsequent acts or declarations unless they are against his interest. I do not think that is correct. A distinction must be drawn between subsequent acts and subsequent declarations. Whenever the courts have to ascertain the intention of a person in doing an act, it is always permissible to look to subsequent acts and conduct on his part which throw light on his intention. Take the familiar case where a man takes and drives away a motor car without the consent of the owner. The offence depends on his intention at the time of taking it. If he intended to deprive the owner permanently of it, he is guilty of theft; if he merely intended to use it for a temporary purpose, he is not guilty of theft but only of a statutory offence. On the question of his intent, his subsequent conduct is most relevant, whether for him or against him. If, at some later time, he returns the car to its owner, that is admissible evidence to negative an intent to steal. Thus, if he returns it after a few hours, it is strong evidence, but if he waits for several months it is weak evidence. If he only returns it after he knows the police are on his track, then a jury might well think that, at the time of taking, he intended to deprive the owner of it permanently and was guilty of theft, and that the return of it was a belated attempt to manufacture evidence in his favour. But there is no doubt that the return of it can be given in evidence in his favour. The weight to be attached to it is entirely for the jury: see HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 1, p. 509. Declarations by a man about his intention in doing an act stand on a different footing. Contemporaneous declarations are admissible, but not subsequent declarations, at any rate not in his own favour. Statements made voluntarily by a man as to his past intention can always be given in evidence by the other side, but they cannot be given in evidence on his own side. If the man who took the motor car afterwards tells an acquaintance: "I took the car with the idea of selling it", that is admissible in evidence against him as an admission, but if he tells a friend: "I only took the car for a drive round", he cannot call the friend to give the statement in evidence, because it is hearsay. If the accused man desires to say that, he must say it on oath in the witness-box.

I have taken the trouble to state those elementary propositions because, save for the Evidence Act, 1938, the rules of evidence are the same in civil actions as in criminal matters, and I see no reason why they should be any different in the cases about advancement. If a question arises between father and son, or between the father's representatives and the son, as to the intention of the father when he put property into his son's name, then the subsequent acts and conduct of the father are, in my opinion, admissible, whether for him or against him. The weight to be attached to them is entirely for the tribunal of fact. There are many cases where such evidence has been received, and none that I can find where it has been rejected, though, to be sure, the weight attached to it has varied. Thus, in the common case where the father buys property in his son's name and afterwards takes the rents and profits for himself, no one had doubted that this receipt of the rents and profits is a relevant circumstance and admissible in evidence. In 1677 LORD NOTTINGHAM, L.C., himself admitted it, together with evidence of other subsequent acts of ownership by the father, in the original case in which this subject was discussed, Lord Grey v. Lady Grey (3), and the only question which troubled him was the weight to be attached to it. Seventy years later, in 1748, when LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., had occasion to consider the matter in Pole v. Pole (13), he stated (1 Ves. Sen. 76) quite generally that

A “ . . . where a father takes an estate in the name of his son, it is to be considered as an advancement, but that is liable to be rebutted by subsequent acts.”

To go on forty more years, in the leading case of Dyer v. Dyer (14), where a father took property in the name of himself and his eldest son in succession, and afterwards made a will leaving it to his younger son, the Court of Exchequer (sitting on its equity side) admitted evidence of the father's conduct in leaving B it by will, though it was held not sufficient to rebut the presumption. In Finch v. Finch (15) in 1808, LORD ELDON, L.C., admitted evidence of an uncle's will, though he declined to attach any importance to it. Likewise in 1834 in Crabb v. Crabb (6), LORD BROUGHAM, L.C., admitted a codicil in evidence, though he gave no weight to it. In 1875, in Marshall v. Crutwell (16), C SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., admitted evidence of subsequent acts by a husband and held that in the circumstances the presumption was rebutted.

It is sometimes said that it is not so much the father's subsequent conduct which is admissible, but rather the acquiescence of the son in it. That was the view expressed by LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in the case of Lord Stowell's advancements: see Sidmouth v. Sidmouth (4). I confess I do not follow this line of reasoning. It is not the son's intention which is in question, it is the D father's intention, and his intention at the time when the property was put in the son's name. The son may not have known anything of the transaction when the property was put into his name. He may not have heard anything of it until years later. Yet when the son discovers that it is in his name and finds that his father is receiving dividends from it, it is agreed on all hands that his acquiescence is admissible in evidence. On what ground is this acquiescence E admissible? It can only be on the ground that it is an admission by the son to this extent: “I know that my father never intended me to have this property.” In drawing that inference, the son in most cases has nothing to go on except the conduct of his father subsequent to the transaction. If the son's inferences from subsequent conduct are admissible, surely the inferences of the court are also admissible.

F It is instructive to observe that in all the many cases where a father has received the dividends, no son has ever sought to recover them back from the father or his estate, and in Dyer v. Dyer (14) EYRE, C.B., gave a broad hint that no son would be allowed to do so. The Chief Baron said (2 Cox, Eq. Cas. 95):

G “ . . . now would the court sustain a bill by the son against the father for these rents? I should think it pretty difficult to succeed in such a bill.”

It should be noticed that the Chief Baron made that observation in regard to a case where the son was under age and was, therefore, incapable of acquiescence to his detriment. If the son in such a case is disentitled to recover the rents, the reason must be because the subsequent conduct of the father is strong H evidence that he intended to retain a life interest in the property, taking the income of it during his life, but intending that the property itself should belong to the son after his death. In short, the subsequent conduct is admissible as evidence of the father's intention.

Turning now to subsequent statements or declarations made by a father, in which he states what his intention was at the time of the transaction, it is quite clear that their admissibility follows the common law rules. If, and in so far as, they amount to admissions by the father that he intended to give the property to his son, they are admissible against him or his estate on the ground of admissions. If he is dead and they are declarations against his interest, they are admissible on that ground. If they are statements in his favour to the effect that he intended that the property should belong beneficially to him, they are inadmissible on the ground of hearsay, but, be it noted, on that ground only. It is not because they are subsequent to the transaction, but because they are hearsay, that they are not admitted. Once the objection of hearsay is overcome, as it can be if the father is alive and comes to give evidence, then his statement on oath is admissible, even though it is made many years after the transaction: see Devoy v. Devoy (2). Nowadays the objection of hearsay can also be overcome under the Evidence Act, 1938. If the father is dead and before his death made a written statement at a time when litigation was not pending or anticipated, his statement is admissible in evidence, though its weight is entirely for the judge.

It has been suggested that there is good reason why subsequent declarations should not be admissible, because: "If the rule were otherwise it would be extremely easy for persons to manufacture evidence . . .": see Warren v. Gurney (7), per MORTON, L.J. ([1944] 2 All E.R. 473). But, with great respect, that is a consideration going to the weight of the evidence, not to its admissibility. It is extremely easy for a father to invent his subsequent evidence on oath, but, nevertheless, it is admissible, although the judge may attach little weight to it. So also it is extremely easy for a father to take the son's income, and for the son out of filial piety to acquiesce, but, nevertheless, it is admissible, although the judge may attach little weight to it, at any rate, so far as the corpus is concerned.

These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the admissibility of evidence in these cases is to be governed by the same rules as in other civil actions, and according to those rules, in order to ascertain a man's intention, evidence is admissible, not only of the nature of the act and his contemporaneous statements which are part of the transaction, but also of any subsequent acts and conduct on his part which throw a light on his intention. That was the view of HARMAN, J., and I entirely agree with it. It is much better to have a simple rule like this, which can be easily applied without resort to precedents, rather than a rule of exclusion which is subject to numerous exceptions and can only be applied after much research into the books, and then only with hesitation and uncertainty.

This brings me at long last to the facts. There is, to start with, the presumption of advancement. That is not, as I understand it, a presumption of conclusive or compelling force. It is, as was said in Dyer v. Dyer (14), a "circumstance of evidence", which means, I take it, that it is like other well-known presumptions—the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts, for instance, or the presumption of res ipsa loquitur—a provisional presumption only. It gives rise to an inference which may—not must—be drawn. If there is no other evidence on either side, an advancement will unhesitatingly be inferred, but if there is other evidence pointing one way or the other, then the tribunal of fact must, at the end of the case, come to its own conclusion whether an advancement was intended or not, giving proper weight to the natural inclination of a father to provide for his son, but also taking into account all other circumstances.

Approaching the facts in that way, what do we find? This father put shares into the names of his children, but he never told them anything of what he had done, although they were of an age well to understand it, indeed two of them were of full age. Not only did he tell them nothing about it, but thenceforward he dealt with the shares as if they were solely his property and no concern of the children at all. When a large dividend was declared on their shares, he took it for himself and used it to pay off his own debts. When an opportunity arose to sell the shares at a great profit, he sold them without a word to them and took the proceeds for himself. It is true that a few days later he did, on his accountant's advice, put the proceeds into deposit accounts in the names of his children, but he promptly neutralised that action by getting them to sign authorities enabling him to draw on the accounts as he pleased, and thenceforward he used the money as his own. All this would have been most reprehensible if it had been the children's money that he was using. He ought at least to have told them what he was doing and to have got their consent to it, but he said not a word to them. He got them to sign all the necessary documents by telling them where to sign, and they signed, and that is all they knew about it. Such absolute dominion goes far to show that he never intended to make a gift to them, but always intended that the shares and their proceeds should belong to him.

Now contrast his action over the shares with his actions over house property and over loan capital to the estates company. He put those in the children's names, but he told them what he had done, and he never used them as his own. At his death, the children took the houses and the loan capital absolutely, and a very ample provision it was for them, £50,000 apiece. There is no doubt that those were advancements and that the children have the benefit of them, but not content with that, they seek in this action to go back eighteen years and say that their father, all those years ago, took away shares and money which belonged to them and converted them to his own use. It is a monstrous claim to make against a father who treated them so well. The truth is that the shares and money never belonged to them, and I think that they must at the time have known it and since forgotten it, otherwise they would not have signed the documents so blindly as they did.

I find myself in full agreement with the judge who tried the case, and I would dismiss the appeal.

ROMER, L.J.: The question whether the result of a voluntary transfer of property by a parent into the name of his child is to vest, not only the legal title to the property, but the beneficial interest therein as well in the child depends on the intention of the parent at the time of the transfer. It, accordingly, resolves itself into a question of fact to be determined in the light of all admissible evidence. The fact that the transferee is the child of the transferor is a circumstance of evidence which suffices, in the absence of any other evidence, to displace the presumption of resulting trust which normally arises in cases where the transferee is a stranger in blood to the transferor. The relationship of parent and child is, however, by no means conclusive of the parent's intention, but is only an indication, and it may be either confirmed or overridden by any such other evidence as may be available and admissible as to the state of the parent's mind in relation to the transaction at the time when it was effected. The principles as stated above are well established in our law and are applicable equally to purchases by a father in the name of his child as to transfers to the child either by the father or by some third party at the father's direction.

A question which was much discussed on the hearing of the present appeal was as to the limits of admissibility of matters which might, if they were accepted for consideration, illuminate the intention of a parent at the time that he passed property into the legal ownership of his child, and, in particular, whether the acts or conduct (as distinct from the declarations) of the father subsequent to the transaction may properly be admitted in evidence as being relevant to his state of mind at the time of the transaction itself. It has been suggested that all such acts and conduct are admissible in evidence, it being a matter for the judge to decide whether any, and, if so, what, weight or value should be attributed to them. For myself I find a difficulty in accepting this view, which appears to me to be in conflict with long-standing authority and with the opinion of the text writers on the subject, who treat subsequent acts by the parent as being just as inadmissible in general to support a resulting trust as is evidence of the parent's subsequent declarations: see, for example, UNDERHILL'S LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, 10th ed., p. 187; ASHBURNER'S PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY, 2nd ed., p. 110; WHITE AND TUDOR'S LEADING CASES IN EQUITY, 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 775; and LEWIN ON TRUSTS, 14th ed., p. 157. Certain acts at least of a parent performed subsequent to the transaction, and referable to the property transferred, seem to me to be manifestly irrelevant to an inquiry as to his intention at the time of the transaction itself. For example, a man transfers property to his son in 1930. In 1940 he makes a will bequeathing the property to someone else. This testamentary disposition is, in my opinion, not only entitled to no weight in ascertaining what the transferor's intention was in 1930, but it should not be received in evidence at all. This view is in conformity with Finch v. Finch (15), and Crabb v. Crabb (6), in which cases the precise point was considered by LORD ELDON, L.C., and LORD BROUGHAM, L.C., respectively, and with cases such as Sidmouth v. Sidmouth (4), Jeans v. Cooke (17) and Christy v. Courtenay (5). The reason for rejecting such a testamentary act as evidence is the same as that which was explained by this court in Warren v. Gurney (7) as the ground for rejecting a parent's subsequent declarations, viz., that they could be manufactured by the parent for his own ends. The further objection that the testator might well have forgotten about the earlier gift when he made his will is possibly more germane to the weight to be attributed to the testamentary act than to its actual admissibility. What I have said with regard to subsequent testamentary dispositions of a parent would apply equally in principle to other subsequent conduct, e.g., acts of ownership by him over property which he had transferred to his son when such acts were initiated some years after the date of the transfer and were never made known to the son. Such acts would, as I think, be wholly inadmissible as evidence to support an intention by the father of resulting trust: see Murless v. Franklin (18). I would add, with regard to the observation of LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., in Pole v. Pole (13), that the presumption of an advancement "is liable to be rebutted by subsequent acts", that it is pointed out (rightly, as I think) in UNDERHILL'S LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, 10th ed., p. 187, that LORD HARDWICKE's dictum must surely be given a narrower interpretation than that which his words seem to imply.

What subsequent acts or events, then, are properly admissible in evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the father's intention in transferring property to his child? Without attempting any exhaustive definition the following categories of conduct seem to me to qualify: first, evidence of acts both by father and son is receivable, if against interest, for such acts operate as admissions; secondly, acts are admissible, if they are so associated with the original transaction as, in effect, to form part of it, for example, the continued retention by a father, on the uncommunicated purchase of property in his son's name, of the title deeds, and of accrued and accruing rents subsequently paid by the tenants; thirdly, I think that subsequent acts are admissible, if they tend to show a course of dealing as between parent and child. For example, a father buys shares for a child in circumstances which, if taken alone, would tend to establish an advancement. Evidence would, I think, be admissible to show that both before and after this particular transaction the father made purchases of shares in the same company in the name of the same child avowedly as nominee for himself, for this evidence would be relevant to the question whether the particular transfer should be taken in isolation or should be regarded as one of a series of transactions, and thus be stamped with the same characteristic as attached to the others.

I now turn to the question of what was the intention of the testator in the present case, Philip Edward Shephard, when, in 1929, he secured the allotment to the plaintiffs of shares in the private companies which he and Mr. Meyer promoted. This is obviously the prime issue in the case, for I respectfully agree (for the reasons stated by DENNING, L.J., in his judgment) with the view of HARMAN, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 575), that if

A "the original allotments of shares in their names with the private companies are to be treated as advancements to them so that they became once and for all the beneficial owners of those shares, the rest of the claims follow logically."

B The argument for the plaintiffs before us was that the allotments ought to be so treated, with the result that from the moment when the allotments were made the plaintiffs became the absolute and sole beneficial owners of the shares allotted to them respectively. The contrary argument for the party attending was that the plaintiffs were not intended by the testator to have any beneficial interest in the shares at all, but were mere pegs on which the testator found it proper to hang the legal title for his own personal convenience. After the most careful consideration of what is, I think, a difficult case, I have come to the conclusion that the intention of the testator was something betwixt and between that which is attributed to him by the plaintiffs and that for which their brother contends.

C In my judgment, the testator, in having the shares allotted to the plaintiffs, did intend to confer a benefit on them, but one that was future, nebulous, and subject to an overriding control which was to remain vested for an indefinite period in himself. If he thought right to let them have a dividend, then they were to have it, but not otherwise. If he sold the shares, they were to take such part of the proceeds as he decided to give them, but no more. He might, indeed, dispose of such proceeds wholly in some other direction and, if he did, so much the worse for them, but underlying all this was an intention that, in addition to receiving such gifts as he might confer on them from time to time, they should ultimately inherit whatever remained undisposed of at his death. There is nothing surprising in a father forming an intention such as this, and especially when he is a man who is engaged in activities of a somewhat speculative character demanding a ready supply of capital, to whom it would be inconvenient to part irrevocably with large sums which he might require at short notice for the furtherance of his enterprises. A comparable intention was in fact established to the satisfaction of the court in the case of the father in Devoy v. Devoy (2). The relevant and admissible considerations in the present case point strongly, in my judgment, to the view that such was the intention of the testator, Philip Shephard. In the first place, the course of dealing as between him and his children (which, as I have already indicated, is, in my opinion, relevant) supports the view. From the earliest times as to which evidence is available, the testator put property into the names of his children for his own purposes without intending to vest any immediate beneficial ownership in them and, indeed, in most cases, without telling them anything about it. Examples of this are to be found in the registration under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, of a business in the names of "R. D. & P. E. Shephard", the hairdressing business at Dartford which he established in the name of his daughter Winifred, and the furnishing business which was carried on at premises at Torquay, ostensibly belonging to Richard, and which was registered as the property of Richard & Grimes. Then with regard to the houses which he apparently bought in the names of the plaintiffs from time to time. Richard said in evidence that the testator first told him of the purchases which had been made in his name from 1929 onwards some time after he attained twenty-one in November, 1935. As to one of such properties, a house at Hastings, Richard's evidence was that this was bought in his name by the testator in 1932 or 1933, but the testator did not tell him so until 1936 or 1937. The testator had converted the house into flats, which were not a success, so he put in a manageress to run the place as a hotel. This also was a failure because the manageress took to drink, and it was not until then that the testator told Richard of the original purchase and asked him to take over the property, which he did. The service contract of the manageress was, apparently, with Richard, though he did not realise that this was so until he took over the property from her. Richard did not receive the rents of any of the properties standing in his name until about 1936 when, he said, they were given to him.

As to the properties in Winifred's name, she made her home in the house at Streatham which her father bought for her in 1934, but she never received any of the rents of the other properties at all, receiving only an allowance from her father of £84 a month. Her evidence was not that the testator gave these properties to her so that they should belong to her at once. He told her, apparently, that they would be something for her when she was older and when he had gone. She understood from him that he was making her a present of them to come to her, as she said, eventually. It would appear, therefore, that with regard to the house properties bought in these children's names from 1929 onwards, no immediate or absolute gift was intended or made, but they remained subject to the father's dominion and control.

This characteristic attached also, in my opinion, to the allotment of the shares. Neither of the plaintiffs was at any time in a position to sell the shares or otherwise deal with them, for neither of them ever had a share certificate. Whether or not any share certificates were actually issued by the company is not definitely known, but none was ever in the possession of the plaintiffs. Nor, indeed, did either of the plaintiffs know anything about the allotments at all. Although, therefore, they were the legal owners of the allotted shares the position was that neither of them had either the means or the knowledge to turn them to any personal advantage. Neither did they fare any better with regard to income benefits deriving from the shares. Only one dividend was declared by any of the five private companies, and that was a dividend of £25 10s. tax free per share declared by New Ideal Homesteads, Ltd. There were a thousand shares of this company, of which half were held by the Meyer family. The testator received fifty per cent. of the total dividend declared and applied it to his own purposes notwithstanding that each of his three children held one hundred shares in the company. In the course, however, of correspondence with the income tax commissioners concerning this dividend which subsequently ensued, the testator told his accountant, Mr. Dunk, that each child had a beneficial interest in the dividend proportionate to his or her holding, and Mr. Dunk informed the commissioners accordingly. As a final example of the testator's complete disregard of the position of the plaintiffs as shareholders, he obtained the vesting of their shares in the public company without their knowing anything about it, either, presumably, by purporting to transfer them himself or by procuring their signatures to share transfers in the same way that he, from time to time, procured their signatures to innumerable other documents. I regard all these matters regarding the testator's control over the shares from the moment they were allotted as admissible evidence under the second head to which I have earlier referred, viz., events which are so associated with the original transaction as, in effect, to form part of the terms of that transaction.

Further proof of the testator's determination to retain control of the realisable value of the shares is to be found in the way in which he dealt with the matter when the shares were acquired by the public company. At or about the time of this acquisition the testator procured from the plaintiffs their signature to documents which made him complete master of the situation. The first were powers of attorney authorising the testator to act on the plaintiffs' behalf in relation to every conceivable matter that might arise in connection with their shares in the private companies. The second documents were authorities to the directors of the public company requesting them to pay to the testator the cash portion of the purchase consideration payable to them on the sale and to hand to him the allotment letters in respect of the shares to be allotted to them as further part of the consideration. It does not appear whether the testator acted under the powers of attorney (though he may have done so in order to pass to the public company the plaintiffs' shares in the private companies) but he acted on the authorities so as to possess himself of the cash consideration and of the plaintiffs' shares in the public company, which he forthwith proceeded to sell. He then applied the cash and the proceeds of the shares in a manner inconsistent with any possible view that he regarded them as belonging to his children in any absolute sense, though he indicated a recognition of some sort of beneficial interest being vested in them by establishing the deposit accounts in their names, albeit at the suggestion of Mr. Dunk. The plaintiffs themselves knew nothing of these things at the time. This vague acknowledgment of the children's interests, however, was sufficiently fleeting for within a few months he had drawn the whole of the moneys out of the deposit accounts, in pursuance of further authorities which he had obtained from the plaintiffs, and applied them to purposes of his own. Later, however, he did take the definite step, which he communicated to the plaintiffs, of opening the loan accounts with Philip Edward Shephard Estates, Ltd., and thus of conferring on each of them a substantial provision by way of advancement. The rest of the moneys derived from the original allotments he substantially disposed of in other directions, and, indeed, it is for that reason that these proceedings have belatedly been brought. It seems to me that his conduct in relation to the plaintiffs' shares in the private companies and the consideration received from the public company on their acquisition is of the same pattern as had characterised all the dealings with his children of which we have knowledge. He himself retained control in the same way as he had done of the earlier businesses and the houses. He had not found it convenient or proper to accompany the legal title to the businesses with any immediate beneficial interest. As to the house and real properties, he had given certain limited benefits (e.g., he eventually gave to Richard the hotel at Hastings and the rents of the other properties from 1936), but any further benefits (and there might possibly be none) were to be reserved for the future. So also, in exactly the same way, he retained control of the shares in the private companies and of the purchase consideration when they were sold, but did in fact confer benefits, quantified by himself, through the medium of the loan accounts. From first to last he maintained a dominating control by means of documents which he prepared himself and which the children signed without question or demur. In these circumstances, it seems impossible to me to regard the original share allotments as constituting one single transaction, isolated and divorced from the other dealings which the testator had with the plaintiffs both earlier and subsequently. It has to be remembered that when the private company shares were allotted they were of no considerable value, and I regard their allotment to the plaintiffs as constituting merely one link in a chain of transactions between parent and children and as possessing the same characteristic as the others, viz., the retention by the parent of control and dispositive power. The principal, if not the only, point of substance, in my opinion, which the plaintiffs can urge against this view is the fact that the agreement of May 16, 1934, expressly recites that the members of the Meyer family held their shares in the private companies as trustees for the elder Leo Meyer, whereas there is no such recital in favour of their father with regard to the plaintiffs' shares. It may well be, however, that the scintilla of beneficial interest in the plaintiffs which the testator did, undoubtedly, recognise displaced in the testator's mind the applicability of such a recital. Be that as it may, I cannot think that this feature of the case is of any great consequence when one surveys the position as a whole, and, in so surveying it, I find myself in entire agreement with HARMAN, J., when he said in his judgment ([1953] 1 All E.R. 579):

"Considering the evidence as a whole, and doing my best to weigh the circumstances on both sides, I feel obliged to come to the conclusion that the testator did not in the earlier allotments of shares, any more than in the transactions with the businesses, intend to commit himself irrevocably by way of out and out gifts. I take the view . . . that these were only provisional arrangements not intended to remove his freedom of action, and I find no principle of law which prevents me from giving effect to that view."

For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HOWELL v. HOWELL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), July 6, 1953.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Order against successful party—Relief of legal aid fund—Relevance—Order in favour of unsuccessful petitioner against successful party cited.

A wife petitioned for a decree of dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband denied the cruelty and alleged adultery by his wife with the party cited. The husband and the party cited were both legally aided, but the latter was liable to contribute substantially towards his costs. The allegation of adultery was dismissed by the commissioner, who nevertheless made an order for £75 costs in the husband's favour against the party cited.

HELD: on the assumption that the court had jurisdiction to make an order for costs against a successful defendant, a party cited being in the same position as a defendant, such an order should only be made in most exceptional circumstances and not merely by reason of the fact that, as in the present case, its effect would be to relieve the taxpayer quoad the party in whose favour the order was made.

APPEAL by the party cited from an order of Mr. Commissioner BUSH JAMES, Q.C., dated Feb. 23, 1953.

The wife petitioned for a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband in his answer denied cruelty and alleged adultery by his wife with the party cited. The learned commissioner found that there was no cruelty by the husband and dismissed the petition; he further rejected the husband's allegation of adultery against the wife and the party cited. The party cited was legally aided, but was liable to make a substantial contribution towards his own costs, and the learned commissioner made an order against him for £75 costs.

R. T. Barnard for the party cited.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by leave from a decision as to costs by Mr. Commissioner BUSH JAMES, Q.C., and arises in the following circumstances. The wife petitioned for a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of cruelty. The husband denied cruelty and alleged adultery by his wife with the party cited, against whom an order for costs was made.

In his judgment, the learned commissioner sets out the history of the marriage, which is immaterial for present purposes except in so far as the party cited is concerned. He came to live at the matrimonial home as a lodger, and, as found by the commissioner, he became friendly with the wife and they went about together. The learned commissioner says:

"I think the conduct of the party cited is to be much deprecated. I think that it is entirely through him that the wife left her husband in August, 1951, and I think he comes out of this case very badly, but that is very different from making a finding of adultery against him, and I have to bear in mind that apart from this photograph there is no evidence of any affection, in the sense of familiarity, having existed between these two people at all. I think he has been most foolish. I think he has asked for trouble, and I think that the respondent has reasons for a very great grudge against him, but adultery is a serious matter, and has to be established by concrete evidence. I am not satisfied that that evidence has been produced. I accordingly make no finding with regard to the adultery alleged in this case."

The learned commissioner also found against the wife on the issue of cruelty. When costs came to be discussed counsel for the party cited stated that he did not propose to ask for any order as to costs in favour of the party cited against the respondent, but he asked for the usual order in relation to a legally aided person. The commissioner then asked to see the figures, and, when he found that the party cited had to make a substantial contribution towards his own costs, he proceeded to make an order against the party cited, although he was successful, for £75. In the course of the discussion he said:

"I have an absolute discretion?" Counsel: "I think so. One cannot say he brought this action about." The commissioner: "Why should the taxpayer subsidise this man? That is what you are asking me to do?"

He then made the order for £75.

Counsel, citing Gray v. Lord Ashburton (1), submitted that in the case of a successful defendant—and a party cited is in the same position as a defendant—there was no jurisdiction to make an order ordering him to pay costs. The same matter was considered so far as the courts of equity and common law were concerned under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, sched. I, Ord. 55, in Re Foster v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). It is unnecessary to consider whether in the circumstances of this case the court would have jurisdiction to make an order that the party cited should contribute towards the costs where he was successful, because counsel is content to base his submission for the purpose of this appeal on the proposition that it would be only in the most exceptional circumstances that such an order could be made judicially and that the criticisms of the party cited made by the learned commissioner in this case do not approach circumstances which would justify the making of such an order. I agree with that. I do not think they would justify the making of such an order, assuming there was jurisdiction to make it. I think the explanation of the order made by the learned commissioner in this case is to be found in the observation which he made in the course of the discussion: "Why should the taxpayer subsidise this man?" The effect of the order made by the commissioner would be to relieve the taxpayer to some extent in respect of the respondent's costs because the respondent was himself legally aided. So far as that is concerned, I think the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 1 (7) (b), is relevant, and it provides:

"Save as expressly provided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made thereunder . . . (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised." A

Therefore, I do not think it would be right to exercise this discretion, assuming it exists, in a particular way merely because its effect would be to relieve the taxpayer quoad the person in whose favour the order for costs was made. For these reasons I think that the order against the successful party cited cannot stand and it should be set aside. B

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. On the assumption that the court has jurisdiction in a proper case to order payment of costs by a wholly successful defendant, in my view that can be the right order to make only in most exceptional circumstances. It is clear that the observations made by the learned commissioner in regard to the injudicious conduct of the party cited in this case fall far short of providing ground on which such an exceptional step could properly be taken. I agree with my Lord that it appears from the discussion at the end of the judgment that the learned commissioner was led, in part at all events, to take the course he took by the circumstance that the parties were State-aided litigants. That, as my Lord has pointed out, was a circumstance that he should not have taken into account. Accordingly, I agree that the learned commissioner erred in making this order for costs and that the appeal should be allowed. C D

HODSON, L.J.: I agree and have nothing to add. E

Appeal allowed.

GRAFF BROTHERS ESTATES, LTD. v. RIMROSE BROOK JOINT SEWERAGE BOARD AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.J.J.), July 1, 1953.]

Practice—Striking out pleading—Statement of claim—Claim in writ for damages “for wrongfully taking away the support of the plaintiffs’ land and houses”—Allegation in statement of claim of negligence in not preventing support being withdrawn—R.S.C., Ord. 2, r. 1; Ord. 3, r. 2.

In an action against a statutory authority and contractors carrying out work on their instructions the plaintiffs indorsed their writ, issued on Mar. 5, 1952: “The plaintiffs’ claim is for damages for wrongfully taking away the support of the plaintiffs’ land and houses.” In their statement of claim delivered on Apr. 20, 1953, they alleged: “(3) . . . the defendants entered into the said land of the plaintiffs by driving tunnels through the same and pumped water from the said land and thereby withdrew support from the said land and buildings of the plaintiffs. (4) The said entry and pumping constituted a trespass. (5) Alternatively the defendants were negligent in failing to take any or any sufficient precautions to prevent support being withdrawn from the said land and buildings of the plaintiffs by the said tunnels and the said pumping of water from the said land.” In an application to strike out para. (5) of the statement of claim on the ground that it constituted a new cause of action which was not covered by the indorsement on the writ, HELD: the indorsement on the writ stated the “nature of the claim” as required by R.S.C., Ord. 2, r. 1, without setting forth “the precise ground of complaint”, as was permitted by Ord. 3, r. 2, and was sufficient to cover a claim for nuisance, negligence, trespass, or withdrawal of support, and, therefore, para. (5) did not set up a new cause of action and would not be struck out.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs against an order of BARRY, J., dated June 12, 1953, affirming an order of the district registrar, Liverpool district registry, dated May 27, 1953, striking out para. (5) of the statement of claim in an action against a statutory authority on the ground that it sought to set up a new cause of action, not covered by the indorsement on the writ, more than twelve months after the cause of action accrued, contrary to the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). The plaintiffs contended that the paragraph did not constitute a new cause of action.

Levy, Q.C., and E. D. Sutcliffe for the plaintiffs.

Viscount Hailsham, Q.C., and O’Malley for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of BARRY, J., who, sitting in chambers, upheld the order of the district registrar striking out para. (5) of the statement of claim in the action. The writ, which was issued on Mar. 5, 1952, by its indorsement says:

"The plaintiffs' claim is for damages for wrongfully taking away the support of the plaintiffs' land and houses."

The statement of claim, which was not delivered until Apr. 20, 1953, reads:

"(1) The plaintiffs are the owners of and in possession of certain land and houses erected thereon in number thirty-nine and known as Nos. 2 to 78 Langton Road, Litherland, in the county of Lancaster. (2) The first defendants are a statutory body constituted to carry out a drainage scheme in Litherland aforesaid. At all material times the second defendants were contractors who on the instructions of the first defendants carried out the works hereinafter complained of. (3) During the months of March, April and May, 1951, the defendants entered into the said land of the plaintiffs by driving tunnels through the same and pumped water from the said land and thereby withdrew support from the said land and buildings of the plaintiffs. (4) The said entry and pumping constituted a trespass."

Paragraph (5), which was struck out by the order of the master, upheld by the judge, is:

"Alternatively the defendants were negligent in failing to take any or any sufficient precautions to prevent support being withdrawn from the said land and buildings of the plaintiffs by the said tunnels and the said pumping of water from the said land."

Paragraph (6) is:

"By reason of the premises the houses of the plaintiffs numbered 42 to 78 Langton Road aforesaid were damaged and the houses of the plaintiffs numbered 2 to 40 Langton Road aforesaid are likely to suffer damage."

The damage is set out and the paragraph ends in this way:

"The subsidence which caused the above stated damage has been checked, but the plaintiffs contend that its operation is continuing and that damage to the houses numbered 2 to 40 Langton Road aforesaid will inevitably occur. And the plaintiffs claim damages against both defendants."

There is surprisingly little material before this court. The plaintiffs, in para. (2) of the statement of claim say that the defendants are a statutory body constituted to carry out a drainage scheme. We have not seen the statute under which they were constituted or under which they were acting, and counsel for the plaintiffs told us he had not seen it and knew nothing about it. Nor do we know anything more of the facts than that which is set out in the plaintiffs' statement of claim. The defendants' solicitors, on behalf of both defendants, issued a summons dated May 11, 1953, which asks for an order that para. (5) of the plaintiffs' statement of claim be struck out on the ground that it sets up a cause of action which is not indorsed on the writ of summons and which was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), at the time of the delivery of the statement of claim, and that the plaintiffs pay the costs. If para. (5) did set up a new cause of action, it appears to be clear that that cause of action was barred by s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1939, at least looking merely at the dates with which we have been supplied.

Section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, provides:

"No action shall be brought against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty or authority, unless it is commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued: Provided that where the act, neglect or default is a continuing one, no cause of action in respect thereof shall be deemed to have accrued, for the purposes of this sub-section, until the act, neglect or default has ceased."

We have had no argument on that section as applicable to the facts of this case, nor has consideration been given, so far as I can see, to the fact that there are two defendants, one a statutory body, and the other contractors acting, it may be, under contract with them. The real question is whether
 A the indorsement on the writ is sufficiently wide to embrace para. (5) of the statement of claim. In the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953 ed., are set out forms for the indorsement of writs and of those at pp. 2538 and 2539 one relates to negligence, another trespass to land, another support, and another nuisance.

When this appeal was opened to the court, counsel for the plaintiffs said that the defendants' contention was that the indorsement on the writ covered
 B nuisance and nothing else and that the defendants applied to strike out para. (5) of the statement of claim which sets up as an alternative a claim for negligence. Those facts led MORRIS, L.J., to ask counsel for the defendants in the course of the argument: "Why did you not apply to strike out the claim for trespass?" His reply was that at least he had been modest.

The indorsement on the writ is precisely in the form set out in the ANNUAL
 C PRACTICE, 1953 ed., p. 2538, under "Support", which is in these words:

"The plaintiff's claim is for damages for wrongfully taking away the support of plaintiff's land [or house or mine]."

It is not very clear what is the true category of an action in which damages are claimed for loss of support. The subject is dealt with in SALMOND ON
 D TORTS, 11th ed., p. 284, in a chapter which is headed "Nuisance", and it would seem that it is treated by the authors as a private nuisance which gives rise to an action for a civil wrong. The passage on p. 284 is:

"It is an actionable wrong to withdraw the support to which land or buildings are entitled, and thereby wilfully or negligently to cause a subsidence of the land or structural injury to the buildings. No action
 E for damages lies until and unless actual subsidence or other damage has occurred. The wrong consists not in withdrawing the support which the dominant tenement is receiving, but in doing damage by means of such a withdrawal."

Order 2, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court provides:

"Every action in the High Court shall be commenced by a writ of F summons, which shall be indorsed with a statement of the nature of the claim made, or of the relief or remedy required in the action, and which shall specify the Division of the High Court to which it is intended that the action should be assigned."

The first requirement of that rule is that the writ of summons should be indorsed with a statement of the nature of the claim made. It appears to me
 G that this writ, as indorsed, does state the nature of the claim made. The writ is regular. No objection can be taken to the indorsement on the writ. Order 3, r. 2, provides:

"In the indorsement required by Ord. 2, r. 1, it shall not be essential H to set forth the precise ground of complaint, or the precise remedy or relief to which the plaintiff considers himself entitled."

It seems clear that the indorsement on the writ in this case is within the two rules to which I have referred. The claim is for damages for wrongfully taking away the support of the plaintiffs' land and houses.

The forms to which I referred a few moments ago appear to give substance to the submission that, in a case in which the plaintiff has been deprived of support to his land, there may be a claim for damages for taking away support, there may be a claim for damages for nuisance, there may be a claim for damages for negligence, and there may be a claim for damages for trespass. If subsidence, which affects a block of houses belonging to the plaintiff, takes place, and all that the plaintiff knows is that the defendants are working under those houses, it is difficult for him to say precisely what his cause of action may be. He may, and probably will, know much more about it on discovery. But if he indorses his writ in the way in which the writ is indorsed in this case, he clearly is stating the nature of the claim made, and he is not required to set forth the precise ground of complaint. A

Having done that, the plaintiff is at some time faced with the necessity of delivering a statement of claim. In this case the plaintiffs in para. (3) set out the facts on which they relied. In para. (4) they alleged that those facts amounted to a trespass. In para. (5) they pleaded that, alternatively, the defendants were negligent in that they failed to take any or any sufficient precautions to prevent support being withdrawn. B

It is said by counsel for the defendants that para. (5) sets up an entirely new cause of action, and if it does, it is something which cannot be allowed. Order 20, r. 4, provides:

"Whenever a statement of claim is delivered the plaintiff may therein alter, modify, or extend his claim without any amendment of the indorsement of the writ." C

In the notes under that order, I find this:

"In a general indorsement it is 'not essential to set forth the precise ground of complaint, or the precise remedy or relief to which the plaintiff considers himself entitled' (Ord. 3, r. 2). Hence the plaintiff is permitted in his subsequent statement of claim, to alter, modify, or extend his original claim to any extent, and to claim further or other relief, without amending his writ (Large v. Large (1) [1877] W.N. 198; Johnson v. Palmer (2) 4 C.P.D. 258); provided he does not completely change the cause of action indorsed on the writ without amending the latter." D

Counsel for the defendants pointed out that there had been no application to amend the writ, and he said that any application that was made would be refused, undoubtedly, because of the position in which the defendants would be placed in regard to the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). E

I have formed the conclusion that para. (5) ought not to be regarded as the setting up of an entirely new cause of action. I like to see simplicity of pleading as far as possible. By the writ in this case the plaintiffs showed the nature of their complaint. In the statement of claim they set out in different ways the nature of the remedy or remedies which they sought, having regard to the facts pleaded. I do not think that it is setting up a new cause of action when plaintiffs have indorsed the writ in that way, if in their statement of claim they say: "Alternatively, if you did this and did not give support in place of that support which you have taken away, you were guilty of negligence." F

I think that the plaintiffs were entitled so to plead in their statement of claim and that it does not amount to completely changing the cause of action indorsed on the writ. I look at it in this way. The plaintiffs knew little of what had happened under the ground, except that damage had been caused. If they had not pleaded para. (5) of the statement of claim, the defendants might have pleaded in their defence that they did that which they did under their statutory powers. It seems to me that it would then have been open to the plaintiffs to plead by way of reply: "In the exercise of your statutory powers you ought to have taken precautions not to damage your neighbour by doing either that which the statute provides or that which a reasonable person or body acting as you were doing should do." Counsel for the defendants submitted that the plaintiffs would not be able to plead that by way of reply as it would be setting up a new cause of action, and that they could not do G H that without an amendment of the writ, for which it was too late. I do not agree. I think the plaintiffs would have been entitled so to plead by way of reply to such a defence. If they could do that, it really comes to this, that in their statement of claim they are setting out something which is no embarrassment to the defendants and which they are entitled to plead under this general indorsement. In other words, the plaintiffs have indorsed their writ generally according to the rules. As indorsed it appears to me to be sufficient to cover any one of the four specimen grounds, if I may so describe them, which have been mentioned in this case, nuisance, negligence, trespass and withdrawal of support. I think it is wide enough to cover all or any of them, and I do not feel that the plaintiffs ought to be shut out from alleging the alternative in para. (5) of the statement of claim.

We have been referred to certain authorities which do not seem to me to help greatly towards the solution of this question. I recognise that it has been said in the courts time and again that the plaintiff is not to be allowed to set up a new cause of action if the period provided by the Limitation Act has run. Indeed, they ought not to be allowed to set up a new cause of action without amending the writ, speaking generally. But this is not a new cause of action. The facts are set out in the statement of claim. That part of the statement of claim is unobjectionable. So, too, I think, is the alternative way of pleading on those facts set out. For those reasons I would allow this appeal, and would order that the summons of the defendants of May 11, 1953, should stand dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am of the same opinion and agree with the judgment which my Lord has just delivered. It seems to me that what the plaintiffs did in this case was fully warranted by the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 2, and Ord. 20, r. 4, to which my Lord has referred. Paragraph (5) of the statement of claim, in my judgment, does not introduce a new cause of action or a new case. The position here is entirely different from that in Marshall v. London Passenger Transport Board (3), in which the plaintiff was injured in a collision between his bicycle and a tramcar and issued a writ claiming damages for personal injuries and consequential loss sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendants, their servants or agents. At a later date, the plaintiff sought leave to amend his particulars by setting up a case of neglect to keep the tram track and highway in repair, describing that neglect as a breach of statutory duty. It was held that he could not do that. LORD WRIGHT, M.R., said ([1936] 3 All E.R. 88):

“The claim originally indorsed on the writ was for damages for personal injuries caused by the negligent driving of the defendants’ servant—that is, a claim based on negligence in driving and negligence of a vicarious character; it proceeds on the liability of the defendants for their servant’s default. The amendment which is proposed is based upon what I regard as something entirely different, not as a claim for negligent driving and not as a claim for breach of duty by the defendants’ servant for which the defendants are liable; it is based on a claim for breach of statutory duty that may indeed be regarded as statutory negligence, as explained in the recent case of Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M’Mullan (4), but it is certainly an entirely different claim from a claim for negligent driving, and it is a claim which is not based on vicarious liability. It is a claim for breach of a statutory duty, which is a liability personal to the corporation and not capable of being delegated; but in addition to that it involves, as I read the proposed amendment, a quite different set of ideas, quite a different allegation of fact.”

Here, in my judgment, para. (5) of the statement of claim does not embark on a different set of ideas or on a different allegation of fact. In a sense, para. (5) of the statement of claim might be regarded as a new explanation or a new allegation as to how the wrongful taking away of support may have come about, but it is the same complaint as is denoted by the indorsement on the writ. By "complaint", of course, I am not referring to damage, but to cause of action. In my judgment, there was in para. (5) no allegation of a new cause of action. Nothing in the nature of a new case was set up. Paragraph (5), in my judgment, is all under the umbrella raised by the indorsement of the writ. I, therefore, concur in the judgment that my Lord has delivered.

Appeal allowed.

DEAN v. PRINCE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), June 24, 25, 26, 1953.]

Company—Shares—Transfer—Disposition on death—Article of association providing for sale to directors at price certified by auditor as fair value—Auditor acting as expert—Finality of auditor's certificate—Basis of valuation explained—Wrong basis.

The nominal capital of a small private company, which carried on a light engineering business, was £200, divided into two hundred shares of £1 each. The deceased was a director and the chief shareholder, holding one hundred and forty shares. The other two directors each held thirty shares. Article 9 (g) of the company's articles of association provided that, if a member died, "his shares shall be purchased and taken by the directors at such price as is certified in writing by the auditor to be in his opinion the fair value thereof at the date of death and in so certifying the auditor shall be considered to act as an expert and not as an [arbitrator] . . ." On Nov. 6, 1951, the deceased died, and on Dec. 6, 1951, the auditors certified that a fair value for his shares, for the purpose of art. 9 (g), was £7 a share. The plaintiff, his personal representative, being dissatisfied with the valuation, the auditors let her have the notes on which it was based. The notes showed that the auditors were of the opinion that, if the company was regarded as a going concern, the shares were merely of nominal value, and that they made their valuation on the basis that the company was wound-up immediately after the deceased's death and that the assets were sold, as so many loose chattels, at an auction as soon as possible thereafter. On this basis the machinery was valued at £1,785, whereas, according to the evidence, its value to anyone taking over the factory as a going concern would have been £4,800. The auditors completely disregarded the fact that the shares held by the deceased carried with them the right to control the business. In an action by the plaintiff for, inter alia, a declaration that the auditors' certificate was not binding, HELD: (i) if the auditors had not given the basis of their valuation, the plaintiff could not have questioned their certificate, but, as they had done so, the court could examine their reasons and criticise them if they were wrong, notwithstanding the provisions of art. 9 (g) of the company's articles.

(ii) the auditors were wrong, not only in making their valuation on the basis that the company was being wound-up and was in urgent need of having its assets sold immediately under a forced sale, but also in failing completely to take into consideration the fact that the person who bought the deceased's shares would have the right to control the business, and, therefore, the valuation was wrong and was not binding on the plaintiff.

B ACTION by the personal representative of a former director of the third defendant, Dean and Mulhall, Ltd., for (i) a declaration that the valuation of the shares in the company, as at the date of the deceased's death, given by the certificate of the auditors in accordance with art. 9 (g) of the company's articles, was arrived at on a wrong basis and was not binding; and (ii) an injunction restraining the first and second defendants, the remaining directors of the company, from transferring the shares held by the deceased at the valuation figure. The defendants took the preliminary point that, under the company's articles, the decision of the auditors was final, and, therefore, the action could not be maintained.

C H. E. Francis for the plaintiff.

D. S. Chetwood for the defendants.

D HARMAN, J.: This is a preliminary point taken by the defendants. The plaintiff, as the personal representative of a member of the defendant company, seeks to have re-opened the valuation of certain shares held by the deceased in the company. Article 9 (g) of the company's articles of association reads:

E "In the event of the death of any member his shares shall be purchased and taken by the directors at such price as is certified in writing by the auditor to be in his opinion the fair value thereof at the date of death and in so certifying the auditor shall be considered to act as an expert and not as an [arbitrator] and accordingly the Arbitration Act, 1889, shall not apply. Unless they otherwise agree the directors shall take such shares equally between them."

F The deceased died on Nov. 6, 1951. Shortly after his death the auditors issued a certificate pursuant to a request by the defendant directors for a valuation of the shares in the company. They certified to the defendant directors on Dec. 6, 1951, in these terms:

"As requested we have valued the shares in your company as at Nov. 6 in accordance with the requirements of art. 9 (g). In our opinion a fair value for this purpose is £7 a share."

G The plaintiff is dissatisfied with that value. Her husband, the deceased, held a controlling interest in the company, being the registered holder of one hundred and forty of the two hundred shares, and she expected to get more than that for them. Her solicitors took the matter up on her behalf and put a certain amount of pressure on the auditors to explain how they had arrived at the value of £7 a share. Eventually, on Feb. 12, 1952, the auditors wrote as follows:

H "We enclose a few notes which we have prepared to show you how the points you raised at our discussion last week have been allowed for in our valuation in so far as we considered them appropriate. We trust that they will enable you to satisfy [the plaintiff] that £7 a share represented a fair value."

From those notes it appears that a certain basis of valuation has been taken which the plaintiff says is a fundamentally wrong basis. Whether or not that is so I have not yet considered, nor do I pause to do more than assume that it might be proved to be wrong. The point taken by the defendants is that the certificate is final and binding, that on the face of the certificate there is nothing wrong with the valuation, and that it is not legitimate to go beyond the certificate and to look at explanations subsequently offered by the auditors to show that they proceeded on a wrong basis.

In my judgment, there is nothing in that point. It is well settled that those who have a discretion, e.g., trustees who have powers to apply income for maintenance and directors who have powers to admit members to a company, can maintain a silence in regard to the reason for their decision which the court will not oblige them to break, and that, if they do maintain silence, no action will lie against them, but, if they choose, for whatever reason, to disclose the motives which impelled them to their decision, the plaintiff may come to the court to impeach those motives. That seems to me to be analogous to what has happened here. It is true that the auditors are dealing as experts and that they have to arrive at what is their opinion about the fair value. It may well be that their opinion, although wrong in the eyes of others, may prevail, but, if they have founded themselves on an entirely wrong basis and have chosen to explain that basis, I cannot see that the provisions of art. 9 (g) of the company's articles preclude the plaintiff from attacking it. In Johnston v. Chestergate Hat Manufacturing Co., Ltd. (1) the manager of a company brought an action for a declaration that, on the true construction of an agreement between the parties, the company was not entitled to deduct income tax from its profits before paying him a certain percentage of the "net profits". The agreement was that, as soon as the profits had been ascertained and certified by the company's auditors, a certain percentage of the "net profits" should be paid to the plaintiff. There was then a definition of "net profits" for that purpose and again a reference to a certificate by the auditors. A subsidiary point taken by the company was that, by the terms of the agreement, the auditors' certificate was conclusive and binding. SARGANT, J., held that, the certificate being based on a wrong principle, the court was not bound by it. He said ([1915] 2 Ch. 344):

"In my opinion, if I can see that a certificate is given on a wrong principle, then I am not precluded by it from dealing with the matter. The object of such a certificate is to enable the auditors to deal with matters of account, and so on; and here on the face of the balance sheet, and on the face of the certificate, looking at the two together, it seems to me quite clear that the auditors have proceeded upon a wrong principle."

SARGANT, J., did not, therefore, confine himself to the certificate. He looked at the balance sheet on which it was based. It seems to me that I am not precluded from looking at the documents other than the certificate, or, indeed, other than the balance sheet which was before the auditors. I repeat that, if they had chosen to keep silence, I do not think that any court could have requested them to explain their reasons, but they were not strong-minded enough to do that. Therefore, I think it is open to the plaintiff to question them, and the preliminary point does not, therefore, succeed.

Preliminary objection overruled.

Argument on the plaintiff's claim was then heard.

HARMAN, J.: The defendant company was incorporated in 1938 and adopted its present name in 1943. Its nominal capital is £200, divided into two hundred shares of £1 each. At the relevant time the deceased, who was the chairman, held one hundred and forty shares, and the first and second defendants, who are also directors, each held thirty. The company's business, which is carried on in Sheffield, is small light engineering. Like many businesses of the kind, it had a considerable degree of prosperity during the war, but recently it has not been prosperous. Each of the three directors worked whole-time in it and drew each year a modest sum from it, and, when those drawings had been made, each year except one of those under review has shown some loss. In recent years the company was kept afloat largely by the fact that part of sums paid by way of excess profits tax had been recovered and reserves against taxation which were found not necessary were brought back into the profit and loss account, so that, at the end of the last year of the deceased's life, there was £4,000 still standing to the credit of that account. It appears from the balance sheet for the year ending May, 1951, that there was a trading profit of £1,100 but a net loss of £352, which was brought about by the emoluments of the then two working directors, the first and second defendants. The deceased, apparently, was not at work during that year. The plant and machinery, fixtures, fittings and motor vehicles appear together in the balance sheet at £4,000, being cost less a depreciation of more than half their value, which had been going on every year, and which appears to have been a very large degree of depreciation. The current liabilities about equal the current assets on the balance sheet, the main liability being £1,300 due to the deceased and another £800 or so due to his wife, the plaintiff, neither of whom, in the circumstances, was likely to press overmuch for those amounts.

Article 9 of the company's articles of association deals with the transfer and transmission of shares. It starts in a usual form, compelling a member who desires to transfer to offer his shares to the other members. He may name a value, and, if the directors accept that, then that is the value at which he may transfer them, but, if not, the article provides that "the fair value shall be the auditors' valuation of the current worth of the company's shares". Thus, the words "current worth" are used as synonymous "fair value". In 1943 that article was altered by adding to it further paragraphs, including para. (g). [His LORDSHIP read art. 9 (g) and continued:] It is an unusual type of article, because, instead of entitling the directors to take shares, it is mandatory on them to do so. Whether that is a right which the personal representative of the deceased member could enforce against the directors seems to me a matter of great doubt, but it does not fall to me to determine that question at this stage of the action. On the death of the deceased it was assumed that the defendant directors would take his shares, and steps were immediately taken to that end. The auditors assumed the burden of certifying in writing their opinion as to the fair value. On Dec. 6, 1951, they wrote to the defendant directors, delivering what must be taken to be their certificate under art. 9 (g). [His LORDSHIP read the terms of the certificate, and continued:] The plaintiff was extremely dissatisfied with their valuation, but she would, in my judgment, have been powerless in the matter if the auditors had declined to expand their views. Short of fraud or dishonesty, which no one attributes to the auditors in this action, there was no way of questioning the certificate if the auditors declined to give reasons for the result at which they had arrived, as the members of the company had committed themselves to be bound by their opinion. Unfortunately for the defendants, the auditors did not keep quiet, and, being pressed to explain how they arrived at what the plaintiff (who knew a good deal about the company, having acted as book-keeper and being the owner of the factory where most of the business was carried on) thought was an incorrect valuation, they answered her solicitors on Feb. 12, 1952. [His LORDSHIP read the letter and continued:] By way of preliminary point in this case, I was asked to hold that the court was bound by the certificate and could not look at the notes enclosed by the auditors with their letter, and that, therefore, there was no cause of action. I held that that was not so, the case being analogous to the well-known cases where directors refuse to accept transfers and, if they maintain silence, no one can question their refusal if it is honest, but, if they give reasons, those reasons can be impeached.

Therefore, in the present case, the plaintiff is entitled to bring to the court's notice the reasons which have been given, and the court is entitled to look at them and to criticise them as being bad.

The notes, which were enclosed with the auditors' letter of Feb. 12, 1952, are headed: "Notes on valuation of shares as on Nov. 6, 1951". At the top the auditors set out certain figures from the last balance sheet, and then what they call "the trading results". That is not quite an accurate expression, as they were not the trading results. The trading results had shown a profit in each of the four preceding years, but, in three of them, the profit and loss account had shown a loss by reason of the fact that the directors' remuneration was deducted. It was explained to me that the directors were working in the business and received no other wage, and, no doubt, it was quite right to deduct their remuneration. Paragraph 3 reads:

"In view of these trading results, and taking into account to some extent the difficult position in which the company would be placed if the amounts due to Mr. and Mrs. Dean [the deceased and the plaintiff] had to be paid, it was clear that no value could be put on the shares on a normal going concern basis other than something purely nominal. It became necessary, therefore, to consider the only other basis which could apply; i.e., break-up value."

That is the basis on which the auditors proceeded. In his evidence, Mr. Jenkinson, a partner in the firm of auditors, adhered to the view that, though the physical assets of the company, if sold at an auction in a most disadvantageous way, would possibly produce a value of £7 a share, the shares were of no value at all if looked at on what he called a "going concern basis". Although it was pointed out to him that this was nonsense, he adhered to his view. What he meant, I suppose, was that, if he were advising a client who was going to buy a parcel of these shares, he would advise him to buy them only at a nominal price because, in his view, the company's prospects were very poor. If a person were buying an interest such as that of one of the defendant directors, i.e., thirty shares in a private company which was making a loss, as this company was doing, it would be right to assume that the buyer would be in an unhappy position as he would not get a dividend. But Mr. Jenkinson did not look at the substance of the matter, viz., that what was for sale was not thirty shares of the company, or some small parcel of shares, but one hundred and forty shares, which carried with them the right to control the company. It never occurred to him that it made any difference whether he was valuing a minority or a majority interest, and he left that matter altogether out of his calculations. Being of the opinion that the company ought to be wound-up, he instructed a local valuer to value the machinery on the basis that the company had ceased business on the day of the deceased's death and that its physical assets were sold at the earliest auction sale to which they could be taken. The valuer said that he valued the machines as so many loose chattels to be sold at auctions, and some of the machines were old and, accordingly, had only scrap value. He went on to say: "A valuation in situ would have been higher, but I was not asked to value on that basis." In the circumstances one is not surprised to find that he valued the machinery at a very low sum. His valuation was given on Nov. 23, and his report to Mr. Jenkinson was in these terms:

"As requested, we have inspected the fast and loose plant and machinery, office furniture and motor vehicles owned by the above company, as per detailed inventory herewith, with a view to giving you our opinion of what these articles would be likely to realise if offered for sale by auction; i.e., their break-up value."

The figure arrived at was £1,785. After deductions in respect of the depreciation of another machine and "bad debts", the auditors treated the plant and machinery as being worth £1,400, instead of £4,000, which was the value at which they appeared in the company's accounts. There being two hundred £1 shares, the auditors valued each share at £7.

A Counsel for the defendants contended that, even if the basis of valuation were wrong, it was merely an error of judgment on the part of the auditors, and the parties, having agreed to be bound by the auditors' judgment, could not now complain if it proved to be bad. There is a good deal of force in that argument, but the answer, I think, is that the auditors did not merely make a valuation on a wrong basis—namely, break-up value, which I regard as the wrong basis—but they left out of account altogether the question of control. Mr. Jenkinson said that he would have valued a minority parcel of shares on exactly the same lines as he valued the shares belonging to the deceased. The company had made a trading profit for a number of years. B There was no urgency to put an end to its life, it had no creditors who were threatening to destroy it, it had a factory and machinery which was well maintained, and yet no inquiry was made whether factory and machinery could not be sold as an entirety. Evidence was given before me that at this time in Sheffield factory space was short, that trade in the light engineering world C was good, and that it was likely that someone could have been found who would come forward and make a bid for the whole concern. If anyone purchased the deceased's shares, he would be in a position to turn out the defendants, re-organise the factory and put in his own business, or sell everything. None of those possibilities was considered. The auditors left out of account the control factor, and that, in my view, shows that their valuation was altogether D wrong. I do not doubt that the company had no goodwill, but it does not seem to me that the alternative to that is to treat the company as being closed down and in urgent need of having its assets sold under a forced sale. It can be sold as a going concern. That does not necessarily mean that, when so sold, the machinery will fetch more than its value, but, of course, it all depends on how it is sold. A representative of one of the largest dealers in second-hand machinery in the country told me that he had examined the E machinery and valued it at £4,800, which was more than the balance sheet figure by some considerable amount, and he said that, in his opinion, that was the value of the machinery to anyone entering the factory to take it over.

Even if one deals with the assets purely on the basis of their physical value, the price must be very different if the machinery is sold on the footing that F it is ready to operate immediately, fixed in a factory, than if each piece is removed and sold at an auction. This is usefully illustrated by Attorney-General of Ceylon v. Mackie (2), a decision of the Privy Council on the question of the valuation of shares for the purposes of the Ceylon Estate Duty Ordinance, 1938. The question was similar to that of valuing the shares of an English company for the purpose of English estate duty. There was a dispute between G the Crown and the taxpayer on the method of valuation. The judgment of the Board was delivered by LORD REID, who said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 779):

H "No doubt, the value of an established business as a going concern generally exceeds and often greatly exceeds the total value of its tangible assets. But that cannot be assumed to be universally true. If it is proved in a particular case that at the relevant date the business could not have been sold for more than the value of its tangible assets, then that must be taken to be its value as a going concern."

In this case the auditors made their valuation on the basis that the company was to be wound-up immediately and that the buyer of the deceased's shares would have no control over the fortunes of the business. In both those matters they were wrong, and, in my judgment, the valuation cannot stand. I propose, therefore, to declare that the valuation is not binding on the plaintiff, and, if necessary, to restrain the defendant company from acting on the valuation. The plaintiff desires the court to take on itself the burden of ascertaining the value of the shares, i.e., to make a declaration of the basis on which the valuation should be made, and then direct an inquiry on that footing. I decline to do either of those things. I do not see what jurisdiction the court has to put itself in the place of the valuer whom the parties have chosen. I do not propose to do more at this stage than to relieve the plaintiff of any obligation that may be on her to accede to the present valuation. Accordingly, I declare that the valuation is not binding and restrain the defendant company from acting on it.

TAYLOR v. WILLOUGHBY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), June 26, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—Disagreement between members of tenant's family residing with him at time of his death regarding right to remain in possession—Action by one member to eject the other—No application made to county court under Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920 (S.R. & O., 1920, No. 1261), r. 1 (d), r. 19—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

At the time of the death of a statutory tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts his son and his step daughter were residing with him. No agreement could be reached between them as to who was entitled to succeed to the tenancy of the house under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The landlord having given a rent book to the step daughter and accepted rent from her, she commenced ejectment proceedings against the son on the ground that he was a trespasser. The county court judge regarded himself as bound by the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, and he dismissed the action and directed the parties to apply for the determination of their dispute under r. 19.

HELD: the judge was not bound by the rules to dismiss the action; his direction was not certainly effective since neither party was compelled to make an application; and his intention could be better achieved if the action stood over to give the parties an opportunity of applying under r. 19, with liberty to both parties to apply to restore the action when, if no application under r. 19 had been made, the county court judge could require, as a term of any further adjournment, that one or other of the parties would apply under the rules.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE EMLYN JONES at Warrington County Court, dated Apr. 17, 1953.

The plaintiff was the step sister of the defendant and for several years prior to 1950 they had lived at a house of which the defendant's father was the

A statutory tenant. During that time the defendant paid a weekly sum to the plaintiff in return for her looking after him. In 1950 the defendant's father died. Six weeks after the father's death the landlord of the house gave the plaintiff a rent book and thereafter accepted rent from her. Later, the plaintiff ceased to render any services to the defendant and he ceased to pay her any money, but they both continued to live in the house. The plaintiff having instituted proceedings in the county court for the ejectment of the defendant, the judge dismissed the action and directed that proceedings should be brought under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, r. 1 (d) and r. 19, for the determination of the question who succeeded to the statutory tenancy under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g). The plaintiff appealed.

B Pigot for the plaintiff.

Alan Fletcher for the defendant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the plaintiff put as his case, briefly, that the plaintiff, having obtained a contract of tenancy, or at least recognition of some kind, from the landlord, has the right to possession of this house at law, and that, unless the defendant can establish some other right to remain there, she is entitled to evict him. The learned judge thought that the best course would be to dismiss this action, he taking the view that the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, for solving this question between members of a family were mandatory in their effect.

D I am not persuaded that that is right. The Act provides at the end of s. 12 (1) (g) that in such circumstances as have arisen here the expression "tenant" shall include "such member of the tenant's family . . . as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court". Rule 1 of the rules of 1920 provides:

E "An application to the county court under the Act . . . (d) by a member of the tenant's family under s. 12 (1) (g) . . . may be made . . . to the court in the district of which the premises are situate."

The rules seem to me to be doing what rules, prima facie, are only competent to do, namely, to provide a means whereby a particular matter specified in the Act under which they are made can take effect. Rule 19 provides that where a member of the family requires the decision of the court the judge "shall" give directions as to the procedure to be followed, and he may do certain other things as well. The judge, however, taking the view which I have indicated and which he expressed thus:

"It seemed to me that I was bound by the provisions of these rules", dismissed this action and directed that proceedings should be brought by one party or the other before him to have decided the question which of them was the tenant.

H If that direction were certainly effective, it may well be that the form of order which he made would be the best one, but I do not see how such a direction can be certainly effective. If neither party makes application, nothing will happen. On the whole, therefore, it seems to me that what was in the judge's mind can be better achieved, and should have been achieved, not by a dismissal of the action, but by standing it over to give either party an opportunity of making an application under the rules. I do not want to interfere with the judge's discretion in this case any more than I need, and, I think, it will suffice if the order dismissing the action is set aside. I contemplate that the proceedings will then be treated as standing over, and either party will be at liberty to apply under the rules, or in this action to amend the pleadings, or for any other purpose that they like. But, to make it clear, I think that each of the parties should be given express liberty to apply to restore the action, so that, if neither party makes a move under the rules of 1920, either of them may apply to restore. In particular, the plaintiff may wish, if, after a reasonable interval, nothing is done by the other side, to restore this action and seek to prove a contractual tenancy with such consequences as may follow.

In making that last observation, I am not to be taken as suggesting that the plaintiff ought not herself to make the application under the rules and that she would be necessarily justified in waiting for the defendant to do so. One or other of them, plainly, should apply. Possibly they might forget their family differences and apply together. The proceedings, I gather, are of an informal character. But, taking the view that I do, namely, that it is, or may be, futile to direct one or other to make the application, I suggest that the order be discharged and this action be treated as standing over. If neither party takes the necessary steps under the rules the matter can come before the judge, and he may require as a term of any further adjournment an undertaking from one or other that he or she will proceed under the rules. These are matters, however, which, I think, should be left to the learned judge.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 14, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Indecent assault on female—Child told to commit indecent act by father.

On two occasions, when the respondent was alone in the house with his daughter, aged eleven, he put his arm round her shoulders, led her upstairs, and there exposed his person to her and told her to masturbate him. He used no force or compulsion, and the child made no objection or resistance. On the second occasion, knowing the nature of his intention, she did not wish to accompany him upstairs, but she neither objected nor resisted, but submitted to his request.

HELD: as the respondent had used no compulsion or force and had not acted in a hostile manner towards the child, there was no assault on her, and, consequently, no indecent assault.

CASE STATED by Kent justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Hythe on Jan. 13, 1953, the appellant, the Director of Public Prosecutions, preferred two informations against the respondent, charging that on two occasions between Oct. 27, 1952, and Nov. 7, 1952, he indecently assaulted at Hythe, Beryl Cissie Caroline

Rogers, his daughter, then aged eleven years, in each case contrary to the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 52.

A It was proved or admitted that the respondent at all material times lived with his wife and daughter. On two occasions between Oct. 27, 1952, and Nov. 7, 1952, he put his arm round his daughter's shoulders and led her upstairs. She made no objection or resistance, and no force or compulsion was used. He then exposed his person to the child and told her to masturbate him. On both occasions the child obeyed him although she did not wish to do so. On both occasions he was alone in the house with the child. On the first occasion he committed the indecent conduct on the landing and on the second occasion in his bedroom. On both occasions when he put his arm round his daughter's shoulders he did so to lead her upstairs, intending to conduct himself indecently towards her. On the first occasion the child neither minded nor objected to his putting his arm round her shoulders, but on the second occasion, knowing the nature of his intention towards her, she did not wish to accompany him upstairs, but, nevertheless, she neither objected nor resisted, but submitted to his request.

C It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the placing of the respondent's arm round the child's shoulders could be an assault, and, in the absence of consent by the child, would be an assault. As there were circumstances of indecency accompanying this act, the child could not consent to it, and, therefore, the justices could hold that he had assaulted her. The facts, as proved, disclosed more than a mere invitation by the respondent to touch his person. Apart from these contentions, it was further contended that an assault could be inferred from the particular circumstances of the case, in that on both occasions D the child was alone in the house with the respondent, she was ordered by him with all the weight of parental authority to masturbate him, her touching his person was an involuntary act by reason of his exercising his parental authority, and that all these facts could, and did, constitute an assault, having regard to her age.

E It was contended on behalf of the respondent that there was no case for him to answer on the grounds (i) that the acts of masturbation were invitations made by him to his daughter to touch his person, which alone could not constitute an assault on her, and (ii) that a hostile act was a necessary ingredient of an indecent assault on a child under sixteen years of age, and no evidence had been adduced of any such hostile act since the placing of his arm round her shoulders was an entirely separate transaction from the subsequent indecency and was not an assault because it was not a hostile or unfriendly F act, even if (which was denied) it formed one transaction with the subsequent indecency.

The justices dismissed the informations and the appellant appealed.

G J. M. G. Griffith-Jones for the appellant.
Collard for the respondent.

H LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Kent sitting at Hythe, before whom the respondent was charged with an indecent assault on his daughter, aged eleven. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] Before you can find that a man has been guilty of an indecent assault, you have to find that he was guilty of an assault, for an indecent assault is an assault accompanied by indecency, and, if it could be shown here that the respondent had done anything towards this child which, by any fair use of language could be called compulsion, or had acted, as I have said in other cases, in a hostile manner towards her—that is, with a threat or a gesture which could be taken as a threat, or by pulling a reluctant child towards him—that would, undoubtedly, be assault, and, if it was accompanied by an act of indecency, it would be an indecent assault.

The first case to which we were referred, Beal v. Kelley (1), was quite different from the present matter because there the defendant exposed himself to a boy and asked the boy to handle him, and, when the boy refused to do so and began to go away, the defendant ran after him, took hold of him, and pulled him towards him. There can be an assault without battery, and in that case there was, undoubtedly, an assault because the boy wanted to get away from the disgusting behaviour. The assault was accompanied by indecency, and, therefore, there was an indecent assault. That case must be compared with Fairclough v. Whipp (2), where the respondent exposed himself in the presence of a girl aged nine, saying: "Touch it", which she did. We had to hold that that was not an indecent assault because there was no authority which said that where one person invites another to touch him that can amount to an assault on the person invited.

I think that the justices were right in saying that, in principle, they could not distinguish the present case from Fairclough v. Whipp (2). There might be a case in which the evidence showed that what was done was against the will of the child, but, as the respondent used nor compulsion, no force, on the child to go upstairs, however much we may regret that we cannot punish him for doing an act which deserves the reprobation of every decent man, we feel that the only thing we can do is to say that the justices came to a right decision and reluctantly dismiss this appeal.

DONOVAN, J.: I agree.

BUTTLE v. BUTTLE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), June 26, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Amount of—Serving soldier.

A Home Office circular sent to clerks to justices stated, inter alia, that, in assessing a soldier's income in order to fix the amount of a maintenance order against him, it would be proper to take into account his pay, the amount of the marriage allowance, and the fact that in addition to receiving pay a soldier was normally clothed, fed and lodged at the public expense. The circular set out in an appendix the minimum amount which in relation to any particular soldier would normally be received by a wife by way of allotments and allowance, and stated that: "10 . . . In the absence of private income of either the husband or the wife the court should take the figure so arrived at as a general guide to a minimum amount for the maintenance order. 11. Where either the husband or the wife has other sources of income these should be taken into account in fixing the amount to be paid under a maintenance order. There will, no doubt, be cases in which a wife is in employment and may be earning a considerable wage. In any case of this kind, however, allowance should be made for the value of the issues in kind received by the soldier in order to maintain the proper balance between the respective incomes of the parties." The husband was a corporal in the Royal Horse Guards. He made an allotment of £1 8s. per week to the wife, and she had a marriage allowance of £2 9s. per week, making a total of £3 17s. The wife also earned £6 10s. per week. On a summons by the wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 go 1949, charging the husband with desertion the husband admitted desertion, and the justices, purporting to act in accordance with the advice contained in the circular, awarded the wife £3 17s. per week as maintenance. On appeal by the husband,

HELD: while, if the amount had been fixed strictly in accordance with the circular, but had been fixed on a wrong basis, compliance with the circular would of itself be no justification, the justices had purported to follow the advice contained in the circular, but had misunderstood or misapplied it for they had ignored the wife's earned income, and, therefore, they had misdirected themselves, and the case must be sent back for further consideration.

Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: If it is intended to convey, as might be thought from a literal reading of para. 11, that it is only in cases where the wife has a separate income, either by her own earnings or otherwise, that the advantages to the husband of what are called the "issues in kind" should be taken into account, I should differ. These calculations should always be made in assessing the husband's means, and not only in cases of which it can be said that they are necessary to counter-balance some private income of the wife's.

AS TO ORDERS FOR MAINTENANCE BY COURTS OF SUMMARY JURISDICTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 840, para. 1342; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 705-709, Nos. 6729-6762.

Case referred to:

(1) Collins v. Collins, [1943] 2 All E.R. 474; [1943] P. 106; 112 L.J.P. 82; 169 L.T. 184; 27 Digest, Replacement, 632, 5933.

APPEAL by the husband against the amount of a maintenance order made in favour of the wife on Feb. 24, 1953, by the Domestic Proceedings Court sitting at Chelsea (constituted under the Metropolitan Police Courts (Domestic Proceedings) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 1860), being a court of summary jurisdiction "for the city of London and that part of the metropolitan police court area as is for the time being assigned to the Bow Street and West London police courts for the purpose of the hearing and determination of domestic proceedings.")

The husband was a corporal in the Royal Horse Guards, and by his making an allotment of £1 8s. per week to his wife, she qualified for the marriage allowance of £2 9s. per week, making a total of £3 17s. per week. The wife having issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, charging the husband with desertion, the husband admitted desertion and the wife admitted that she was earning £6 10s. per week. Purporting to act in accordance with a Home Office circular (H.O. 259/52) entitled "Enforcement of Maintenance Orders and Affiliation Orders against members of Her Majesty's Forces other than Commissioned Officers", the justices awarded the wife £3 17s. per week as maintenance. The husband appealed on the question of the amount awarded.

Coode for the husband.

S. H. Noakes for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: In their reasons the justices, the chairman of whom was one of the learned metropolitan magistrates, say that the desertion was, not only proved, but actually admitted by counsel for the husband, and they go on to say:

"The amount of the order is the amount the wife normally received or would normally receive by way of qualifying allotment and married allowance if the parties were not estranged from each other, and is, in fact, the amount she had been receiving."

So the question whether it is a mere coincidence that the amount of the order equals the combined amount of the allotment and the married allowance is put beyond the slightest doubt. It was deliberate. They continue:

"This is in accordance with the advice given to clerks to justices by the Home Office in their circular letter . . . of Dec. 1, 1952, as to the arrangements made by the service departments with regard to separated wives of members of the forces."

I pause there to observe that, even if the amount had been fixed strictly in accordance with the circular, but had been fixed on a wrong basis, the compliance with the circular would of itself be no justification. The justices would not be entitled to shelter behind advice or directions given by a government department if that advice were demonstrably wrong, for then they would plainly have misdirected themselves. But if the advice has been misunderstood, and, while purporting to follow the advice, the court has in truth and in fact not followed it, but has thought that it was following it, plainly there is a misdirection of itself by the court, and the matter is open to review by the appellate tribunal.

That brings me to the relevant paragraphs of the circular. Paragraph 8 refers to the subject of estrangement, and para. 9 reads:

"In assessing a soldier's income in order to fix the amount of a maintenance order it would be proper to take into account the following items."

Nobody can take exception to that wording. The first item is the soldier's pay, which is stated at the lowest rate; the next is the amount of the married allowance which would be payable if normal domestic relations existed between the parties, which is obviously a matter properly to be taken into account; and, thirdly, is the fact that in addition to receiving pay a soldier is normally clothed, fed and lodged at the public expense, or else receives a cash allowance in lieu in special cases. There is a note to that item:

"It is impossible, however, to ascribe an accurate cash value to the food, clothing and lodging provided, and it would, therefore, be for the court to decide the value to be placed on issue in kind in each particular case."

I think it is impossible to take exception to that as a statement of the general principles. It happens to coincide, in effect, with something I am reported as having said in this court ([1943] 2 All E.R. 476) in Collins v. Collins (1), in connection with a maintenance order made against an officer in the forces which PEARCE, J., tells me is constantly followed as a matter of practice by the registrars in similar cases. Paragraph 10, which has been criticised, reads:

"From the particulars given in appendix (A) the court should be able to ascertain in relation to any particular member of the forces the minimum amount which would normally be received by the wife by way of allotments and allowance if the parties were not estranged from each other."

That is perfectly clear and accurate, and the figures in this case are the qualifying allotment of the sum of £1 8s., which attracts the marriage allowance of £2 9s. The words "minimum amount" are used because there is nothing in these schedules to prevent a man from making a voluntary allotment in addition to the compulsory qualifying allotment. But the sentence then continues in these words:

"In the absence of private income of either the husband or the wife the court should take the figure so arrived at as a general guide to a minimum amount for the maintenance order."

I am bound to say that I think that that sentence is subject to the criticism that it appears to be an attempt by a government department to dictate to a court how it should decide the question of the amount of a maintenance order, and I deprecate any such attempt. Obviously, a slight modification of the words would meet that difficulty. It is a difficulty which confronts judges every day of the week in addressing juries on matters which are peculiarly within the province of the jury and not of the judge, and I do not think that it is necessary for us to substitute any particular formula for that which has here been adopted. But, as it happens, if it is to this particular paragraph, as it obviously is, that the learned chairman is referring in the statement of the reasons, the decision is not in accordance with the advice, because the advice that the court should take the figure so arrived at as a general guide to the minimum amount for the maintenance order is qualified by the statement that this is "in the absence of private income of either the husband or the wife", and it is clear that the wife in the present case has a gross income of £6 10s. a week. Be it said at once that that sum has never been analysed so as to show what spending money she really has out of it, or anything of that sort, but that she has a private income by her own exertions of £6 10s. a week was common ground.

I should like to make another observation on this circular. Paragraph 11 reads:

"Where either the husband or the wife has other sources of income these should be taken into account in fixing the amount to be paid under a maintenance order. There will, no doubt, be cases in which a wife is in employment and may be earning a considerable wage. In any case of this kind, however, allowance should be made for the value of the issues in kind received by the soldier in order to maintain the proper balance between the respective incomes of the parties. Regard should also be had to any allowance received by the wife under the provisions of the Family Allowances Act, 1945."

As a direction that all sources of income should be taken into account in making the assessment, I have nothing to say by way of criticism of that, but if it is intended to convey, as might be thought from a literal reading of the paragraph, that it is only in cases where the wife has a separate income, either by her own earnings or otherwise, that the advantages to the husband of what are called the "issues in kind" should be taken into account, I should differ, because in any event, in my opinion, the fact that in addition to his pay the husband receives his food, his clothing (or some of his clothing, at any rate), and his quarters free, is a matter to be taken into account, if for no other reason because, putting it generally, it leaves his pay more or less without deduction for his own spending purposes. I am not intending that to be taken literally, because one knows that there are certain necessary expenses—for extra messing, games, and the like—which, no doubt, also ought to be taken into account in assessing his receipt of pay in cash, and other benefits in kind. These calculations should always be made in assessing the husband's means, and not only in cases of which it can be said that they are necessary to counter-balance some private income of the wife's.

It seems to me that there is only one conclusion to which this court can come, viz., that the justices have erred by purporting to follow the advice given in a circular, which is not in itself wholly accurate, and having, in fact, misunderstood or misapplied that advice. That, as I have already indicated, plainly involves the result that they have misdirected themselves, and, therefore, although this court does not interfere with mere questions of amount, it seems to me that this is clearly a case in which there is an error in principle, and the matter must be sent back for further consideration.

OAKLAND METAL CO., LTD. v. D. BENAIM & CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), July 2, 1953.]

Award—Validity—Arbitrator not qualified to act—Put forward by party seeking to have award declared invalid—Estoppel.

By a contract dated Dec. 6, 1951, buyers agreed to buy from sellers a quantity of zinc ingots. One of the clauses in the contract provided that any dispute under the contract should be settled by arbitration in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Metal Exchange or the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants. In January, 1952, the goods were delivered, but the buyers refused to accept them on the ground that they were not in accordance with the contract specification. The sellers claimed arbitration and eventually arbitrators were appointed, the sellers' arbitrator being qualified to act under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants and the buyers' arbitrator under the rules of the London Metal Exchange. The arbitration was conducted under the rules of the National Association, and an award was made in favour of the sellers. In an action by the buyers for a declaration that the award was a nullity,

HELD: the buyers had acted throughout as if their arbitrator was qualified to act under the rules of the National Association, and, therefore, it was not open to them to contend after the award had been made that he had not the necessary qualifications, and the award was valid.

Dicta of PICKFORD, J., in Jungheim, Hopkins & Co. v. Foukelmann ([1909] 2 K.B. 957), applied.

AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATORS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, p. 644, para. 1093; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 2, pp. 399-401, Nos. 578-586.

Case referred to:

ACTION for a declaration that an arbitrators' award be declared a nullity.

By a contract dated Dec. 6, 1951, the plaintiffs, the Oakland Metal Co., Ltd., metal alloy manufacturers and refiners, agreed to buy, and the defendants, D. Benaim & Co., a firm in Gibraltar, agreed to sell, twenty thousand kilos of zinc ingots of a specification demanding ninety-eight per cent. or more to be zinc, at the price of £280 per metric ton c.i.f. Rotterdam. Eighty per cent. of the value of the goods was to be paid on presentation of documents in London, and the balance was to be paid after verification of weight and quality at destination. There was an arbitration clause providing that any dispute arising under the contract was to be settled in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Metal Exchange or the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants. In January, 1952, the sellers shipped 1,518 zinc ingots to Rotterdam and eighty per cent. of their value was paid by the buyers. On arrival at Rotterdam samples were taken and assayed and the buyers refused to accept the goods on the ground that they did not correspond with the contract specification, in particular, because the amount of zinc in the ingots was less than it should have been. A further analysis, made at the sellers' request, confirmed the previous one. On June 10, 1952, the sellers wrote suggesting that the whole question be submitted to arbitration, but the buyers refused

A to agree to this, claiming the return of the money they had paid to the sellers. On Sept. 4, 1952, the sellers demanded payment of a balance on general account, including the outstanding twenty per cent. of the price of the ingots shipped to Rotterdam. On Nov. 13, 1952, unknown to the buyers, the sellers wrote to the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants to obtain a copy of their panel of arbitrators. On Nov. 25, 1952, the sellers wrote to the buyers informing them that the partnership of D. Benaim & Co. had been taken over by a company, D. Benaim & Co., Ltd., to which the buyers replied, on Dec. 10, 1952, that they noted the establishment of the company. Thereafter, the buyers wrote to, and dealt with, the company. On Nov. 26, 1952, the buyers said they would agree to go to arbitration according to the rules of the London Metal Exchange. On Dec. 19, 1952, the sellers wrote to the buyers that they had appointed an arbitrator under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants, and on Dec. 24, 1952, the buyers replied that they had also appointed an arbitrator. In fact, their arbitrator was only qualified to act under the rules of the London Metal Exchange and not under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants. The parties made written submissions to the arbitrators, who, on Feb. 16, 1953, made an award under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants in favour of the sellers.

C The buyers now sought a declaration that the arbitrators' award was a nullity on the grounds (i) that they had not agreed to arbitration under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants, and that, therefore, the award was not binding on them, (ii) that they had not agreed to arbitrate with the company, but with the partnership, (iii) that, as their arbitrator was not qualified to act under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants, the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to make an award, and, therefore, the award was a nullity, and (iv) that the award made was out of time.

D J. F. Donaldson for the buyers.

E Widgery for the sellers.

F PARKER, J., stated the facts, found (i) that the sellers were entitled to think that there was an agreement to arbitrate under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants, and (ii) that, by their conduct, the buyers had caused a novation of the original contract between themselves and the partnership, and continued: The third point is, to my mind, the most interesting one. Mr. Brenner [the buyers' arbitrator] was not qualified to act under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants, though he was qualified to act under the rules of the London Metal Exchange, and the buyers seek to say that, as he, in fact, was not qualified, he and his co-arbitrator, Mr. Lazarus (who was qualified), had no jurisdiction to make this award and, accordingly, that it is a nullity. This is a matter, G of course, which goes to jurisdiction and one which the courts will look at very closely, but, if a man puts forward an arbitrator, in effect telling the other side: "Here is a man whom we appoint who is qualified to act on our behalf" and the matter proceeds to award, I do not see why, as a matter of principle, that person is not estopped from setting up the non-qualification of his arbitrator.

H The matter is, apparently, devoid of authority except for dicta in Jungheim, Hopkins & Co. v. Foukelmann (1), where both the arbitrators concerned had not got the necessary qualifications. They should have been principals engaged in the corn trade in one capacity or another and also members of the London Corn Exchange, the Baltic, or the London Corn Trade Association, and they failed in those qualifications. The plaintiffs succeeded before PICKFORD, J., in claiming a declaration that the award was null and void because there was no jurisdiction, and they did that despite the fact that the defendants claimed that they were entitled to succeed on the basis of estoppel. PICKFORD, J., with regard to this point, said this ([1909] 2 K.B. 957):

"Inasmuch as the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the want of qualification of the arbitrators there has been no waiver here."

That is dealing with waiver. Then he goes on to estoppel (ibid.):

"With regard to estoppel, it is said that by going on with the arbitration the plaintiffs represented that the qualification of the arbitrators was in order, and that their appointment was valid and the proceedings regular, and that they thereby induced the defendant to go on with the arbitration and to incur expense. I think that, so far as their own appointed arbitrator is concerned, that may well be so. If they choose, without proper inquiry, to appoint a person as arbitrator who has not the proper qualification, thereby putting him forward as properly qualified, and attend the proceedings before him, and thus induce the other party to go on, most probably they cannot afterwards be heard to say that the arbitration is invalid as being before an unqualified arbitrator. But I do not see how that reasoning can apply to the qualification of the arbitrator appointed by the other party."

It is true that those remarks were quite unnecessary for the decision in that case, but I have no hesitation in adopting them in the present matter, for I entirely agree with PICKFORD, J.'s reasoning. The buyers put forward Mr. Brenner's name in circumstances in which any reasonable person would accept him as an arbitrator put forward as qualified to act under the rules of the National Association of Non-ferrous Scrap Metal Merchants, and thereafter, by proceeding with the arbitration and putting forward their case, they represented, and continued to represent, that Mr. Brenner was so qualified. In those circumstances, I do not think that they can thereafter be heard to say that he did not have the necessary qualifications.

[HIS LORDSHIP extended the time for making the award by one month, under the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 13 (2), and concluded:] In these circumstances, it seems to me that this claim fails and there must be judgment for the sellers.

Judgment for the sellers.

R. v. NAILSWORTH LICENSING JUSTICES. Ex parte BIRD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 15, 1953.]

Licensing—Justices—Bias—Application for off-licence—Petition in favour of licence signed by justice—Objection taken after decision announced.

At the hearing before a licensing committee of an application for an off-licence, a petition in favour of the licence, signed by members of the local community, was tendered in support of the application. Objection as to its admissibility was made by those opposing the application through the secretary of the licensed victuallers' association, but the justices overruled the objection. The petition was not read out in court, nor was it handed to the justices for their inspection. While the justices were in retirement, considering their decision, it was observed that one of them had previously signed the petition. The justices returned into court and announced that the licence was granted. Objection was then made that a justice who had signed the petition had adjudicated on the matter which was the subject of the petition, but the justices declined to alter their decision. On a motion for an order of certiorari to quash the justices' order on the ground of bias and that in the circumstances justice was not seen to have been done,

HELD: (i) although it was undesirable that a justice who had signed a petition should sit and adjudicate on the subject-matter of the petition, to justify the setting aside of a decision of justices there must be something in the nature of real bias; merely that a justice might be thought to have formed some opinion on a licensing matter beforehand was not a ground on which the decision of the committee could be upset; and, therefore, the order for certiorari would not go.

A (ii) the objection could, and should, have been made before the decision of the justices had been announced, and on that ground also the court, in its discretion, would refuse the application.

(2) R. v. Caernarvon Licensing JJ. Ex p. Benson, (1948), 113 J.P. 23; 93 Sol. Jo. 119; 2nd Digest Supp.

C MOTION for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the licensing committee of the Nailsworth division of Gloucestershire granting to one Francis Adlington Stokes, a director of Joseph Burton & Sons, Ltd., a beer off-licence in respect of Price's Stores at Nailsworth. The application was opposed by the applicant for certiorari, Harold Bird, a licensee and the secretary of the Stroud and District Licensed Victuallers' Association and Protection D Society.

The committee was composed of three justices, including one Alice Waine. At the hearing of the application a petition in favour of the licence was produced by the manager of Price's Stores, and the solicitor for the applicant objected that it was not admissible in evidence. The objection was overruled, but the petition was not read out to the court nor handed up to the justices for their E inspection. After the justices had retired to consider their decision it was observed that Alice Waine had signed the petition in favour of the licence. The justices returned and announced that the licence was granted. The solicitor for the applicant thereupon objected that Alice Waine had both signed the petition and sat as a member of the committee. The two other justices then retired and on their return stated that the committee's decision had been given F and could not be changed.

On Apr. 14, 1953, the applicant gave notice of the present motion for an order of certiorari to quash the grant of the licence on the ground that an adjudicating member of the licensing committee was biased in that she had signed the petition which had been put in as evidence, so that justice was not seen to be done. The said Alice Waine stated in her affidavit that on the day before the proceedings before the licensing committee she was requested to take the place on the bench of other justices who were unable to attend the court next day; that she was not informed that any licensing application was due to be heard and she was not given details of the court's list for that day; that, until the objection was made, she did not remember that she had signed the petition which she had signed some weeks before the date of the hearing when she was shopping in Price's H Stores; that she had not told the other two justices that she had signed it; that she had never, at any time, any interest in granting or refusing the application, but she knew that Price's Stores bore a good reputation and was convinced that the licence applied for would be desirable for the benefit of the neighbourhood, and that the applicant for the licence had made out a need for such a licence which would enable beer to be delivered to persons living in country districts in their own homes, whereas otherwise it might be impossible or inconvenient for them to visit licensed premises for the purpose of buying beer.

Gage for the justices.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: It is, of course, undesirable that a justice should sit and adjudicate on a matter in favour of which he has previously signed a petition. No one, however, suggests that Mrs. Waine was conscious about this matter when she came to the court, and I am not attaching any blame to her. She was asked in an emergency to sit on the committee, but it is said that justice was not seen to be done because the parties found out, while the justices were out of court in their own room, that she had signed this petition. It is obvious from the affidavit of the acting clerk to the justices, who did not happen to be the regular clerk of the court, that, while the justices had retired, a member of the licensed victuallers' association, which was opposing this application, called their solicitor's attention to the fact that the name of Mrs. Waine was on the petition and that she had been sitting. The solicitor did not make any objection then. The justices were out of the court, and, if he had wanted to make an objection, I am satisfied from the clerk's affidavit that he could have said: "We are going to object to Mrs. Waine. We find she signed this petition". He did not make an objection either then or when the justices came back and before they announced their decision. I think it is clear that he let the matter go on, saying to himself: "Here we have an opportunity of getting this order quashed if they find in favour of the application, and, of course, if they do not find in favour of the application, well and good". I think that would be a complete answer to the present application, for certiorari is a discretionary remedy where the justices have acted within their jurisdiction.

But the more important point is whether or not we are bound to quash this order on the ground of bias simply because Mrs. Waine had signed this petition. I do not in the least want to depart from what my predecessors have said on the subject because it is most important that justice should be seen to be done. Objection cannot be taken to everything which might raise a suspicion in somebody's mind—as DAY, J., said in R. v. Taylor, etc., JJ. & Laidler. Ex p. Vogwill (1) (14 T.L.R. 185): "anything at any time which could make fools suspect". It is not something which raises doubt in somebody's mind that is enough to cause an order or a judgment of justices to be set aside. There must be something in the nature of real bias. The fact that a person has a proprietary or a pecuniary interest in the subject-matter before the court which he does not disclose, has always been held to be enough to upset the decision of the court, but merely that a justice may be thought to have formed some opinion beforehand is not, in my opinion, enough to do so. Licensing matters are left by Parliament to justices for the very best of reasons—that justices have local knowledge—and it is impossible to suppose that any justice who sits on a licensing committee knowing that there is an application for a licence or opposition to the renewal of a licence has not got his own view as to the grant or refusal of the licence. The anomaly has often been pointed out that whereas a person interested in a brewery may not sit as a licensing justice, a person who is a very active teetotaler may do so, but it cannot be said, if an application is refused, that the justice necessarily acted improperly because he happened to be a total abstainer. In all these cases it must be a question of degree.

Our attention has been called to R. v. Caernarvon Licensing JJ. Ex p. Benson (2), in which the court, consisting of myself and HILBERY and BIRKETT, JJ., granted an order of certiorari to set aside a refusal of justices. In that case one of the justices was a deacon of a chapel which had called a meeting for the express purpose of considering whether the licence should be opposed, and although the justice did not actually vote at the meeting, he took part in it. In that case we thought that a justice who had practically made himself a party to the body which was going to oppose the licence should not sit on the bench. In the present case, on the other hand, a justice at some time—it is not clear when—when entering a grocer's shop signed a petition which indicated that she thought an off-licence would be justified. We do not think that in those circumstances we ought to say that she was so biased that she was unfit to sit on the bench. She was perfectly entitled to tell anybody: "I think Mr. Jones might very well have a licence", or "I think it would be a convenience to the neighbourhood if there was a licence here".

Having carefully considered the affidavits, we refuse the order on two grounds—(i) because we do not think it was established that there was any real bias on the part of this justice or that there was anything done which would make it appear improper, and not merely undesirable, for her to sit (and we have no reason to suppose that she would have signed this petition if she had known she was going to sit); (ii) because we think there was ample opportunity for any objection to have been made before the decision was given. For those reasons, we refuse the application.

Re LORD BROUGHAM AND VAUX'S SETTLED ESTATES.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 2, 13, 1953.]

Settled Land—Repairs—Expenditure by tenant for life—Recoupment out of capital money—"Landlord"—Tenant for life bankrupt—Settled Land Act, 1925 (c. 18), s. 73 (1) (iv) (as amended by Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 96 (1))—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 81 (1), sched. III, para. 23.

In 1932, by a deed of family arrangement, the tenant for life under a real settlement assigned his equitable life interest to the trustees of the settlement to be held on specified trusts. In 1948 the tenant for life directed the execution on agricultural land, which was subject to the settlement, and which had been leased to tenants, of certain works including (a) "improvements to Dutch barn, sheeting west end, erecting extra stanchions, repairs to gutters and drain-pipes, painting, etc.," and (b) "improvements of a general nature repairs to doors and gates, guttering and downpipes, painting all existing farm buildings, etc." In 1950 the tenant for life was adjudicated bankrupt. On an application by the tenant for life for an order that the trustees should meet the cost of the works out of capital moneys,

HELD: notwithstanding that he was not at the material time entitled to receive the rents and profits of the property, the tenant for life was a "landlord" within the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1) (iv), as a person having the statutory powers; the words "other than repairs which the tenant is under an obligation to carry out" in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, sched. III, para. 23, were not imported into the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1), as being part of the description of the improvements mentioned in s. 81 (1) of the Act of 1948, and, accordingly, the repairs mentioned in para. 23 were incorporated into s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Act of 1925 without qualification; and, therefore, although the tenant of the relevant land was responsible for repairs, the works were properly authorised by the tenant for life as improvements within s. 73 (1) of the Act of 1925 and the cost should be met out of capital moneys.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS asking that the respondents, the present trustees of the settlement, be directed (by virtue of the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 84 to s. 87, the Agriculture Act, 1947, and the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 81 (1)) to apply £3,273 17s. 7d. out of capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Act, 1925, and subject to the settlement in payment for certain works and improvements executed on the lands subject to the settlement between June and December, 1948, on the directions of the applicant, the Right Honourable Victor Henry Peter Baron Brougham and Vaux, as tenant for life or person having the powers of tenant for life.

By a settlement dated Apr. 16, 1931, made in contemplation of marriage (which was shortly thereafter solemnised) between the settlor, of the first part, his intended spouse, of the second part, and the original trustees, of the third part, estates in Westmorland, Cumberland and Somerset, to which the settlor was absolutely and beneficially entitled, were settled, subject to certain rent-charges, in trust for the settlor for life without impeachment of waste, with remainders over, and the original trustees were appointed to be trustees of the settlement for all the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

By cl. 19 (1) of the settlement it was (inter alia) provided that capital money might be applied, subject (except as thereafter mentioned) to the regulations of the Settled Land Acts as to the application of capital money, (a) in payment either directly or by way of reimbursement to the tenant for life or his executors for the making or execution on or in connection with and for the benefit of the settled land of any of the following works or any works for any of the following purposes and any operations incident to or necessary or proper in the execution of any of those works, or necessary or proper for carrying into effect any of those purposes, or for securing the full benefit of those works or purposes, as well as for improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts in like manner as if such works and operations were included in Part I of sched. III to the Act of 1925 that was to say: (i) The erection reconstruction enlargement or improvement of any stables coach-houses garages or other out-buildings used or to be used in connection with or for the purpose of any principal mansion house. (ii) The execution of structural or architectural improvements to any principal mansion house. (iii) Any new or additional or improved provision in any principal mansion house and the stables and out-buildings belonging thereto for hunting or in that or any other house or buildings for lighting draining or supplying water to the same. (iv) Any other works which a competent engineer or able practical surveyor nominated by the trustees should certify to be of permanent value and such as might reasonably be paid for out of capital and not out of income; (b) in payment to the tenant for life of any sum in respect of which he would, under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 20, be entitled to obtain from the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries or charge on any part of the settled land without the necessity of his first obtaining such a charge. By cl. 19 (2) it was provided that the trustees might, in any case in which they should in their absolute discretion think fit, dispense with any certificate as mentioned in s. 84 (2) (i) of the Act of 1925.

By a deed of family arrangement dated Mar. 22, 1932, the settlor conveyed and assigned to the trustees of the said settlement (inter alia) his equitable life estate in the settled lands and in the capital moneys subject to the settlement on the trusts therein declared concerning the same. By a subsidiary vesting deed dated Mar. 3, 1948, certain freehold property, known as Allington Grange and Battens Farm at Allington in Wiltshire, was conveyed to the tenant for life to be held on the same trusts as were declared in the settlement.

By an agreement dated June 2, 1948, Allington Grange and Battens Farm, Chippenham, were leased to Grazing Estates, Ltd., for one year certain commencing Mar. 1, 1948, and thereafter from year to year, the tenant for life being described in the lease as "the surety" and the landlords being the trustees of the subsidiary vesting deed.

Between June and December, 1948, considerable improvements, alterations, and other works to Allington Grange and Battens Farm were carried out by Wiltshire Farmers, Ltd., on the instructions of the tenant for life. The respondents, the trustees, declined to meet the costs, in particular of (a) improvements to Dutch barn, sheeting west end, erecting extra stanchions, repairs to gutters and drainpipes, painting, etc., and (b) improvements of a general nature, repairs to doors and gates, guttering and downpipes, painting all existing farm buildings, etc. In August, 1950, the tenant for life was adjudicated bankrupt.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The applicant in this summons is Lord Brougham and Vaux who is the tenant for life, or a person having the powers of a tenant for life, under the Settled Land Act, 1925, of certain settled lands in the county of Wilts. He asks that sums amounting in the aggregate to £3,273 17s. 7d. may be raised out of capital moneys of the settlement in payment for or reimbursement in respect of certain works and improvements carried out on the settled land between June and December, 1948. The respondents to the summons are the trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the said Act.

No serious question seems to arise as to the greater part of the said sum, which relates to matters which are improvements under the said Act, but there are two headings of expenditure as to which doubts are said to exist. They are (a) £231 0s. 11d. for "Improvements to Dutch barn, sheeting west end, erecting extra stanchions, repairs to gutters and drain-pipes, painting, etc.", and (b) £239 16s. 1d. for "Improvements of a general nature, repairs to doors and gates, guttering and downpipes, painting all existing farm buildings, etc." Some of the items thus briefly specified may well be improvements in the fullest sense, but it is equally clear that others are mere repairs. To distinguish between "improvements" and "repairs" in this case would appear to involve a difficult and expensive inquiry, but, in my judgment, these two sums of money may properly be allowed under the authority, so far as they are only for repairs, of Re Duke of Northumberland (1), as to which case I desire to say in the first place that I am glad that HARMAN, J., in Re Sutherland Settlement Trusts (2), has pointed out an error for which I was there responsible.

Several points were taken by the respondents at the hearing, and it was suggested that the present applicant did not satisfy the description of "landlord" (as construed by me in the Northumberland case (1)) because he was not at the material time entitled to receive the rents and profits of the property. In my judgment, however, he is within the definition as a person having the statutory powers. It was also urged that the words "other than repairs which the tenant is under an obligation to carry out" in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, sched. III, para. 23, was part of the description of the improvement mentioned in s. 81 (1) of the same Act, and that, as here there was a tenant responsible for repairs, the paragraph was not available to the applicant. I do not think that this is the right view. The words in question appear to me (like the headings of the two parts of the same sched. III) not to be imported into the Settled Land Act, 1925, with the result that improvements which can be paid for out of capital moneys include "repairs to fixed equipment reasonably required for the proper farming of the [land]" without qualification. It is difficult to suppose that the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1) (iv), was not intended to import into the Act the additional improvements, having regard to their nature as improvements, and disregarding every reference in any Agricultural Holdings Act to the particular relationship between agricultural landlord and agricultural tenant. Of course, the two kinds of Act, having different subject-matters, are difficult to fit together, but the form of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 81 (1), seems to me fully to justify my treating the question broadly.

I will allow the application as regards the whole amount in question. The capital moneys must also provide the costs of the application on both sides, and such costs must be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Order accordingly.

WOODS v. W. H. RHODES AND SON, LTD. AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), July 3, 10, 1953.]

Dock—Safety provisions—Working place and approach—Maintenance—Injury to workman through article placed on floor—Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 279), reg. 1.

Court of Appeal—Indemnity—Judgment against two defendants—Order against one defendant to indemnify other defendant—Successful appeal by first defendant against judgment only—Order for indemnity nullified.

The deceased, a dock labourer, was employed by a firm of stevedores to move goods from a dock shed to the quayside. The docks were under the general management and control of the defendant board for the purposes of the Docks Regulations, 1934, Part I. Between the shed and the quayside was a sliding door which opened by being pushed along the outer wall of the shed. On Dec. 18, 1948, men employed by another firm of stevedores reared a large wooden platform in the shed against the wall with the sliding door, and on Dec. 29, 1948, when the deceased attempted to open the door the platform fell on him and he was fatally injured. The widow of the deceased claimed damages against his employers and the defendant board in respect of his death, the claim against the board being based on a breach of their statutory duty under reg. 1 of the regulations of 1934. Judgment was entered against both defendants and, inter alia, the board were ordered to indemnify the employers against fifty per cent. of their liability thereunder. The board appealed, but their notice of appeal merely asked that the judgment against them should be set aside and it made no reference to the order of indemnity.

HELD: (i) the obligation, imposed by reg. 1 of the regulations of 1934, to maintain the approaches and working places in a dock with due regard to the safety of the persons employed was directed to the structure of the approaches and working places, or, if there was no structure, to their surface and condition apart from chattels which might be placed on them from time to time; the use of the word "maintained", in relation to the working place, was confined, in its application, to the actual working place and did not extend to any article which might be brought on the floor of the working place and left there for a few moments or a longer space of time; and, therefore, the board were not in breach of the regulation.

A Latimer v. A.E.C., Ltd. (ante, p. 449), applied.

(ii) as the judgment against the board in favour of the plaintiff was set aside, the board were under no liability to the plaintiff, the foundation of the order of indemnity went, and that order became a nullity, and, therefore, the notice of appeal was sufficient notwithstanding that it contained no reference to the order of indemnity.

B Court of Appeal—Ground of appeal—Action for negligence and breach of statutory duty—Allegation of negligence in writ, but no such allegation in statement of claim or at hearing—Judgment based on breach of statutory duty—Right to raise issue of negligence on appeal.

The widow of a dock labourer, who was fatally injured in an accident at the dock, brought an action for damages against his employers for negligence and against the dock board for breach of statutory duty.

C Although the writ contained an allegation of negligence against the board, in the statement of claim the allegation against the board was confined to breach of statutory duty. The employers by their pleadings made no allegation against the board, and at the hearing of the action the plaintiff made no allegation of negligence against the board. The plaintiff obtained judgment against both defendants. The judgment against the board dealt with breach of statutory duty only. On an appeal by the board to the Court of Appeal, the employers contended that the board were liable at common law as well as for breach of statutory duty.

D E HELD: the appeal must be confined to the question which was pleaded in the statement of claim and dealt with at the trial and which the judge decided, viz., the liability of the board for breach of statutory duty.

G APPEAL by the fifth defendants, Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (referred to hereinafter as "the board") from an order of PEARSON, J., made at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, and dated June 12, 1952. The plaintiff, who was the widow and administratrix of Thomas Woods, a dock labourer, claimed damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of the death of her husband.

The deceased was employed by the first defendants, W. H. Rhodes and Son, Ltd., a firm of stevedores (referred to hereinafter as "the employers"), at No. 3 berth, Victoria Wharf, Birkenhead, his job being to handle and move goods from the shed to the quayside for them to be loaded in ships. Between the shed and the quayside was a sliding door which opened by being pushed along the outer wall of the shed. To begin their work the men on the night shift had to open the door as it was closed when the day shift ended. On Dec. 18, 1948, the fourth defendants, Thomas Swift and Co., Ltd., another firm of stevedores (referred to hereinafter as "the stevedores"), brought their gear into No. 3 berth for stowage. The gear included a large wooden platform, called a "save-all", which was eighteen feet six inches long and nine feet ten inches wide. The stevedores reared the "save-all" in a corner of the shed, against the wall with the sliding door. On Dec. 29, 1948, the deceased came on duty on the night shift, and, as he and two other men were attempting to open the sliding door, the "save-all" fell on him and he suffered severe injuries from which he died.

On June 24, 1949, the plaintiff commenced an action against the first defendants (the employers), the second defendants, T. and J. Brocklebank, Ltd., shipowners, and the third defendants, T. and J. Harrison, the managers of a ship, who were alleged to be the occupiers of the shed at the time of the accident. By an order, dated Dec. 21, 1949, the plaintiff obtained leave to add the stevedores as fourth defendants and the board as fifth defendants. On Apr. 9, 1951, the action against the shipowners and against the stevedores was discontinued.

By her statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the board were at all material times the persons having the general management and control of the dock for the purposes of Part I of the Docks Regulations, 1934, and that they were in breach of their statutory duty under reg. 1 of the regulations. Her claims against the defendants other than the board were based on negligence at common law. PEARSON, J., found that the "save-all" was left in a dangerous position and that the risk of it causing injury should have been appreciated by anyone looking at it with the safety of the men in mind. He gave judgment for the plaintiff against the employers and the board, and for the third defendants against the plaintiff. He assessed the damages at £2,808, ordered the employers to indemnify the board, and the board to indemnify the employers, against fifty per cent. of the liability, and, inter alia, gave liberty to the employers to sign judgment against the board for fifty per cent. of the amount of the judgment debt and costs in the event of their paying those sums to the plaintiff.

The employers and the board appealed from the judgment of PEARSON, J. By their notice of appeal the board asked that the judgment against them should be set aside and that judgment should be entered for them with costs, but they did not refer to the order for indemnity. On May 13, 1953, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal by the employers. The board's appeal was allowed to stand over until the decision of the House of Lords in Latimer v. A.E.C., Ltd. (1) was known.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 10. LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I will ask BIRKETT, L.J., to read the first judgment.

BIRKETT, L.J., read a judgment in which, after stating the facts, he said: The learned judge found that the board were in breach of their statutory duty as the persons having the general management and control of the dock, wharf, or quay where the deceased met with his death, and it is against that finding that the present appeal is brought. It is important to observe that the plaintiff in her statement of claim makes no allegation against the board that they were liable at common law, although in the writ she did so. The allegations were confined to the breach of statutory duty, and the judgment of the learned judge dealt with breach of statutory duty only. Counsel for the employers made no allegations against the board in the pleadings, but, when invited by the court to make any submissions on the case which counsel for the board had presented, he submitted that the board were liable at common law as well as on the ground found by the learned judge. In all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the appeal must be confined to the question which was pleaded and which the judge decided, viz., the breach of statutory duty, and I express no opinion on the question of the board's liability, if any, at common law.

Paragraph 10 and para. 11 of the statement of claim were as follows:

A "10. At all material times [the board] were the persons having the general management and control of the said dock wharf or quay (including the said dock shed erected thereon) for the purposes of Part I of the Docks Regulations, 1934. 11. The vicinity of the said door was a working place on shore where the process referred to in para. 2 was carried on and/or the said door was a regular approach over the said quay which persons employed (including the deceased) in the said processes had to use for going to or from a working place and [the board] were in breach of their statutory duty under reg. 1 of the said regulations. Particulars. The said working place or approach was not maintained with due or any regard to the safety of the deceased in that the said save-all was too close to the said door and/or was unlashed and/or was leaning insecurely and/or was too close against the said wall and/or was liable to fall upon him."

B Paragraph 6 of the board's defence was:

C "These defendants admit para. 10 of the statement of claim but deny that they were in breach of statutory duty as alleged or at all. Each of the allegations of breach of statutory duty contained in the statement of claim is denied as fully as if the same were hereinafter set out seriatim and separately traversed."

D In the Docks Regulations, 1934, the following paragraphs appear under the heading "Duties":

E "(a) It shall be the duty of the person having the general management and control of a dock, wharf, or quay, to comply with Part I of these regulations; provided that if any other person has the exclusive right to occupation of any part of the dock, wharf, or quay, and has the general management and control of such part, the duty in respect of that part shall devolve upon that other person . . . (d) It shall be the duty of every person who by himself, his agents, or workmen carries on the processes, and of all agents, workmen, and persons employed by him in the processes, to comply with Part IV of these regulations."

F By reg. 1, which is in Part I of the regulations:

"Every regular approach over a dock, wharf or quay which persons employed have to use for going to or from a working place at which the processes are carried on and every such working place on shore shall be maintained with due regard to the safety of the persons employed."

G The all-important words, therefore, so far as this appeal is concerned, are:

" . . . every such working place on shore shall be maintained with due regard to the safety of the persons employed."

H It was conceded that the board had the general management and control of the dock, and that the place where the fatal accident took place was a "working place on shore", but the board submitted that they had maintained the working place with due regard to the safety of the persons employed.

In Latimer v. A.E.C., Ltd. (1), a recent decision of the House of Lords, the meaning to be attached to the word "maintained" in the circumstances of that case was discussed. A film of oil had been deposited by flood water on the floor of the respondents' factory. At a place where sawdust had not yet been applied to it the appellant, without realising the danger, tried to get a heavy barrel on to a trolley. He was standing on one foot and using considerable force with the other when he slipped and received severe injuries. He alleged that the respondents were guilty of a breach of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (1), which provides:

"All floors . . . shall be of sound construction and properly maintained."

The word "maintained" is defined in s. 152 (1) of the Act in these words:

" 'Maintained' means maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair."

LORD REID said (ante, p. 454):

"The appellant argues that a floor cannot be in an efficient state if people are liable to slip on it, but, again, I think one must ask whether the danger comes from the floor or from something which happens to be on it. It would be going a long way to say that a floor, perfectly good in itself, ceases to be in an efficient state whenever there is something on it which gives rise to danger. If there is any ambiguity, one is entitled to look at the consequences of adopting each of the possible interpretations. It is one thing to say that an employer is absolutely responsible for the condition of his floors, even if the unsafe condition has come about through no fault of his or his servants, and could not have been remedied before the accident, but I would expect clearer words if it were intended that he should also be held responsible if something dangerous got on his floor and made it for the time being 'inefficient' through some inevitable accident or the fault of some other person not his servant. But I do not think that there is really any ambiguity here. The requirement of the definition is not that the floor shall be in an efficient state: it is that the floor shall be maintained in an efficient state. 'Maintained' is the dominant word throughout and that throws one back to what is meant by maintaining a floor. I see little difference between maintaining a floor 'properly' as required by s. 25 (1) and maintaining it 'in an efficient state' as required by the definition. I have already said that I do not think that maintaining a floor includes keeping dangerous things away from it."

In the present case PEARSON, J., held that the board were liable because they failed to maintain the working place with due regard to the safety of the persons employed, and that their default lay in not removing the "save-all" from the place where it was standing, it being a source of potential danger to persons employed. I cannot think that the board's duty was so extensive. Their duty was to maintain the working place with due regard to the safety of the persons employed. For example, if the working place is within a building, the board must see that the floor is not liable to collapse, or that the roof is not a source of danger. The whole structure of the working place must be sound, and due regard must be had for the safety of persons employed. If the working place is not in a building, then that working place must be maintained with due regard for the safety of persons employed, and this would depend on many factors affecting the particular place. But, in my opinion, the use of the word "maintained" in reg. 1 of the regulations of 1934 does not extend to articles on the floor of the working place which may be there for a few moments or for a longer space of time. This view is confirmed to some extent and supported by the speeches in Latimer v. A.E.C., Ltd. (1). I will quote a passage from the speech of LORD PORTER (ante, p. 452):

"It has still, however, to be determined what it is which has to be in an efficient state. Does it include the elimination of some matter which is temporarily superimposed on the floor, or is the requirement confined to the floor itself? To be efficient, the appellant contended, the floor must be fit for any of the purposes for which it is intended, e.g., for support and for passing over in safety. The difficulty of such a view is that it puts an excessive obligation on the employer. Indeed, it was conceded that it could not be carried to the length of saying that a temporary obstruction, such as a piece of orange peel or the like, would make it inefficient. Once this concession is made it becomes a question of the degree of temporary inefficiency which constitutes a breach of the employer's obligation. Primarily, in my opinion, the section is aimed at some general condition of the gangway, e.g., a dangerously polished surface, or the like, or possibly some permanent fitment which makes it unsafe. But I cannot think the provision was meant to, or does, apply to a transient and exceptional condition. If it had been directed to such a state of affairs it would have been easy to say so. Indeed, in s. 34 (2) the kind of language appropriate to such an object is to be found where there is provision that 'all means of escape . . . shall be properly maintained and kept free from obstruction'."

B It is true that, in the present case, the learned judge placed a limited duty on the board when he said:

C "The obligation is far from being absolute. It is not an obligation to keep the working places safe; it is an obligation to maintain them 'with due regard to the safety of the persons employed'. The obligation has to be performed in respect of often busy and sometimes congested docks, covering in this case a very large area, where numerous people are carrying on their own business for their own purposes. The board, having the general management and control of the docks, cannot be held responsible for the details of other persons' operations, or for the temporary unsafe condition of premises when such unsafe condition is created without the knowledge of the board by casual acts of negligence by other persons. In my opinion, the board have under this regulation an obligation to keep the approaches and working places free from dangerous chattels, but only to such extent as can reasonably be expected of persons having only the general management and control of the docks."

E But, in my opinion, the construction of the word "maintained" in the regulation is confined to the actual working place itself, and does not extend to any article that may be brought on the floor of the working place. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

Counsel for the employers raised another point, viz., that the learned judge had ordered that the board

F "do indemnify the [employers] against fifty per centum of the liability of £2,808 of the [employers] under the plaintiff's judgment herein."

G The board's notice of appeal of Sept. 9, 1952, made no reference to this order, and merely asked that the judgment against them should be set aside, and that judgment should be entered for them with the costs of the action. Counsel for the employers argued that, even if the appeal of the board succeeded against the plaintiff and judgment was entered for them, nevertheless, because the notice of appeal had not asked for the order above recited to be quashed, he was entitled to hold to the indemnity. I am of opinion that this point fails. The order of the learned judge was based on his decision that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed against the employers and the board. If he had found the board free from blame, no such order could possibly have been made. When this court finds the board free from liability to the plaintiff and reverses H the learned judge's finding against them, it seems to me to follow that the order as to indemnity is no longer in force. The indemnity arose out of third-party proceedings brought by the board against the employers to which the employers were not required to plead, and in the order of June 12, 1952, the employers were ordered to indemnify the board against fifty per centum of the liability of £2,808, and the board were ordered to indemnify the employers in the like manner. In my opinion, the notice of appeal by the board was sufficient. It asked that the judgment for the plaintiff against them should be set aside and judgment entered for them. In this the board have been successful, and they are under no liability to the plaintiff whatsoever. In my opinion, this is enough to make the order in question a nullity. If it were necessary formally to discharge that part of the order I should do so, but, in my opinion, once the board are made free from all liability to the plaintiff that part of the order ceases to have any effect.

HODSON, L.J., read a judgment in which, after stating the facts, he said: The board has appealed against so much of the judgment of the learned judge as directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for £2,808 with costs against the board, and has also appealed against part of his order for costs in favour of the plaintiff. By the amended statement of claim the plaintiff's claim against the board was confined to paras. 1, 2, 3, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 thereof. Paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 deal with matters of inducement. Paragraph 6 reads:

"The sole cause of the matter complained of in para. 3 was the negligence and/or breach of statutory duty hereinafter appearing."

Paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 give particulars of the negligence of other defendants "hereinafter appearing" and make no reference to the board. [HIS LORDSHIP read para. 10, which was admitted by the board, and para. 11, and continued:] The allegation in para. 11 was denied by the board. Paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 give details of the nature of the plaintiff's claim.

I have summarised the pleadings in view of the way the hearing developed on appeal to this court. After counsel for the board and counsel for the plaintiff had presented their arguments, counsel for the employers addressed the court. His first contention was that, in view of the limited extent of the notice of appeal, that part of the learned judge's order which directed the board to indemnify the employers against fifty per cent. of the liability of £2,808 under the plaintiff's judgment and gave liberty to the employers to sign judgment against the board for fifty per cent. of the amount of the judgment debt and costs in the event of their paying the amount of the judgment debt and costs to the plaintiff must stand. He contended that, no application for leave to amend the notice of appeal having been made at any time, the board could not, as the record stood, resist this contention. I think that this contention fails since, if the judgment against the board in favour of the plaintiff is reversed, the whole foundation for the indemnity goes with it, notwithstanding that no separate notice of appeal has been given against the part of the order which gives liberty to the employers to sign judgment against the board in the event stated.

The second contention of counsel for the employers was directed to the liability of the board (a) at common law, and (b) under reg. 1 of the regulations of 1934. He pointed out that the employers had made no allegation against the board in their pleadings, but he was invited to address the court on the basis of the plaintiff's allegations against the board as contained in the statement of claim. The statement of claim contains no allegation against the board of negligence at common law. The negligence "hereinafter appearing", alleged in para. 6, is found in para. 7, para. 8, and para. 9, each of which contains express averments of negligence against defendants other than the board. Paragraph 10 and para. 11, in which allegations are made against the board, contain averments of breach of the Docks Regulations, 1934, only. Further, no allegation was made by the plaintiff at the trial to make a case of negligence at common law against the board. I think it is now too late to do so. Accordingly, I express no opinion whether or not, if such a case had been made on the pleadings and pursued at the trial, a judgment in favour of the plaintiff against the board on the ground of negligence at common law could have been sustained.

This leaves only the question of breach of regulations on which both counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the employers supported the learned judge's judgment which was attacked by counsel for the board. Regulation 1 of Part I of the regulations of 1934 provides (inter alia):

A "Every regular approach over a dock, wharf or quay which persons employed have to use for going to or from a working place at which the processes are carried on and every such working place on shore shall be maintained with due regard to the safety of the persons employed."

B The controversy has centred around the meaning of the word "maintained". No definition of "maintained" is contained in the regulations (unlike in the Factories Act, 1937) and the word "maintained" has to be construed according to its context and the subject-matter of the regulations. The judge summarises his conclusion as follows:

C "In my opinion, the board have under this regulation an obligation to keep the approaches and working places free from dangerous chattels, but only to such extent as can reasonably be expected of persons having only the general management and control of the docks."

D This is, I think, an interpretation which the language of the regulation in its setting will not bear. That which is in the contemplation of the regulation appears to me to be the structure of the regular approaches and working places in docks, or, if there is no structure, their surface and condition apart from chattels which may be placed on or in them from time to time. I find a difficulty in construing the words "with due regard to the safety of the persons employed" as limiting the duty to an obligation to keep the regular approaches and working places free from dangerous chattels, but only to such an extent as can reasonably be expected of persons having only the general management and control of the docks. The learned judge was, I think, saying in effect that the question is one of degree, and, while he would not regard a piece of orange peel or a banana skin dropped on the dock as likely to give rise to a breach of the regulation, yet this "save-all", standing, as it did, for some days in a dangerous position, was in a different category. It seems to me that the provision is not directed at all to transient and exceptional matters like the deposit of chattels on the floor of a shed, nor does its language import the concept of degree. The working place is not to be looked at in an abstract sense, as counsel for the employers submitted, but rather in a concrete sense, which does not include the contents of that place.

F I think assistance is to be gained from Latimer v. A.E.C., Ltd. (1), a recent decision of the House of Lords on a kindred topic, viz., s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and the definition of "maintained" in s. 152 (1) of that Act. LORD REID said (ante, p. 454):

G "I do not think that maintaining a floor includes keeping dangerous things away from it."

H These observations seem to me to apply directly to the regulation now under consideration. As LORD REID pointed out (ibid.), different considerations apply when the maintenance of a machine in efficient working order is in question, as in Galashiels Gas Co., Ltd. v. O'Donnell or Millar (2). Similarly, other considerations have been applied in construing the provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26, under which an occupier of a factory is required to maintain safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work: see, e.g., Callaghan v. Fred Kidd & Son (Engineers), Ltd. (3). I would, accordingly, allow the appeal of the board against the finding of the learned judge that they are in breach of reg. 1 of Part I of the Docks Regulations, 1934.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree with both judgments which have been delivered, and I do not think I can usefully add anything.

Appeal allowed.

FENWICK v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid and Lord Cohen), June 8, 9, 10, July 20, 1953.]

Special Contribution—Relief—Income received representing more than income attributable to a full year if income accrued from day to day—“A full year’s income”—Discretion of commissioners in selecting relevant year—Finance Act, 1948 (c. 49), s. 61 (1).

A taxpayer was assessed to special contribution under the Finance Act, 1948, Part V, in respect of his aggregate investment income for 1947-48. He received part of such income by virtue of his holding of stock in a limited company which made up its accounts to Dec. 31 in each year and which paid to him dividends as follows:

The taxpayer claimed relief under s. 61 (1) of the Act of 1948 on the ground that the income so received by him in 1947-48 represented more than the income which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income were to be deemed to accrue from day to day.

HELD: the words “a full year’s income” at the end of s. 61 (1) did not justify the reading into the latter part of that sub-section of any part of the wording of para. (b) thereof so as to entitle the taxpayer (by virtue of s. 61 (2)) to have the dividends treated as accruing from day to day during the period in respect of which they were payable; and, furthermore, on the true construction of s. 61 (1), the commissioners had a discretion to select a year the income in which was to be regarded as equivalent to a full year’s income, and it could not be said that in selecting the calendar year 1946 (as they had) the commissioners had exercised that discretion improperly.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of the Court of Appeal dated July 25, 1952, allowing an appeal by the Crown from an order of DONOVAN, J., dated Mar. 7, 1952, who reversed a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

A The taxpayer, being assessed to special contribution under the Finance Act, 1948, Part V, in respect (inter alia) of dividends arising from the ordinary stock of a limited company, claimed relief under s. 61 (1) of that Act, and contended that a process of day to day apportionment was contemplated as the means for arriving at the relief to be granted. The Special Commissioners rejected that contention, holding that the natural meaning of "a full year's income" at the end of s. 61 (1) was a full year's income in reality, and that, having regard to the circumstances, the most natural test was to consider the dividends in respect of the successive financial years of the company.

The House took time for consideration.

July 20. The following opinions were read.

C LORD NORMAND: My Lords, this appeal arises out of an assessment made on the appellant, under Part V of the Finance Act, 1948, to special contribution in respect of his aggregate investment income for the year 1947-48. The matter in dispute is the construction and application of the provisions for relief in s. 61 of the Act.

D The special contribution was imposed by the Finance Act, 1948, as a tax for one year only, payable by individual taxpayers whose total income for 1947-48 exceeded £2,000 and whose aggregate investment income for that year exceeded £250. The contribution was payable on or before Jan. 1, 1949. Total income was to be ascertained in the same manner as for the purposes of surtax. Investment income was defined as meaning income from any source other than a source of earned income. The contribution was assessable by the Special Commissioners to whom also an appeal lay. For the purposes of this case s. 61 is the important section and I, therefore, cite it in full:

F " (1) Where—(a) either before or after an assessment to contribution is made, but in any case before such an assessment has become final, application is made to the Special Commissioners for relief under this section, and (b) the Special Commissioners are satisfied as respects any assets that, by reason of the provisions of the Income Tax Acts which require that income which is chargeable with income tax by way of deduction shall be deemed to be income of the year in which it is receivable, the income from the assets represents more than the income which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income were deemed to have accrued from day to day, the Special Commissioners shall in ascertaining total income and aggregate investment income for the purposes of this Part of this Act make such reduction, if any, as may be appropriate to secure that there shall be taken as representing the income from the assets an amount equivalent to a full year's income therefrom. (2) Sub-section (1) of s. 36 of the Finance Act, 1927 (which specifies the period over which income is deemed to have accrued from day to day) shall apply for the purposes of para. (b) of the last foregoing sub-section as it applies for the purposes of s. 34 of the said Act of 1927 (which makes in relation to surtax the like provision as sub-s. (1) of this section)."

H The appellant at all relevant times before Dec. 11, 1947, held £12,950 ordinary stock in a colliery company. His holding was reduced in December, 1947, in consequence of a reduction of the company's capital, but no evidence was laid before the commissioners to connect this reduction in any relevant way with the problem which arises in this appeal and I shall, therefore, make no further reference to it. The company's accounts were made up to Dec. 31 in each year, and the appellant received dividends on the stock held by him, as shown conveniently in the following table:

	Date declared	Date received (and date on which payable)	Description	Period in respect of which paid	Gross amount before deduction of income tax			A
A	4.7.1946	1.8.1946	3% interim	Calendar year 1946	388	10	0
B	15.5.1947	31.5.1947	12% final	Calendar year 1946	1,554	0	0
C	24.7.1947	1.9.1947	3% interim	Calendar year 1947	388	10	0	B
D	18.3.1948	23.4.1948	7% second interim	Calendar year 1947	543	18	0
E	21.7.1948	1.9.1948	3% interim	Calendar year 1948	233	2	0

In consequence of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1927, s. 39, and of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1948, s. 48, that total income shall be ascertained as it is ascertained for the purposes of surtax, the two dividends marked B and C, which were those paid in the fiscal year ending Apr. 5, 1948, fell to be included in the appellant's total income for the fiscal year 1947 to 1948, and, accordingly, the gross amount of these dividends was included in his aggregate investment income for the purposes of the assessment to the special contribution. The appellant applied to the Special Commissioners for relief under s. 61 on the ground that the income from his stock in the company included in his aggregate investment income represented more than the income which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income were to be deemed to have accrued from day to day.

Section 61 makes reference to s. 34 and s. 36 of the Finance Act, 1927, which deal with surtax. The Finance Act, 1927, s. 34, made provision for relieving the taxpayer of the hardship of paying surtax on the fortuitously swollen income of any assets in a particular year, a hardship which might involve payment of tax both on a larger sum than is equitable and at a higher rate. It was foreseen that the same hardship might arise also in the reckoning and payment of the special contribution. Paragraph (b) of s. 61 (1) prescribes the antecedent condition for the grant of relief and it employs substantially the same terms as the Finance Act, 1927, s. 34 (a). Under both Acts the Special Commissioners have to be satisfied that

"as respects any assets that, by reason of the provisions of the Income Tax Acts which require that income which is chargeable with income tax by way of deduction shall be deemed to be income of the year in which it is receivable, the income from the assets represents more than the income which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income were deemed to have accrued from day to day."

For surtax purposes there is another condition prescribed by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 34 (b). It is that the Special Commissioners must also be satisfied that the amount of surtax payable by the applicant for the year exceeds by more than five per cent. the amount which would have been payable if the amount of his income from the assets had not exceeded the amount which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income from those assets were deemed to have accrued from day to day. The Finance Act, 1927, s. 36 (1) (which is applied by the Finance Act, 1948, s. 61 (2), for the purposes of para. (b) of s. 61 (1)), provides that income which is deemed to have accrued from day to day shall (a) if payable in respect of any stated period, be deemed to have accrued from day to day during that period. The Finance Act, 1927, s. 36 (1) (b), provides for the case where the income is not payable in respect of any stated period. In the present case, however, the dividends on the appellant's holding in the company receivable in the fiscal year 1947-48 were paid in respect of stated periods, dividend B being stated to be the final dividend in respect of the calendar year 1946, and dividend C being an interim dividend in respect of the calendar year 1947. All the other dividends are similarly assigned to a stated period.

When the application for relief first came before the Special Commissioners they held that the condition for the grant of relief as prescribed by s. 61 (1) (b) had not been fulfilled, but this decision was reversed by DANCKWERTS, J., who remitted the case to the Special Commissioners to consider what relief, if any, should be granted. The decision of DANCKWERTS, J., has been accepted by the parties in the proceedings which have followed on it. It would, nevertheless, be necessary to consider what was the exact ratio of his decision, and what was the precise construction which he put on the words in s. 61 (1) (b) which define the preliminary condition, if the construction of that part of the sub-section which deals with the amount of the relief to be granted depends on them. But that is itself the main issue in the appeal, and if, as I think, there is no such dependence, it is unnecessary to consider further the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J., or the construction of the words defining the preliminary condition. Nor would it be desirable to prejudice unnecessarily a question which may yet come to this House for decision.

In the debate, the appellant's counsel submitted for consideration several alternative constructions of the final part of s. 61 (1). All of them had one common feature; in all of them the Special Commissioners were required, in arriving at the relief to be granted, to make a calculation attributing to a period of twelve months the income received from the appellant's holding in the company on the footing that the income was deemed to have accrued from day to day. Two examples may be given. The income thus to be attributed was in one of the alternative submissions the dividends C, D, E and F in the table, that is, the whole dividends which were in fact paid (at whatever date) in respect of the calendar years 1947 and 1948, and the Special Commissioners were then to take the portion attributable to the twelve months of the fiscal year 1947-48 as the equivalent of a full year's income. According to another of the alternative submissions it was the income receivable in the fiscal year 1947-48, viz., dividends B and C, which was to be apportioned and the portion attributable to any consecutive period of twelve months out of the twenty-four months of the calendar years 1946 and 1947 was to be taken. The basis of all these submissions is that the words "a full year's income" at the end of the sub-section "echo" the words "the income which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income were deemed to have accrued from day to day", and, therefore, by virtue of s. 61 (2) and the Finance Act, 1927, s. 36 (1), entitle the applicant to have the dividends treated as accruing during the period in respect of which they were payable.

The Special Commissioners rejected the basis of the appellant's contention that a process of day to day apportionment was contemplated as the means for arriving at the relief to be granted. They said that the natural meaning of "a full year's income" in the context was a full year's income in reality and that having regard to all the circumstances the most real and natural test was to take the dividends in respect of the company's successive financial years, each of which coincides with a full calendar year. The two years to which they thought it was most natural to turn were 1946 and 1947, and they selected 1946 since the dividends received in it were equivalent to the statutory income for the fiscal year 1947-48. They, therefore, made no reduction.

DONOVAN, J., reversed the decision of the Special Commissioners. He held that they were not entitled to select some representative year for the purpose of s. 61, and that they ought to have apportioned dividends B and C or B, C, D and E in the manner described above. The Court of Appeal unanimously reversed the judgment of DONOVAN, J., and restored the decision of the Special Commissioners. Judgments were delivered by SOMERVELL and ROMER, L.JJ. DENNING, L.J., concurred with SOMERVELL, L.J. The court rejected the basic contention of the appellant that the words "a full year's income" in their natural sense required any method of apportionment, or that they were capable of bearing, the meaning "the income attributable to the financial year 1947-48 on the basis that dividends referable to these years were apportioned as accruing from day to day."

My Lords, I agree with the Court of Appeal on this point, for reasons which I will presently state. Both SOMERVELL, L.J., and ROMER, L.J., gave additional reasons for rejecting the appellant's contention. I do not propose to deal with them because the rejection of the day to day attribution of income goes to the root of the appellant's case and whatever other reasons there may be for dismissing the appeal are superfluous.

There are two points to be considered in their bearing on the main issue. First, do the words "a full year's income" "echo" the words "the income which would be attributable to a period of one full year if the income were deemed to have accrued from day to day"? In my opinion, the "echo" is a false echo and does not justify the reading into the final part of s. 61 (1) of any part of the wording from the paragraph relating to what I have called the antecedent condition. I cannot think that the legislature would have left the crucial words by which the income is deemed to have accrued from day to day to be implied from the mere fact that the words "a full year's income" recall the words "a period of one full year". There is no reason why the words "a full year's income" should bear any artificial meaning or be stretched by implication into a meaning which they seem to be incapable of supporting. If the words "deemed to have accrued from day to day" are not to be read in, then the Finance Act, 1927, s. 36, cannot help the appellant. It may be noted that these crucial words are repeated in each of the two paragraphs of s. 34 of the Finance Act, 1927, and that they are not left to implication in the second of the two paragraphs.

This brings me to the second point for consideration. If attribution by accrual from day to day is excluded, the consequence must be that, unless the Special Commissioners have some degree of discretion, there is no means of arriving at the relief to be granted. The appellant contended that the Special Commissioners had no discretion to select a year the income in respect of which was to be regarded as equivalent to a full year's income. If that contention is well founded, and if the appellant's method of arriving at the relief is to be rejected, the result might be that s. 61 is abortive. The questions whether the Special Commissioners have a discretion and how far it extends depends on the words of the section itself. We were invited to contrast them with other words in other sections or statutes in which a discretion was given to the Special Commissioners. Such comparisons have little or no value and I have not been helped by them. The Special Commissioners are, by the concluding words of s. 61 (1), directed, and to that extent the sub-section is directory, to make such reduction, if any, as may be appropriate to secure that there shall be taken as representing the income from the assets an amount equivalent to a full year's income therefrom. The whole wording seems designed, not to define what the relief must be, but to allow some latitude of judgment in deciding what it may fairly be. The words which I have italicised are specially apt if the Special Commissioners' duty is to exercise a discretionary judgment. How far it may extend it is not necessary to decide here. The year they have chosen is one of the years in respect of which the dividends received in 1947-48 were paid. They might have taken 1947, but it cannot be said that they either ignored relevant matters or took into account irrelevant matters or acted capriciously in choosing 1946. Whether they might have gone further back than 1946 in certain circumstances and have taken a year the income in respect of which had no connection with the dividends received in 1947-48, is a question which does not arise, and I express no opinion on it. My conclusion is that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

My Lords, I am asked to say that my noble and learned friends, LORD OAKSEY and LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, concur in this opinion.

DALE AND OTHERS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

D Special Contribution—"Investment income"—"Earned income"—Annuity to trustee conditional on his acting as such—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 14 (3) (a)—Finance Act, 1948 (c. 49), s. 47 (1).

The testator, by his will, under which the taxpayer was one of five trustees, directed that the taxpayer should receive an annuity of £1,000 a year free of income tax and surtax so long as he should continue to act as trustee. The duties of the trusteeship were onerous, and the taxpayer had been chosen for his special qualifications. He was assessed to the special contribution under the Finance Act, 1948, s. 47 (1), on the basis that his income as trustee was investment, and not earned, income.

E HELD: a trusteeship was an office, and, if a testator attached remuneration to it, it was an office of profit, and, therefore, the annuity paid to the taxpayer was income arising in respect of remuneration from an office of profit within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 14 (3) (a), and so it was not "investment income" within the Finance Act, 1948, s. 47 (1), and the taxpayer was not liable for special contribution in respect of it.

F Per LORD NORMAND: the definition of "earned income" in s. 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918 (made applicable to special contribution by s. 68 (2) of the Act of 1948), was self-contained, and did not require reference to the schedules in order to determine what categories of income were to be regarded as earned income under the section.

The Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., BIRKETT and ROMER, L.J.J.), held that the annuity was not remuneration from the taxpayer's office of trustee, but was derived from the bounty of the testator and was, therefore, to be regarded as investment income.

July 20. The following opinions were read.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, we have in this appeal to decide a question of importance in income tax law though it arises in relation to the special contribution imposed by Part V of the Finance Act, 1948. The question, shortly stated, is whether an annuity bequeathed by the will of the late Sir Henry Wellcome to the appellant, Sir Henry Dale, as executor and trustee under the will, is "investment income".

The testator appointed five persons, including Sir Henry Dale, to be his executors and trustees, and directed that each trustee was to receive the sum of £1,000 per annum free of tax so long as he should continue to act as trustee. He expressed a desire that, as far as possible, at all times two of his trustees should be men experienced and well qualified in medicine and allied sciences and that two should be men of wide practical business experience one or both being of high standing and ability in the practice of law and with exceptional experience and qualifications in the conduct and administration of large and important estates. The special duties of the trustees included the exercise of wide powers in relation to the control of the Wellcome Foundation, Ltd., the administration of the research fund established by the will and the application of moneys to and among the various research objects indicated by the will, and the administration of the research museum and library fund which were also established by the will. The testator left a written memorandum which set out his policy and aims for the guidance of his trustees. The trustees held frequent meetings, which were necessary for the performance of their duties, and Sir Henry Dale, who was at one time President of the Royal Society and chairman of the Scientific Advisory Committee to the War Cabinet, habitually spent about two hours a day dealing with the affairs of the trust.

Sir Henry Dale's assessment to special contribution under the provisions of Part V of the Finance Act, 1948, included, as part of his aggregate investment income, the sum of £1,446, which represented the sum (together with the appropriate additions thereto in respect of income tax and surtax) received by him in the financial year 1947-48 by virtue of the provision by which he was to be paid the sum of £1,000 per annum free of tax so long as he should continue to act as trustee. Sir Henry Dale appealed against this assessment on the ground that the sum of £1,446 was income arising in respect of remuneration from his office of profit within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (a), or, alternatively, income from property which formed part of the emoluments of his office of profit within the meaning of s. 14 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that it was, therefore, "earned income". He and the trustees also appealed against notices given to them under s. 60 (2) (a) of the Finance Act, 1948, but these are subordinate and consequential appeals, which stand or fall by the decision on the appeal against the assessment of Sir Henry Dale, whom I call hereafter the appellant. The Special Commissioners held that the source of the income was the bequest of an annuity and not an office of profit. Against this determination an appeal was taken to the High Court. There, HARMAN, J., allowed the appeal and reversed the determination. In the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls, ROMER, L.J., and BIRKETT, L.J., unanimously reversed the decision of HARMAN, J., and restored the determination of the Special Commissioners.

The special contribution imposed by the Finance Act, 1948, is payable by individuals whose total income for the year 1947-48 exceeded £2,000 and whose aggregate investment income for that year exceeded £250. "Investment income" means income from any source other than a source of earned income (s. 49 (1) of the Finance Act, 1948). Expressions in Part V of the Finance Act, 1948, are, under s. 68 (2) thereof, to have the same meanings as in the Income Tax Acts. Section 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides:

"For the purposes of this section the expression 'earned income' means—

(a) any income arising in respect of any remuneration from any office or employment of profit held by the individual, or in respect of any pension, superannuation, or other allowance, deferred pay, or compensation for loss of office, given in respect of the past services of the individual or of the husband or parent of the individual in any office or employment of profit, or given to the individual in respect of the past services of any deceased person, whether the individual or husband or parent of the individual shall have contributed to such pension, superannuation allowance, or deferred pay, or not; and (b) any income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments of any office or employment of profit held by the individual; and (c) any income which is charged under sched. B or sched. D, or the Rules Applicable to sched. D, and is immediately derived by the individual from the carrying on or exercise by him of his trade, profession, or vocation, either as an individual, or, in the case of a partnership, as a partner personally acting therein."

The question in the appeal is, in the simplest terms, whether the annual sum receivable by the appellant under the testator's will is income arising in respect of remuneration from an office of profit. It is not contended that it is income from an "employment of profit", for that contention would encounter the difficulty discussed in several of the reported cases that there is no employer. The words "of profit", I have no hesitation in saying, qualify the word "office". The first point to consider is whether trusteeship is within the ordinary sense of the word an "office", and on this I can only say that "office" is an apt word to describe a trustee's position, or any position in which services are due by the holder and in which the holder has no employer. In A.-G. v. Eyres (1) CHANNELL, J., held that a trustee is "the holder of an office" within the meaning of s. 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894. The word "office" is used both in s. 14 (3) of the Finance Act, 1948, and in s. 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, in its ordinary sense, uncontrolled by any special context, and I agree with CHANNELL, J., in thinking that it includes trusteeship. If the trustee is given an annuity under a will on condition that he continues to act as trustee, I cannot doubt that he holds an office of profit. The phrase is not a term of art and there is again no context which prevents it from being understood in its ordinary sense. To my mind, a remunerated office is an office of profit. Equally clearly the income received by the appellant because he continues to act as trustee is income arising in respect of remuneration from his office of trustee. My conclusion is that the opening words of s. 14 (3) (a) seem clearly and unambiguously to apply to the disputed income in the present case, and that was, I think, the ground on which HARMAN, J., decided the case in favour of the appellant.

What, then, is said on the other side? The learned Master of the Rolls (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED) held that a trustee could not be described as the holder of an office of profit because "the office itself involves a denial of any right to make a profit out of its performance". In other words, the receipt of a profit for the performance of the duties of a trustee is repugnant to the nature of trusteeship. My Lords, it is with regret that I feel constrained to differ from the Master of the Rolls, but I think that he has here incorrectly described the fiduciary duty of trustees. The fiduciary duty may arise, not only from trust, but also ex lege and ex conventionione. The duty was recognised by the civil law, and it is, I think, acknowledged in the jurisprudence of all civilised communities. The duty is, to use the Latin phrase, that the person subject to it must not become auctor in rem suam. It applied to tutors and curators in the civil law, and it applies to tutors and curators in the Scots law. It applies also to judicial factors appointed by the courts in Scotland, and to partners and to agents under a contract of agency, and, of course, to trustees under a settlement or under a will. That by no means exhausts the area of its operation, but for illustrative purposes the examples I have given will suffice. Some who are subject to the duty are never entitled to remuneration; some are ex lege entitled to payment for their services; some are entitled to payment ex conventionione; and some are entitled to payment if the settlor or testator so directs. The rule is the same for all: it is not that reward for services is repugnant to the fiduciary duty, but that he who has the duty shall not take any secret remuneration or any financial benefit not authorised by the law, or by his contract, or by the trust deed under which he acts, as the case may be. In England, moreover, the court has power to order payments to be made to trustees for whom the truster has made no such provision, a power which it is difficult to reconcile with a general principle that remuneration is repugnant to trusteeship.

The true rule is, indeed, stated by the Master of the Rolls himself in the judgment under consideration. He says ([1952] 2 All E.R. 93):

"... it has long been established that, in the absence of some special dispensation, the trustee can never derive any profit or advantage for himself out of his trust and should be scrupulous to prevent any conflict between his duty and his interest."

The italics are mine. The Master of the Rolls referred to certain cases (Re Pooley (2), Re Thorley (3), Re White (4)) which, as he said, decided (ibid.):

"... that remuneration made payable to a trustee by the terms of the instrument of trust is properly regarded as bounty on the part of the settlor or testator, in all material respects on the same footing as the bounty conferred on the other beneficiaries under the trust instrument and distinguished only from those others by the characteristic that acceptance of the obligation of the 'office' is the condition on which the benefit may be taken."

I think there is confusion here between the source of the payment, which is the testator's bounty as expressed in his will, and the quality of the payment as earned or not earned. There need be no incompatibility in saying that the income is the conditional gift of the testator but that it has to be earned by compliance with the testator's condition of serving as a trustee. I would observe more generally that the question whether income is earned or not is a question which arises between the trustee and the Inland Revenue, and it has no relation either to the legal duty which a trustee owes to the trust and the beneficiaries, or to the legal conception that such a payment as that under consideration derives from a testator and can be regarded as a legacy. The source of the sum and its character as a receipt in the hands of the trustee are two separate and unconnected things. In my opinion, therefore, the reasoning on which the Master of the Rolls proceeded and in which the other learned lords justices concurred does not justify us in refusing to give the ordinary meaning to the words of s. 14 (3) (a) which are now under consideration.

- My Lords, counsel for the Crown urged another view of s. 14 (3). It is not, they said, a self-contained definition, or, as they phrased it, a dictionary definition. It contains, so the argument ran, an implicit reference to the
- A schedules to the Act and their Cases and rules, and there is such identity of the language of the sub-section with the language of the schedules as to require reference to the schedules in order to determine what categories of income are by the section entitled to be regarded as earned income. For example, no income which appears on first reading of the sub-section to be income arising from remuneration in respect of an office of profit is to be treated as earned
- B income unless it falls to be taxed eo nomine (that is, as income arising from remuneration in respect of an office of profit) under one of the schedules. Now, since 1924 (Buxendale v. Murphy (5)), annual remuneration payable to a testamentary trustee qua trustee has been regarded as taxable only under Case III of sched. D, and as payable after deduction of tax in accordance with r. 19 or r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules. The rule applicable was, it was held,
- C r. 1 (a) of Case III, and the sum payable annually to the trustee was taxed under the head or description "an annual payment payable by virtue of a will". Counsel for the Crown contended that income of this kind was properly taxed under Case III and under that description, and that, in any event, the long-standing practice should not be altered to the possible detriment of beneficiaries who might, in consequence, be deprived of the benefit which they
- D at present derive from the application of r. 19. Nor did counsel for the appellant press us to hold that it was wrong to tax this income under Case III. In my judgment, this argument breaks down in limine. First, the charging section (s. 47 (1)) imposes the special contribution only on investment income and there is no charge on any income which is not investment income. It then becomes necessary to define "investment income". That was achieved by
- E s. 49 (1) of the Finance Act, 1948, and by s. 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. By s. 49 (1) "investment income" means income from any source other than a source of earned income. There is no reference here to the schedules. Section 14 (3) defines "earned income". It is a definition which, by para. (a), enlarges rather than narrows the meaning which "earned income" might normally bear, for it includes as earned income payments made to the husband or parent in respect of the past services of a deceased wife or son. The
- F conception "investment income" cuts across the schedules to the Act, and, accordingly, para. (a) does not treat the schedules or Cases as divisible into those which tax earned income and those which tax investment income. The natural inference from reading the sub-section as a whole is that you may find in any one of the schedules or Cases income from a source of earned income.
- G It is significant that para. (c) expressly refers to scheds. B and D, and to certain income taxed under these schedules. It appears, therefore, that the schedules are referred to when reference to them is necessary or appropriate, and that reference to them is omitted when it is not necessary or appropriate. Then it is to be noted that the language of s. 14 (3) (a) does not, in fact, correspond with the language of the schedules. For example, the phrase "emolument
- H of any office or employment of profit" is not schedule language, and the only mention of "office" in the schedules is to be found in sched. E, where there is a limitation, absent in s. 14 (3) (a), to "public offices". I, therefore, reject the contention that s. 14 (3) is not a self-contained definition of "earned income".

My Lords, many cases were cited on this part of the argument. They dealt with the question which schedule, Case or rule is the appropriate schedule, Case or rule for taxing annual payments receivable by a trustee as such.

Some may need consideration on a future occasion, but they are of no relevance to the appeal if s. 14 (3) is a self-contained definition, and I think that it would be inexpedient to discuss them. I must, however, notice an argument ab inconvenienti advanced by the Crown. It was said that a decision in favour of the appellant would involve anomalies. An argument of this sort is of value as an aid to construction only if there is some ambiguity in the words to be construed. At best, it is an unhandy weapon. For it often means that the court is to attempt to construe the difficult language of that part of an enactment which is properly before it for construction by the aid of another part of the enactment which is not really before it at all. It is, therefore, a method which should be shunned unless there is agreement or it is perfectly plain that the decision proposed will in fact lead to the supposed anomaly. Lastly, it cannot be right to decide an action on a balance of competing anomalies when anomalies must arise whatever construction be adopted.

Since I have already said that I find no ambiguity in the language of s. 14 (3) (a) the whole argument ab inconvenienti falls to the ground, but it may be useful to record what were the anomalies which the Crown said must result from the decision of this appeal in the appellant's favour. First, it was said that it would result in a transfer of the assessment from Case III of sched. D to sched. E and a consequential loss of the advantage which the beneficiaries obtain from r. 19. This is disputed by counsel for the appellant, and the dispute led to the citation of a number of authorities and an examination of the schedules and of s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1922. I cannot say that the matter is at all clear, and I will express no opinion about it nor shall I refer to the authorities, some of which may yet have to be re-considered. Secondly, it was said, that, if the appellant is to succeed, any bequest of an annuity to a trustee payable so long as he continues to be a trustee will be earned income within the meaning of s. 14 (3), without any inquiry as to the amount of work done to earn it. This is, I think, true, and it must clearly be understood that the appellant succeeds because he has complied with the condition, by continuing to act as trustee, and not because he has in fact performed very valuable and unusual services outside the ordinary scope of a trustee's duty. But if the Crown is right, we have the anomaly that the appellant must be regarded as having received investment income and as having earned nothing by his services, though it is obvious from the testator's will that he expected services from his trustees. Thirdly, it is said that if an annuity given to a trustee as such is to be regarded as remuneration, and, therefore, as earned income, so also must a lump sum legacy given to a trustee on condition of his accepting the trust. This proposition is denied by counsel for the appellant and the controversy is not one which can be decided in this appeal. It has become unnecessary to consider s. 14 (3) (b) in detail. But, in my opinion, it does not apply to the annuity enjoyed by the appellant under Sir Henry Wellcome's will. The appeal should be allowed with costs throughout.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of the noble Lord on the Woolsack and I agree with it. As, however, your Lordships are differing from the considered judgments of the Court of Appeal, I wish to add a few words on certain points.

The judgment of the Master of the Rolls proceeds on the basis that trusteeship is an office, but that it is not an office of profit because ([1952] 2 All E.R. 93)

But as in the present case there is a special dispensation, I am unable to see how this trusteeship can be said not to be an office of profit. It is said that the special dispensation proceeds from the bounty of the testator, but, in my opinion, it is no more a matter of bounty than the appointment of a particular person to any office of profit may be said to be the bounty of the person who makes the appointment. The condition on which the appointment is made is the performance of the office. The words "office of profit" do not relate to the creator of or appointer to the office, but to the holder of the office, and, whether the emoluments of the office come from the bounty of the creator of, or appointer to, the office or not, they are profits of the office from the point of view of the holder of the office, who is entitled to consider, as it seems to me, that the profits are paid to him as remuneration for performance of the office and not as the bounty of anyone. I see no sound distinction between solicitors who are frequently appointed trustees under wills which provide that they shall be remunerated and the case of Sir Henry Dale. The only distinctions suggested are that a solicitor is a professional man and remunerated according to costs settled by law, but, in my opinion, Sir Henry Dale is also a professional man, and money is just as much earned when it is paid on an annual basis as when it is paid on a quantum meruit. The cases of tips to waiters and cab drivers are dismissed by the Court of Appeal by saying that trusteeship has an almost sacred character which involves a denial of any right to make a profit out of its performance. If the character of trusteeship did involve such a denial it would, of course, be true to say that there is no analogy with the case of gratuities, but in point of fact it is admitted that trusteeship does not involve any such denial. Gratuities may, in my opinion, much more accurately be said to be the bounty of the payer than an annual payment fixed before the creation of the office and payable only so long as the office is performed.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I, too, would allow this appeal. The only question which arises for decision is whether the sum received by the first appellant, Sir Henry Dale, as trustee of the will of Sir Henry Wellcome, deceased, during the fiscal year 1947-48, was or was not "earned income" as defined by s. 14 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The appellants contend that this sum comes within s. 14 (3) (a) as being income arising in respect of remuneration from an office of profit held by the first appellant. My Lords, in agreement with the Court of Appeal, I feel no doubt that the trusteeship of this will is an "office". Is it an "office of profit"? These are not words of art, and I can find no context in the Act of 1918 which should lead your Lordships to give them a meaning which they would not ordinarily bear. To my mind, an "office of profit", in the ordinary sense of the words, is an office which carries with it remuneration, as distinct from an honorary office. The testator in the present case has, undoubtedly, attached remuneration to the office of trustee of his will. The Master of the Rolls and ROMER, L.J., point out that this remuneration is regarded as bounty on the part of the testator, and that, for this reason, the trustee can never compete with creditors for his remuneration: see Re Thorley (3); Re White (4). I agree, but, in my view, these facts are in no way inconsistent with the first appellant's office of trustee being an office of profit. The testator chose to make it an office of profit by attaching remuneration thereto. The first appellant was free to accept or reject that office. He chose to accept it with its remuneration, and, to my mind, from the moment of acceptance he held an office of profit and the remuneration was in his hands remuneration from that office of profit. If so, it comes exactly within the words of s. 14 (3) (a) of the Act of 1918, and the fact that it had its origin in the bounty of the testator seems to me irrelevant. With regard to the argument ab inconvenienti advanced by the Crown, I agree with all that has been said by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and I have nothing to add thereto.

LORD REID: My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with it, and I cannot usefully add anything to it.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, I agree entirely with the observations that have fallen from my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and I only desire to add a few words of my own to explain why I differ from the Court of Appeal. As I read the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and ROMER, L.J., they base their conclusion on one ground only, namely ([1952] 2 All E.R. 97) that:

"The office of trustee is . . . an office of honorary service and not an office of profit—so much so, indeed, that if a trustee makes a profit out of his trusteeship he gets into serious trouble."

The authorities cited for this proposition are Re Pooley (2); Re Thorley (3); and Re White (4). In Re Pooley (2) a direction that a solicitor-trustee should be entitled to charge for his services as a solicitor was held to be a beneficial interest under the will and to be void under s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837, as the trustee in question had witnessed the will. In Re Thorley (3) it was held that annual sums payable under the will of a testator to his trustees while they were carrying on the testator's business, and to his son while managing the business in conjunction with the trustees, were legacies liable to legacy duty under s. 4 of the Stamp Duties Act, 1845. In Re White (4) it was held that a solicitor-trustee is not entitled to profit costs when the estate is insolvent since the authority to him to receive such costs is an act of bounty by the testator and no legatee can claim bounty until the creditors are satisfied. These cases, undoubtedly, establish that a trustee cannot make a profit out of his trusteeship unless authorised so to do by the instrument creating the trusteeship or by an order of the court, and that if a testator attaches remuneration to the trusteeship, that remuneration is, as between the trustee and the estate, bounty, liable to legacy duty while that duty was leviable and postponed to the claims of creditors if the estate was insolvent, but it is clear, and was, I think, admitted, that a trusteeship is an office, and I am unable to see anything in these decisions which prevents a trusteeship being properly described as an office of profit if a testator creates the office and attaches remuneration to it. On the contrary, the expression "office of profit" seems to me an exact description of the trusteeship so created. I would add that a decision that the source of a payment is the bounty of the testator seems to me of little relevance to the question which arises between the trustee and the Inland Revenue as to its character as a receipt in the hands of the trustee. The Master of the Rolls was, I think, also influenced by the argument addressed to the Court of Appeal and repeated before this House that acceptance of the appellant's case would disturb a long-established practice operating to the benefit of the persons interested in trust premises in the great majority of cases. I agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, that this is a consideration which could only influence your Lordships' decision if the meaning of s. 14 (3) was ambiguous and that in the present case, for the reasons he gives, there is no ambiguity. For this reason I, too, prefer to express no opinion as to whether this argumentum in terrorem was well founded. For these reasons, I am able to arrive at the conclusion which was reached by HARMAN, J., and which, as I read the judgments in the Court of Appeal, they, too, would have been glad to accept had they not felt themselves bound by authority to reject it. In doing so, I do not think your Lordships will detract from the fundamental principle of equity law that a trustee cannot receive anything for his services except so far as he may be authorised so to do by the instrument creating the trust or by the court. I would allow the appeal and restore the order of HARMAN, J.

Appeal allowed.

FRANCE, FENWICK & TYNE AND WEAR CO., LTD. v. SWAN, HUNTER, AND WIGHAM RICHARDSON, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 4, 5, 8, 9,
July 2, 1953.]

A Shipping—Towage—Indemnity clause in contract—Claim to indemnity by tug owners when in breach of terms of contract.

On Aug. 3, 1949, France, Fenwick & Tyne and Wear Co., Ltd., tug owners, and Swan, Hunter, and Wigham Richardson, Ltd., ship builders, entered into a contract whereby France, Fenwick were to tow the uncompleted aircraft carrier, Albion, from the Tyne to Rosyth and, inter alia, to provide navigation lights. Conditions incorporated in the contract included the following clause: "That to all intents and purposes whatsoever the master and crew of the tug or tugs employed shall be deemed . . . to be the servants of the owners master and crew of the vessels or crafts towed the tug owners being in no way liable for any of their acts or of any of the consequences thereof. That the owners of the tugs are not held liable for any loss or damage whatsoever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel or craft . . . during any towage contract whether arising from or occasioned by any accident or by any omission breach of duty mismanagement negligence or default of them or their servants . . . nor for any of the consequences of the causes above excepted. The owners or persons interested in the vessel or craft being so towed and the cargo on board of same shall and do undertake to bear satisfy and indemnify the tug owners against all liability for the foregoing matters." On Oct. 18, 1949, off the north-east coast of England a collier, s.s. Maystone, sank as a result of a collision with the Albion which was being towed by three tugs. In an action by the owners of the Maystone the findings against the Albion were (i) defective port light, (ii) failure to exhibit "not under command lights", and (iii) defective planning in putting to sea in the prevailing weather conditions. France, Fenwick were found to have been negligent in respect of (i) and (iii), and damages were apportioned as to one-third to France, Fenwick and as to two-thirds to Swan, Hunter. In an action by France, Fenwick under the clause in their towage conditions for an indemnity against Swan, Hunter in respect of their liability Swan, Hunter, by way of cross-action, claimed damages for breach of contract. Swan, Hunter contended that France, Fenwick were precluded from relying on the exception clause and the indemnity by reason of their own breaches of contract, and they further contended that the negligence on the part of France, Fenwick was to be regarded as having occurred at a time anterior to that covered by the exception clause or the indemnity.

Held: there was no such fundamental breach of contract by France, Fenwick as to preclude them from relying on the general words in the exception clause, and the fact that they were in breach of contract did not preclude them from claiming an indemnity; the "aforegoing matters" referred to in the clause must include cases in which liability to a third party had arisen out of or been occasioned by negligence or default which also constituted a breach of contract between France, Fenwick and Swan, Hunter; the words in the clause "being so towed" merely identified the parties liable to indemnity and did not cut down the earlier words "during any towage contract", which had been inserted to define the period which the exceptions were to cover; and, therefore, France, Fenwick were entitled to be indemnified.

APPEAL by France, Fenwick & Tyne and Wear Co., Ltd., from a decision of WILLMER, J., dated Apr. 25, 1952.

By a contract dated Aug. 3, 1949, France, Fenwick & Tyne and Wear Co., Ltd., a firm of tug owners, agreed with Swan, Hunter, and Wigham Richardson, Ltd., a firm of ship builders, to tow the uncompleted aircraft carrier, Albion, which was being built by Swan, Hunter, from the Tyne to Rosyth, to fit the ship out for the voyage, and, inter alia, to provide navigation lights. Conditions incorporated in the contract included the following clause:

"That to all intents and purposes whatsoever the master and crew of the tug or tugs employed shall be deemed and considered to be the servants of the owners master and crew of the vessels or crafts towed the tug owners being in no way liable for any of their acts or of any of the consequences thereof. That the owners of the tugs are not held liable for any loss or damage whatsoever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel or craft . . . during any towage contract whether arising from or occasioned by any accident or by any omission breach of duty mismanagement negligence or default of them or their servants or any defect or imperfection in the tugs or any of them . . . nor for any of the consequences of the causes above excepted. The owners or persons interested in the vessel or craft being so towed and the cargo on board of same shall and do undertake to bear satisfy and indemnify the tug owners against all liability for the foregoing matters."

On Oct. 18, 1949, off the north-east coast of England a collier, s.s. Maystone, sank as a result of a collision with the Albion which was being towed by three tugs, the property of France, Fenwick.

The owners of the Maystone brought an action against the Admiralty as owners of the Albion, Swan, Hunter, and France, Fenwick, in which the Admiralty were held not to blame. The findings against the Albion were (i) defective port light, (ii) failure to exhibit "not under command" lights, and (iii) defective planning in sailing in the conditions shown by the falling barometer. France, Fenwick were found to have been negligent in respect of (i) and (iii) and the damages were apportioned as to two-thirds to Swan, Hunter and as to one-third to France, Fenwick.

In the present proceedings France, Fenwick claimed an indemnity against Swan, Hunter in respect of their liability for one-third of the damages under the clause in their towage conditions. Swan, Hunter resisted their claim and claimed damages for breach of contract by way of cross-action. WILLMER, J., held that the general words of the exception clause were not sufficiently clear to cover the matters in respect of which France, Fenwick were found at fault, being matters which constituted plain breaches of specific terms of their contract, and gave judgment for Swan, Hunter. France, Fenwick appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. In our previous judgment ([1953] 1 All E.R. 978) we decided that the second and third defendants, whom we will refer to as Swan Hunter and France Fenwick, were liable to the plaintiffs for damages arising out of the collision. The Admiralty claimed against France Fenwick for damage to the Albion, and, in our judgment, France Fenwick were liable on that claim. In these proceedings France Fenwick claim an indemnity against Swan Hunter in respect of their liability under a clause in their towage conditions. Swan Hunter resist this claim on various grounds and claim by cross-action to recover, by way of damages, for breach of contract, any amount they may be called on to pay by reason of the collision. We were asked, as was the learned judge, to apportion blame provisionally between the two parties subject to the rights which are relied on in these proceedings. With respect, we think that this was a waste of time. If the case goes to the House of Lords we would most respectfully suggest that the issues raised in the present proceedings should not be, as they have been before us, postponed for argument at a second hearing.

The towage conditions relied on were not expressly referred to in the contractual document of Aug. 3, 1949. On the question whether it was part of the contract, the learned judge said:

"I have already decided that the order of Aug. 3, 1949, constituted the contract under which the towage was performed, and that there was no subsequent variation by agreement. But it is not now in dispute that the terms of the order must be interpreted in the light of the correspondence which passed between the parties. This correspondence made it quite clear that France Fenwick were only prepared to quote on the basis that Swan Hunter accepted their towage conditions, and that those towage conditions were to be incorporated as terms of any contract that was made."

We agree with what the learned judge there said and the position was the same before us.

We will deal first with the claim of France Fenwick for indemnity. The clause on which they rely is set out in their statement of claim and is as follows:

"That to all intents and purposes whatsoever the master and crew of the tug or tugs employed shall be deemed and considered to be the servants of the owners master and crew of the vessels or crafts towed the tug owners being in no way liable for any of their acts or of any of the consequences thereof. That the owners of the tugs are not held liable for any loss or damage whatsoever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel or craft or any of the cargoes on board of the same during any towage contract whether arising from or occasioned by any accident or by any omission breach of duty mismanagement negligence or default of them or their servants or any defect or imperfection in the tugs or any of them or the machinery or ropes of any part of them or shortage of bunker coal owing to bad weather or other unforeseen circumstances or any delay stoppage or slackness of speed however occasioned or from any perils of the seas rivers or navigation or from strikes lockouts labour disturbances disputes or anything done in contemplation or furtherance thereof whether the tug owners be parties thereto or not nor for any of the consequences of the causes above excepted. The owners or persons interested in the vessel or craft being so towed and the cargo on board of same shall and do undertake to bear satisfy and indemnify the tug owners against all liability for the foregoing matters."

In our previous judgment our findings against the Albion were summarised in these words: (i) defective port light; (ii) failure to exhibit "not under command" lights or other illuminations to warn oncoming shipping; (iii) defective planning in sailing in the conditions shown by the falling barometer, and, having sailed, in not broadcasting warnings to other shipping. With regard to (i), France Fenwick had under their contract undertaken to provide navigation lights. The sentence in which we dealt with their liability to the plaintiffs in respect of this matter is in the following words:

"France Fenwick cannot, however, escape from blame themselves, since, having provided the defective light, they towed the Albion to sea equipped with that light which, as the learned judge found, brings them into a relationship of proximity with other vessels which might be encountered at sea."

France Fenwick were not concerned with (ii). With regard to (iii) there was some discussion as to the expression "defective planning". The relevant negligence was, however, in sailing in the conditions which prevailed at the time. The loss of or damage to the Maystone and the Albion was, as it seems to us, plainly loss or damage happening to or occasioned by any vessel within the meaning of the clause. Further, France Fenwick's liability to the plaintiffs arises on our findings from their, France Fenwick's, negligence or default and not from any wilful or malicious act. It is submitted, in the first place, that France Fenwick are precluded from relying on the exceptions in this clause and the indemnity by reason of their own breaches of contract. In the second place, it is submitted that the relevant negligence was or ought to be regarded as having occurred at a time anterior to that covered by the exceptions or the indemnity.

In considering the first of these submissions, the learned judge, in the first instance, accepted and applied a principle, as submitted by counsel for Swan Hunter, that general words in exception clauses could not be relied on if the loss or damage flowed from a fundamental breach which went to the root of the contract. A familiar example of a breach which prevents general words in an exception clause being relied on is "deviation" in a contract of carriage. On the other hand, general words of exception for negligence have been held to relieve against mis-delivery by negligence: Smackman v. General Steam Navigation Co. (1). In Cunard S.S. Co. v. Buerger (2) goods were to be carried to Odessa. There was a clause in the contract making liability for mis-delivery conditional on a declaration of value by the shipper which had not been made. The goods had been lost, and in a claim for damages the defendants sought to rely on this clause. The history of the goods were complicated and need not be set out. It was argued in the House of Lords that the Court of Appeal, which had decided against the defendants, had treated mis-delivery as if it was equivalent to a deviation in its effect on the clause and that this was wrong. LORD SUMNER in his opinion did not proceed on the basis that any fundamental breach ousted the exception, and mis-delivery was, as one would have thought, such a breach. He analysed the judgments in the Court of Appeal ([1927] A.C. 6) and held that they had not proceeded on the basis of mis-delivery but had found an abandonment of the voyage or such unreasonable delay as amounted to a deviation. In a later part of his speech (ibid., 8) he speaks of "... a fundamental departure from the course of the agreed transit, after which such a clause of exception would cease to apply."

The same criterion was adopted in London & North Western Ry. Co. v. Neilson (3). In that case the goods were, under the contract, to be carried to "B". Owing to negligence, they were unloaded at an intermediate station and dispersed, with consequent delay. Under the contract the goods were to be delivered at "B" on a stated day, and, the goods being theatrical properties, this term might well have been regarded as fundamental and going to the root of the contract. The House of Lords did not proceed on these lines. It was held that the protection afforded by the general words in the clause could not be relied on because the agreed transit had been departed from.

In The Cap Palos (4) the claim arose under a contract of towage. The defendants sought to rely on an exception clause exempting them from liability for damage occasioned by their neglect or default. The tow, owing to negligent navigation by the defendants' servants, had got into a position of danger in Robin Hood's Bay and the tugs had left her there. The next and essential stage in the carrying out of the contract was to get her from there to a place of safety. The tug owner, believing erroneously that a salvage association were going to do this, cancelled an order which he had previously given to one of his tugs to go to the tow's assistance. The headnote, we think, accurately summarises the decision ([1921] P. 458):

"Held, that as the defendant had at any rate temporarily given up any attempt to continue the towage and had left the performance of his duty to others, he could not avail himself of the words 'default of the steam tug owner', which only extended to cover defaults during the actual performance of the duties of the contract."

The court would, we think, have held, if damage had been caused by negligence or default up to the time when the defendant gave up the attempt to tow the vessel to a place of safety, that the clause would have applied.

We have referred to these cases because we think that the words "fundamental breach" might be read in this context in a wider sense than the decisions justify. Having applied the test in the wide form to which we have referred, the learned judge said this:

"I cannot find any such fundamental breach of contract or any such radical departure from the work contracted for on the part of France Fenwick as would dis-entitle them from relying on their towage conditions to the extent that these protect them."

We agree, so far as the navigation light is concerned, that there was no abandonment even of that subsidiary term. A navigation light was delivered, thought by both parties to be a proper light. The judge found, and we have upheld his finding, that it fell short of the proper degree of luminosity. The learned judge had found that four tugs should have been provided. This was, to use a non-technical term, a more serious breach than those which we have found against France Fenwick. The learned judge then proceeded to hold that the clause could not be relied on for different reasons and he summarises his conclusion in this way:

"I do not think that the general words of the towage conditions are sufficiently clear to cover the matters in respect of which France Fenwick have been found at fault, matters which as between themselves and Swan Hunter constituted plain breaches of specific terms of their contract."

We feel a difficulty about this. If the test is whether or not there is a breach of a specific term, it seems difficult to reconcile this test with the test based on breach of a fundamental term which is in the nature of a deviation. It was at one time in the course of the argument suggested that a breach of an express term might differ in its effect on the clause from a breach of an implied term. We cannot follow this suggestion. We agree that, if there is a direct conflict, a written term in a contract will override or prevent the application of general words in a printed condition, or, at any rate, will normally do so. If, for example, there was an express undertaking to take all reasonable care with regard to "X", that would prevent a general exception of liability for negligence applying to "X". As the cases which we have stated show, there is no inconsistency between an express undertaking, for example, to delivery to "X", and an exception against liability if this undertaking is broken through negligence.

Counsel for Swan Hunter sought to argue that in no case could an indemnity be claimed by a party in breach. It seems to us impossible to suggest that parties are precluded from coming to such an arrangement. We think it is precisely what the present clause provides for. The earlier words plainly apply, inter alia, to damage done by the tug to the tow, occasioned by the negligence or default of the tug owner or his servants. This negligence or default would, except in possibly very exceptional circumstances, be a breach of contract, but the indemnity clause refers to all liability for the "aforegoing matters". It seems to us impossible to take out of "the foregoing matters" cases in which the liability to a third party has arisen out of or been occasioned by negligence or default which also constituted a breach of contract as between France Fenwick and Swan Hunter. The second submission was that the acts should be regarded as having occurred at a time anterior to that covered by the exception clause. We were referred to The West Cock (5), where on quite different words this point arose. Counsel for France Fenwick relies on the words "during any towage contract" and submits that this period plainly covers all the happenings which lead to the liability of the plaintiffs. We agree. Counsel for Swan Hunter invited us to cut down these words by reason of the words in the last sentence, "being so towed", and to hold that this created an ambiguity which would, on familiar principles, lead to the construction less favourable to the defendants. These words relate back, we think, to the first paragraph in the clause, and, in our opinion, are plainly words identifying the parties liable to indemnify and cannot be read as cutting down the words in the earlier part of the clause which have clearly been inserted in order to define the period which the exceptions are to cover. In any case, we doubt if the defendants could succeed on this ground, even if one regarded the exceptions as limited to the towage. The negligence with regard to the light, which led to France Fenwick's liability, was the setting to sea after having supplied it. Again, the setting out to sea, having regard to the falling barometer, would seem to be in the course of the towage. For this reason we think that France Fenwick's claim succeeds and that they are entitled to be indemnified.

We have not thought it necessary to refer to or rely on Swan Hunter's responsibility as found, both by the learned judge and this court, in respect of the lamp or to their responsibility, with France Fenwick, for setting out in the weather conditions which prevailed. Their knowledge may well be regarded as supporting the view that there was no abandonment of the contract or an essential part of it. We do not, however, find it necessary to base our decision on these facts as amounting to waiver and express no opinion whether that principle would or would not be applicable, assuming we are wrong in the reasons which have led us to our conclusion. It was not suggested that, if France Fenwick succeeded, as we hold they do, on their claim for an indemnity, Swan Hunter could succeed on the cross-claim for damages. That is plainly inconsistent with the terms of the towage clause, if applicable.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. DURKIN.

[COURTS-MARTIAL APPEAL COURT (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 13, 14, 1953.]

Court-Martial—Need for commanding officer's signature on charge sheet—Dissolution of court-martial—Powers of convening authority—Army Act, s. 53, s. 54 (6)—Rules of Procedure, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 2354), r. 56.

A At his trial before a district court-martial on charges of larceny the appellant raised a plea in bar of trial on the ground of condonation because, after being first placed under close arrest, he was told by his commanding officer that a summary of evidence would be taken and meantime he would be released to open arrest and must resume his ordinary duties. When the summary of evidence had been taken he was again brought before his commanding officer and relieved of his duties but he remained under open arrest. The court-martial held that the offence had been condoned when the appellant's commanding officer ordered him, while under open arrest, to continue with his duties, but that finding was not confirmed. When the matter came before the Directorate of Army Legal Services it was observed that the charge sheet had been signed by the brigadier and not by the appellant's commanding officer, and a letter was sent to the G.O.C., Aldershot District, stating that because of this the court-martial might not have jurisdiction to try the appellant and that the best course was to dissolve the court in being and convene a new court to try the case on a charge sheet signed by the commanding officer. Accordingly, the first court-martial court was dissolved and a second court was assembled before whom the appellant was tried and convicted.

D HELD: (i) there was no provision in the Army Act or the Rules of Procedure which required a charge sheet to be signed by the accused person's commanding officer; r. 56 of the Rules of Procedure provided that a finding by a court-martial should be valid although the charge sheet had not been signed by the commanding officer of the accused unless it appeared that injustice had been done to the accused; no injustice had been done in the present case; and, therefore, the point raised by the Directorate of Army Legal Services was immaterial and the first court-martial could have proceeded with the trial.

E (ii) by the Army Act, s. 54 (6), no finding by a court-martial was valid unless it was confirmed, and, accordingly, the finding of the first court-martial that the plea in bar of trial on the ground of condonation was good was of no effect.

F (iii) there was no express power to dissolve a court-martial except in so far as the Army Act, s. 53, provided for dissolution in the event of the death of the president or members of the court, or if the accused or any member could not attend, but, just as civilian criminal courts, though not so empowered by statute, have always assumed power, in case of irregularity, to discharge the jury and order a re-trial so, for the same reason, the convening authority had power to dissolve a court-martial.

G APPEAL against conviction by district court-martial.

H The appellant, Private John George Durkin, Army Catering Corps, formerly corporal (acting sergeant) in charge of the cook-house at the War Office Selection Board Camp at Barton Stacey, appealed by leave of the court against his conviction by district court-martial on two charges of stealing provisions and other government property from the cook-house, when he was sentenced to be reduced to the ranks.

Silkin for the appellant.

E. Garth Moore for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant appeals against conviction by a court-martial on two charges of stealing public property on grounds which, if successful, would not lead to the restoration of his character as a corporal, but raise highly complicated and technical points not dealt with in terms in the Army Act or in the MANUAL OF MILITARY LAW.

It was alleged that he stole the first part of the property mentioned in the charge on Dec. 1, 1952. At that time Major Drew-Wilkinson, the camp commandant at Barton Stacey, was about to hand over his command to another officer. On Dec. 10 Major Littledale arrived to take over the duties of camp commandant. On Dec. 18 there occurred a second theft, and the police were brought in to investigate it. They interviewed the appellant, and on Dec. 20 he was brought before two magistrates who ordered him to be handed over to a military escort so that he might be dealt with by his commanding officer, the proper procedure where a soldier is charged with committing an offence with regard to government property on government property. The appellant remained under close arrest until Dec. 22 when he was brought before Major Littledale, who at that time knew nothing about the case. That officer released him to open arrest (which meant that he was confined to camp) and ordered a summary of evidence to be taken. He told the appellant that he was to carry out his normal duties in the cook-house. On Jan. 9, 1953, the summary of evidence having been completed, the appellant was brought before Major Littledale and relieved of his duties, but he remained under open arrest, and on Jan. 19 he was remanded for trial on the charges. The charge sheet was signed by a brigadier and not by Major Littledale as the commanding officer. On Jan. 22 the court-martial was held. There was no objection by the appellant to the composition or jurisdiction of the court, and he took no point that the commanding officer had not signed the charge sheet. The only plea put forward on his behalf was a plea in bar under r. 36 of the Rules of Procedure, which provides:

"The accused at the time of his general plea of 'Guilty' or 'Not Guilty' to a charge for an offence, may offer a plea in bar of trial on the ground that . . . (ii) the offence has been pardoned or condoned by competent military authority."

He entered a plea that the offence had been condoned because he had been told by Major Littledale that, while he was in open arrest, he was to go on with his duties in the cook-house. The court-martial held that the offence had been condoned, but their finding was subject to confirmation, under r. 36 (D) of the Rules of Procedure, which provides:

"If the finding that a plea in bar is proved is not confirmed, the court may be re-assembled by the confirming authority, and proceed as if the plea had been found not proved."

The Directorate of Army Legal Services, before whom the matter came, observed that the charge sheet had been signed, not by the commanding officer, but by the brigadier, and, accordingly, a letter was written to the General Officer Commanding, Aldershot District, in which it was said:

"It became apparent during the first hearing of this case on Jan. 22 that the charge sheet before the court was not signed by the commanding officer of the accused, that is to say, it was not signed by the camp commandant who was the person who investigated the case and remanded the accused for trial, but by Brigadier Ray, the commandant. It is a matter for you whether you feel that this charge sheet is in order, but you may well feel that the court would not have jurisdiction to try the accused upon such a charge sheet, and the best course would now be to dissolve the court at present in being and convene a new court. It would also be necessary for a new charge sheet to be made out and signed by the camp commandant who should remand the accused upon it."

This court cannot find, and our attention has not been called to, any provision of the Army Act or of the Rules of Procedure which requires the charge sheet to be signed by the commanding officer, except that in the form which is in the schedule to the Rules of Procedure there is a place for the signature of the commanding officer which appears to the court to indicate that the commanding officer has remanded the accused for trial. There is no special provision about this, and by r. 56 of the Rules of Procedure, it is provided:

"Whenever it appears that a court-martial had jurisdiction to try a person and make a finding and that there is legal evidence or a plea of Guilty to justify such finding, such finding and any sentence which the court-martial had jurisdiction to pass thereon may be confirmed, and if so confirmed shall be valid, notwithstanding any deviation from these rules or notwithstanding that the charge sheet has not been signed by the commanding officer or the convening officer, provided that the charges have, in fact, before trial been approved by the commanding officer and the convening officer, or notwithstanding any defect or objection, technical or other, unless it appears that any injustice has been done to the offender; but nothing in this rule shall relieve an officer from any responsibility for any wilful or negligent disregard of any of these rules."

The point raised by the Directorate of Army Legal Services seems to be quite immaterial. If the court-martial had proceeded, r. 56 would have prevented any question arising with regard to the fact that the form had not been signed by the commanding officer because it is clear that no injustice had been done to the appellant. The court-martial could have proceeded with the trial in the ordinary way because, once the plea in bar was not confirmed, by reason of the provision to which I have referred the court-martial would have continued to deal with the case and the appellant would have been called on to plead Guilty or Not Guilty to the offence, but on account of this letter which the General Officer Commanding, Aldershot District, received, it was ordered that the court-martial should be dissolved and that a further hearing should take place before another court-martial. It is observable that the proceedings before the first court-martial resulted in no finding because the finding of a court-martial is of no validity until it has been confirmed, and so the finding that the plea in bar was good and the offence had been condoned was of no validity as it had not been confirmed. That finding, not having been confirmed, did not, of course, amount to an acquittal; it simply amounted to an expression of opinion that the court-martial was a nullity. If that first court-martial had not been dissolved, it would have been able to continue the hearing of the offence. There was no decision on anything except the decision of the confirming officer that the plea in bar was not proved. The Army Act, s. 54 (6), provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act with respect to the finding of acquittal, the finding and sentence of a court-martial shall not be valid except in so far as the same may be confirmed by an authority authorised to confirm the same."

It is clear, therefore, that the proceedings of a court-martial are not completed until the finding has been confirmed or not confirmed as the case may be.

A second court-martial, accordingly, was convened and they found the appellant guilty on both charges. So far as that finding is concerned, this court sees no ground whatever on which it can differ from the finding of fact that he was guilty, but it is argued that there was no power to dissolve the first court-martial before it reached a decision, and, a fortiori, no power to direct a trial before another court-martial. It is curious, no doubt, that there is no express power of dissolution given by the Army Act or the Rules of Procedure except in so far as the matter is dealt with by s. 53 of the Army Act, which provides that a court-martial shall be dissolved in certain circumstances, that is, compendiously, if the president or members of the court die or cannot attend and the court is reduced below its legal minimum, or if, on account of the illness of the accused, it is impossible to continue the trial. In those circumstances, the court-martial shall be dissolved, but there is no other provision with regard to the dissolution of a court-martial. Rule 66 of the Rules of Procedure deals with the matter in this way:

“Where, in consequence of anything arising while the court is sitting, the court is unable by reason of dissolution (as specified in s. 53 of the Army Act, or otherwise), or of the absence of the president, to continue the trial, the president, or in his absence, the senior member present, will immediately report the facts to the convening authority.”

That rule does not apply to such a case as this because, if the convening authority has dissolved the court, there is no necessity to report to the authority that the authority has dissolved it, but counsel for the Crown has contended that on what he called the common law of the army there is always power to dissolve a court-martial. It might be said that there could not be such a power because that would enable the convening authority, if they thought the court-martial was not taking a view of the case which commended itself to them (the convening authority), to dissolve the court-martial and appoint another court, but we cannot, and do not, assume that a convening authority would ever act as improperly as that, and, no doubt, if they did, proper disciplinary action would be taken and the matter raised in Parliament. It is clear that, considering that a court-martial is to some extent like a bench of magistrates, both being judges of law and fact, it might be most prejudicial to soldiers if the convening authority had not power on a proper occasion to dissolve the court-martial and order proceedings before another court. For instance, if during the hearing of the case some matter highly prejudicial to the accused came out—if, for instance, evidence of the bad character of the accused was wrongly received—and that came to the knowledge of the convening authority, it would be highly prejudicial and wrong that that court-martial should proceed. The only course then would be to dissolve the court-martial and have the accused re-tried.

In fact, the position is exactly the same as exists in civilian courts where, during the course of a trial something occurs which, in the opinion of the presiding judge, is so prejudicial to the prisoner that the only proper course is to discharge the jury and begin the case over again. That has often been said by the Court of Criminal Appeal to be the right course to take in such circumstances. There is no statute which permits the court to do that, but it is a power which the court has always assumed, and it is a power which it is necessary in the interests of justice that the court should have. There is no question that the court has that power and constantly uses it. For the same reason, it is clear that the convening authority must have power to dissolve a court-martial if they consider that the proceedings are in some way irregular or that matters have arisen which are prejudicial to the prisoner. If we were to hold now that, though it has always been assumed to have this power, the convening authority had no such power and that once a court-martial was in existence, although it had come to no decision, it must continue to be in existence, it is obvious that very great prejudice might be caused to accused persons for which there would be no remedy.

We are, therefore, of opinion that it was within the power of the convening authority to dissolve this court-martial and order the trial before another one, although we think that the technical point that was taken by the Directorate of Army Legal Services had no substance in it. The fact that this document had not been signed by the commanding officer was not a defect which was in any way fatal and r. 56 of the Rules of Procedure would have afforded an answer if any question had been raised. No objection was taken by the appellant to being tried by this court-martial, and, therefore, we think there was no necessity to dissolve it, but we cannot doubt that the convening authority had power to dissolve the court-martial if it seemed fit. Therefore, there is no valid objection here because the case was proceeded with after the plea in bar had been disallowed, and there is no valid objection because another court-martial was assembled to try the general issue. This power of dissolving the court-martial could not, I think, be exercised if the court-martial had once come to a decision, but where the court has come to no decision there can be no objection as far as this court can see.

[HIS LORDSHIP then examined the evidence and found as a fact that there was no evidence to justify the finding of condonation by the first court-martial, and continued:] Therefore, the decision of the confirming officer was right in refusing to confirm the finding. In these circumstances, the plea of condonation could not have been successfully raised at the second trial, and, as there is no other ground on which it is suggested that the proceedings were in any way wrong, this appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BROWN v. DREW.

D [QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.),
 July 15, 1953.]

*Licensing—Licence—Occasional licence—Premises already fully licensed—

The respondent was the holder of a full and unrestricted licence for the sale of intoxicating liquor at his hotel. On Feb. 11, 1953, he applied to the licensing justices for an occasional licence to enable him to sell intoxicating liquor at another hotel in respect of which there was a licence restricting the supply of liquor to residents or for consumption with a meal. The justices granted the occasional licence. It was contended by the appellant that an occasional licence could not be granted under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 64, in respect of premises which were already licensed, since s. 64 (3) provided: “. . . the place in which any intoxicating liquor is sold in pursuance of the occasional licence shall be deemed to be licensed premises . . .”

HELD: the statutory fiction introduced by that sub-section operated only where the premises in respect of which the occasional licence was granted were unlicensed, and nothing in the sub-section prevented the grant of an occasional licence in respect of premises which were already licensed.

FOR THE LICENSING (CONSOLIDATION) ACT, 1910, s. 64, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 259.

CASE STATED by Cornwall justices.

H On Feb. 11, 1953, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Liskeard, an application under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 64, was made by the respondent, Kenneth Bailey Drew, of the Looe Hotel, for an occasional licence between the hours of 8 p.m. and 11 p.m. on Feb. 14, 1953, in respect of the Hannafore Point Hotel, Looe, on the occasion of a Valentine Night ball. The application was opposed by the appellant, George Brown, a chief inspector of police. It was proved or admitted that the respondent was the holder of a justices' licence authorising him to sell by retail at the Looe Hotel any intoxicating liquor for consumption either on or off the premises; that one R. C. Roberts was the holder of a justices' licence authorising him to sell by retail at the licensed premises known as the Hannaford Point Hotel any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises on condition that no intoxicating liquor be sold by retail for consumption on the premises unless such liquor was either (a) sold to any person or persons residing in the said hotel or (b) sold or served to any person or persons not residing in the said hotel at the same time as a meal and for consumption at such meal; and that the said Roberts was organising the ball in respect of which the application for the occasional licence was made.

For the appellant it was contended that the justices were not empowered to grant an occasional licence to take effect on premises which were already licensed; that under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 64 (3), premises in respect of which an occasional licence was granted were deemed to be licensed premises, and such premises could not be actual licensed premises; and that, if the application were granted, there would be two licences in force for the same premises with possibly different conditions, and it would be impossible for the police properly to supervise the premises. For the respondent it was contended that the word "deemed" appeared twice in s. 64 (3) and must bear the same meaning in each context, and that in the case of the words "a person taking out an occasional licence shall be deemed to be the holder of a justices' licence" the word "deemed" could not bear the meaning assigned to it by the appellant, as the only person authorised to apply for an occasional licence was one who was already the holder of a licence, i.e., a retailer's excise on-licence for the sale of spirits, beer or wine; and that whether the police could or could not properly supervise premises was a question for the justices to consider when exercising their discretion as to the granting of an occasional licence, but it did not affect their jurisdiction. The justices being of the opinion that they had power to grant the occasional licence, and that it was advisable so to do, in the exercise of their discretion granted to the respondent the occasional licence applied for. The appellant now appealed.

King Anningson for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This Case stated by justices for the county of Cornwall raises a curious point under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 64, which does not seem to have arisen before. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] Section 64 provides:

"(1) An occasional licence shall not be granted except with the consent of a petty sessional court, and unless twenty-four hours at least before applying for that consent the applicant has served on the superintendent of police for the district notice of his intention to apply for the consent, setting out his name and address, the place and occasion in respect of which the licence is required, the period for which the licence is to be in force, and the hours to be specified in the consent of the justices . . .

(3) For the purpose of the provisions of this Act . . . and for the purpose of s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and any provisions for giving effect to those sections, a person taking out an occasional licence shall be deemed to be the holder of a justices' licence, and the place in which any intoxicating liquor is sold in pursuance of the occasional licence shall be deemed to be licensed premises, and to be the premises of the person taking out the occasional licence."

As counsel for the appellant has pointed out, although this part of the subsection provides that a person taking out an occasional licence shall be deemed to be the holder of a licence, only a person who already holds a licence can obtain an occasional licence. Counsel argues that the words in the section,

“ the place in which any intoxicating liquor is sold in pursuance of the occasional licence shall be deemed to be licensed premises ”, prohibit the grant of a licence in respect of premises which are already licensed. I cannot accept that argument. It is obvious that this statutory fiction as to licensed premises is intended to, and must, apply to premises which are not licensed. If they are not licensed, they are deemed to be licensed directly an occasional licence is granted in respect of them. The common case is the refreshment marquee at an agricultural or flower show. Those places are subject to an occasional licence and are, therefore, deemed to be licensed premises, but I do not think that that means that an occasional licence cannot be granted in respect of premises which are already licensed. I cannot find anything in s. 64 which so provides. It would have been open to the justices to have said, if they had seen fit, that this occasional licence was to apply only to the ballroom or some other part of the hotel. I can see that there are objections to such a course, but we have only to decide whether or not the justices have power to do that which they did. The question whether or not we should have approved of it if we had been the justices does not arise. For these reasons the appeal must be dismissed.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

DONOVAN, J.: Where any premises are unlicensed, the statutory fiction introduced by s. 64 (3) operates, but it is not necessary to invoke the fiction where premises are already licensed.

Appeal dismissed.

CHANTREY MARTIN & CO. v. MARTIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Jenkins, L.J.J.), July 3, 14, 1953.]

Discovery—Production of documents—Accountant's documents incidental to audit of client's accounts—Correspondence with Inland Revenue regarding client's liability to tax.

The plaintiffs, a firm of chartered accountants, claimed damages from the defendant, who was employed by them as senior audit clerk, for breach of his contract of service. The defendant counterclaimed for damages for wrongful dismissal and alleged that in the course of preparing an audit of the accounts of a limited company, the clients of the plaintiffs, for the year ending Aug. 31, 1951, he had discovered certain irregularities in the accounts for the year ending Aug. 31, 1950, audited by the plaintiffs, and that he, having refused to proceed with the audit until the irregularities were adjusted, was summarily dismissed by the plaintiffs. On discovery, the plaintiffs objected to producing all working papers and schedules relating to the audit of the company's books for the years ending Aug. 31, 1950, and Aug. 31, 1951; the draft accounts of the company for those years and notes and calculations relating thereto made by a member of the plaintiff firm; the final accounts of the company for the year ending Aug. 31, 1950; and correspondence between the plaintiffs and the Inland Revenue relating to the accounts for the year ending Aug. 31, 1950, and the tax computations thereon. The ground for the plaintiffs' objections was that all such documents were the property of the company and were in the plaintiffs' possession solely as accountants to the company and not otherwise.

HELD: (i) in the preparation of the audits the relationship of the plaintiffs to the company was that of professional man and client and not agent and principal; there being no question of legal professional privilege, the fact that the documents embodied information which was the subject of professional confidence as between the plaintiffs and the company was insufficient ground for resisting production; and, therefore, the final accounts and the documents incidental to their preparation were the property of the plaintiffs and should be produced.

Ex p. Horsfall (1827) (7 B. & C. 528), explained.

(ii) the correspondence between the plaintiffs and the Inland Revenue, having been conducted by the plaintiffs as agents for the company, was the property of the company, and, therefore, the plaintiffs could not be ordered to produce it.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of BARRY, J., in chambers, dated June 4, 1953, allowing an appeal by the plaintiffs from a master's order dated May 22, 1953, which ordered the production of certain documents disclosed by the plaintiffs in their affidavit of documents. BARRY, J., held that the documents, being the working papers, drafts, notes, calculations and typed final accounts prepared by the plaintiffs, a firm of accountants, in the course of the auditing of a company's accounts, were the property of that company.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14. JENKINS, L.J., read the judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order of BARRY, J., dated June 4, 1953, allowing an appeal by the plaintiffs from a master's order dated May 22, 1953, which had ordered the production by the plaintiffs of certain documents disclosed in their affidavit of documents as relevant documents in their possession or power which they objected to produce on the grounds stated in such affidavit. The question in the appeal is whether the learned judge was right in holding that the grounds relied on by the plaintiffs were sufficient in law to entitle them to refuse production of all or any and if so which of these admittedly relevant documents.

The plaintiffs are a firm of chartered accountants and, according to the statement of claim indorsed on the writ, the defendant was in their employment from July 18, 1951, or thereabouts, down to Apr. 22, 1952, as a senior audit clerk at a salary of £43 6s. 8d. per calendar month payable in advance on the first day of each such month. The statement of claim goes on to allege that on the last-mentioned date the defendant in breach of his contract of service with the plaintiffs absented himself from his duties without leave or notice thus terminating his employment without notice either given or received and without reasonable cause. Then there is an allegation, not material for the present purpose, to the effect that the plaintiffs had lent the defendant £7

A which he had failed to repay, followed by a claim for £93 13s. 4d. made up of one month's salary paid in advance for April, 1952, and one month's salary in lieu of notice, together with the loan of £7.

The defendant by his defence and counterclaim (so far as material for the present purpose) admitted his employment by the plaintiffs, with the qualification that his salary at the rate above-mentioned had commenced from Jan. 1,
B 1952, he having previously from July 18, 1951, been employed in the same capacity at a salary of £10 per week; alleged that he was impliedly entitled to reasonable notice (which he put at three calendar months) to terminate his employment; denied the breach of contract alleged against him; contended that on the contrary the plaintiffs on Apr. 18, 1952, had wrongfully dismissed the defendant from his employment; and counterclaimed for the sum of £130,
C being three months' salary in lieu of notice.

The circumstances on which the defendant's allegation of wrongful dismissal is based are set out in particulars contained in the defence and amplified in further and better particulars subsequently delivered pursuant to a request by the plaintiffs. The short effect of these particulars was that in March, 1952, the defendant in the course of his duties commenced an audit for the financial D year ending Aug. 31, 1951, of the books of a certain limited company which was a client of the plaintiffs and to which I will refer as "the client company", the method being to take the figures for the financial year ending Aug. 31, 1950, and to build up the next year's figures with reference to the appropriate heading of the previous year; that in the course of such audit the defendant discovered certain irregularities in the audited accounts for the year ending Aug. 31, 1950,
E which the plaintiffs had audited; that prior to Apr. 18, 1952, he had discussed his draft accounts for the year ending Aug. 31, 1951, and the audited accounts for the previous year with the plaintiffs' senior partner, Mr. H. G. Martin, and had suggested adjustments to correct the irregularities he had detected; that Mr. Martin refused to allow these adjustments to be made and ordered the defendant to make tax computations on the basis of the unadjusted accounts;
F and that on Apr. 18, 1952, after a further discussion of the accounts in question, in which Mr. Martin maintained his former attitude, the defendant told Mr. Martin that he would not be a party to finalising the draft accounts or making the tax computations unless the suggested adjustments were made, whereupon Mr. Martin, acting for the plaintiffs, summarily dismissed him. The alleged irregularities in the accounts in question, as particularised by the defendant,
G included understatement of sales, understatement of gross profit, and understatement of administration expenses and salaries, and were (in effect) alleged by the defendant to be calculated to mislead the shareholders and to evade payment of the proper amount of tax on the profits of the client company. The plaintiffs in their reply denied the whole of the defendant's allegations of irregularities in the draft and audited accounts of the client company and also
H denied the alleged dismissal of the defendant.

Such being the nature of the case on the pleadings, it could not well be disputed that all documents in the plaintiffs' possession or power relating to the preparation of the client company's accounts for the years ending Aug. 31, 1950 and 1951, are documents relating to matters in question in the action, and, therefore, proper to be disclosed. As we have already mentioned, they were in fact duly included in the plaintiffs' affidavit of documents, but with an objection taken in the body of the affidavit to their production, the validity of this objection being the subject of the present appeal. The objection was taken by the plaintiffs in their affidavit of documents in these terms:

"We object to produce any of the documents set forth in the second part of sched. I hereto on the grounds following: (a) As to certain of the documents mentioned in the said part of the said schedule, such documents are the property of 'the client company' . . . and are in the plaintiffs' custody possession or power solely as accountants to the said 'client company' and not otherwise."

The documents in question are those lettered (A) to (K) in the second part of sched. I to the affidavit, namely:

"(A) The file or files of all working papers and schedules relating to the audit for the year ended Aug. 31, 1950, of the books of 'the client company' clients of the plaintiffs. (B) The first draft accounts of 'the client company' for the year ended Aug. 31, 1950, as prepared by Mr. Fradd. (C) Partial re-draft of the accounts of 'the client company' for year ended Aug. 31, 1950. (D) The final typed accounts of 'the client company' for year ended Aug. 31, 1950. (E) The correspondence between plaintiffs and the Inland Revenue in regard to these accounts and the tax computations thereon. (F) The private ledger of 'the client company' containing entries for the year ended Aug. 31, 1950. (G) The file or files of all working papers and schedules relating to the audit for the year ended Aug. 31, 1951, of the books of 'the client company'. (H) The draft accounts of 'the client company' for year ended Aug. 31, 1951. (I) Notes and calculations relating to these draft accounts made by Mr. H. G. Martin during the course of his discussion with the defendant on these matters and attached to the said file of working papers. (J) The draft tax computation relating to the said draft account prepared by the defendant and his notes and comments written thereon. (K) The private ledgers of 'the client company' containing entries for the year ended Aug. 31, 1951."

It seems clear that "possession or power" for the purposes of an order for production under the Rules of the Supreme Court, Ord. 31, r. 14, as distinct from inclusion in an affidavit of documents under r. 12 of the same order, does not mean actual corporeal possession irrespective of legal ownership, but sole legal possession conferring on the party against whom production is sought a right and power to deal with the document in question. Thus, a party will not be ordered to produce a document which, though in his actual corporeal or physical possession, belongs wholly to a third party or to a third party jointly with himself: see Kearsley v. Philips (1) (10 Q.B.D. 36 and 465). It follows that no order for production could properly be made in respect of the private ledgers of the client company comprised in items (F) and (K) above, for these are clearly the property of the client company and not of the plaintiffs. This is recognised by the defendant, who makes no claim to production in respect of items (F) and (K).

We have no note of the learned judge's reasons for deciding that the remainder of the documents listed above should not be produced, but we were told by counsel that his decision was based on Gibbon v. Pease (2), where it was held that the plans prepared by an architect employed by a building owner to carry out alterations to certain houses were the property of the building owner. It would seem, therefore, that the learned judge took the view that the working papers, drafts, notes, calculations, and typed final accounts, brought into being by the plaintiffs in the course of, or as preliminaries to, the auditing of the client company's accounts and the ascertainment of its tax liability, were by parity of reasoning the property of the client company, and, accordingly, that on the principle above stated the plaintiffs should not be compelled to produce them. The ratio decidendi in Gibbon v. Pease (2) is thus stated by SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R. ([1905] 1 K.B. 813):

“In my opinion the contract in this case resulted in the making of plans the property in which passed to the building owner on payment of the remuneration provided under the contract. I find a difficulty in distinguishing this case from that of a contract to paint a picture or to design a coat of arms, as to which no question of ownership could arise.”

A There are, however, other cases, to which we understand the learned judge was not referred, in which a different conclusion was reached in circumstances bearing a closer resemblance to those of the present case. In Leicestershire County Council v. Michael Faraday & Partners, Ltd. (3) rating valuers were employed by a county council for five years to give advice and assistance in connection with the valuation of hereditaments in the council's area, and at the termination of the five years' agreement the council claimed to be entitled to all documents, books, maps and plans which had been prepared by or had come into the possession of the valuers in the course of, or for the purpose of, the performance of their duties. The Court of Appeal (affirming the decision of MACNAGHTEN, J.) rejected this claim, and held that the relationship between the county council and the valuers was that of client and professional man and not that of principal and agent; that the documents which the valuers had prepared in carrying out their expert work were their own property; and that, as the agreement did not contain any provision requiring the valuers to hand over the documents to the plaintiffs, they were not bound to hand them over. In an earlier case of London School Board v. Northcroft (4) (of which approval was expressed in the Leicestershire County Council case (3)), a similar conclusion was reached by A. L. SMITH, J., with respect to certain papers of calculations and memoranda prepared by quantity surveyors in the course of their employment by building owners on work which they had duly completed.

D Having regard to these two authorities we think the proper conclusion in the present case is that (apart from the correspondence with the Inland Revenue comprised in item (E), to which we will return) all the documents listed above, other than the client company's ledgers, are the property of the plaintiffs. This conclusion is not, we think, displaced by Ex p. Horsfall (5), to which we were also referred, where drafts and copies of deeds prepared by an attorney were held to be the property of the client. The case proceeded on the short ground (per LORD TENTERDEN, C.J. (7 B. & C. 528)) that: “He who pays for the drafts, etc., by law has a right to the possession of them”, and was, we think, rightly explained by counsel for the defendant as turning on the nature of the services rendered by an attorney or solicitor and the system on which he is remunerated for those services. Even in the case of a solicitor there must, we should have thought, be instances of memoranda, notes, etc., made by him for his own information in the course of his business which remain his property, although brought into existence in connection with work done for clients.

E It was, however, contended for the plaintiffs that, even though these documents were the plaintiffs' own property, they should not be ordered to be produced, because they embodied information which was the subject of professional confidence as between the plaintiffs and the client company and their production, and the consequent disclosure of their contents would be a breach by the plaintiffs of their duty to the client company. Outside the area of legal professional privilege, which is not in question here, we do not think this is a sufficient ground for refusing an order for production. In BRAY ON DISCOVERY (1885), at p. 194, we find this general proposition :

H “It is no ground for resisting production that a person not before the court has an interest in the document: Kettlewell v. Barstow (6) (7 Ch. App. 693); unless it is an interest in the nature of property.”

In developing this proposition, at p. 206 the learned author says that

“the mere fact that the giving of the discovery will involve a breach of confidence as against some third person or in any way affect or prejudice his interests does not constitute of itself an independent objection to giving the discovery, a disclosure under the compulsion of the court being for this purpose distinguished from a voluntary disclosure out of court.”

Applying this statement of the law to the present case we think that (apart from the correspondence with the Inland Revenue) all the documents above listed (other than the ledgers) should be produced, but we think the order should be made on an undertaking by the defendant and the defendant's solicitors not to divulge their contents to any person otherwise than for the purposes of the present litigation and not to use the information contained therein for any collateral purpose. As to the correspondence with the Inland Revenue, this presumably comprises letters received from the Inland Revenue and copies of letters written to the Inland Revenue. In conducting this correspondence the plaintiffs must, as it seems to us, have been acting as agents for the client company for the purpose of settling with the Inland Revenue the client company's tax liability. In the Leicestershire County Council case (3) MACKINNON, L.J., distinguished that case from cases such as Gibbon v. Pease (2) in these words ([1941] 2 All E.R. 487):

“I think that those cases were radically different, in that they were cases concerned with the relative rights and duties of principal and agent. If an agent brings into existence certain documents while in the employment of his principal, they are the principal's documents, and the principal can claim that the agent should hand them over.”

We are, accordingly, of the opinion that these letters (both the copies of those sent and the originals of those received) should be considered as the property of the client company with the result that on the principle above stated the plaintiffs should not be ordered to produce them. Accordingly, with the exception we have just stated, we would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Re WOLFFE'S WILL TRUSTS. SHAPLEY v. WOLFFE AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), May 21, 22, 1953.]

Will—Condition—Condition or limitation—Alternative limitation—Performance of condition precedent sole object of bequest—Impossibility of condition—Gift of fund “on marriage to a person of the Jewish faith and the child of Jewish parents”—Failure of gift.

By her will dated Oct. 12, 1923, a testatrix, who died on Sept. 23, 1924, gave her residuary estate to her trustees on trust for sale and directed them to hold in trust the sum of £600 to be invested and to pay the income thereof to her daughter A.C. for life and on her death to pay the income to her grand-daughter R.C. during her spinsterhood and on her marriage “to a person of the Jewish faith and the child of Jewish parents to transfer to her” the investments representing the £600. Subject thereto, she gave her residuary estate to the trustees to divide the same equally between her three children, naming them, absolutely, “Provided always that if my grand-daughter [R.C.] shall marry a person not of the Jewish faith and not the son of parents of the Jewish faith then . . . my trustees . . . shall not transfer to her the investments . . . representing the said sum of £600 but shall transfer to her one-sixth of such investments . . . only . . .” The trustees were further directed in that event to sell the remaining five-sixths and divide the proceeds equally between two of the children of the testatrix. On Oct. 1, 1927, R.C. married a man neither of the Jewish faith nor of Jewish parentage, and in January, 1948, during the lifetime of A.C., and with her consent, the investments representing the £600 were transferred to R.C. absolutely. On a summons to determine whether that payment had been rightly made,

HELD: the gift of the capital of the fund to R.C. on “her marriage to a person of the Jewish faith and the child of Jewish parents” was a limitation which had not taken effect and did not constitute a condition, and the proviso was an alternative limitation which had taken effect; but even if the terms of the gift of the capital of the fund to R.C. constituted a condition precedent, the condition was void for uncertainty because it was impossible of performance, and as the performance of the condition was the sole motive of the bequest, and its impossibility was unknown to the testatrix, the invalidity of the condition caused the failure of the gift; and, therefore, whether the terms of the gift of capital to R.C. constituted a limitation or a condition precedent, the gift was not effective, and the fund passed under the proviso, and, accordingly, the payment had been made to R.C. in error, she being entitled only to one-sixth thereof.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix, Augusta Wolffe, and in the events which had happened, the legacy of £600 on the death of Annie Cohen, the daughter of the testatrix (i) became payable to the second defendant, Rosa Hill, formerly Rosa Cohen, the daughter of Annie Cohen, absolutely, or (ii) became payable as to one-sixth thereof only to the second defendant and as to the remainder became divisible between the plaintiff, Walter Thomas Shapley, as assignee of Jacob Wolffe, the son of the testatrix, and the testatrix's daughter, Ruth Merritt, or (iii) fell into the residuary estate of the testatrix and became divisible in thirds between the estate of the said Annie Cohen, Ruth Merritt and the plaintiff as assignee of the said Jacob Wolffe.

By her will dated Oct. 12, 1923, a testatrix, Augusta Wolffe, appointed one Moss Wolffe her executor and trustee, and, after making certain specific and pecuniary bequests, she gave, devised and bequeathed all her property, of whatsoever nature, to her trustees on the usual trusts for sale. After giving certain administrative directions, she directed her trustees " . . . to hold in trust the sum of £600 to be invested . . . and to pay the income thereof to my . . . daughter Annie Cohen during her life . . . and upon her death to pay the said income to my grand-daughter Rosa Cohen [daughter of the said Annie Cohen] during her spinsterhood and upon the marriage of the said Rosa Cohen to a person of the Jewish faith and the child of Jewish parents to transfer to her the said investments and securities representing the said sum of £600 subject however to the proviso hereinafter set forth And subject as aforesaid I give devise and bequeath the residue of my estate . . . and after reserving the said sum of £600 . . . to my trustees to divide the same in equal proportions among my said three children Annie Cohen Ruth Merritt and Jacob Wolffe absolutely Provided always that if . . . Rosa Cohen shall marry a person not of the Jewish faith and not the son of parents of the Jewish faith then in that event my trustees . . . shall not transfer to her the investments or securities representing the said sum of £600 but shall transfer to her one-sixth of such investments or securities only and no more and shall sell the residue of the said investments or securities and divide the proceeds thereof between my said son Jacob Wolffe and my said daughter Ruth Merritt equally . . . "

The testatrix died on Sept. 23, 1924, and on Oct. 1, 1927, Rosa Cohen married Cecil Harold Hill who was not of the Jewish faith or a child of Jewish parents. By a deed dated Apr. 6, 1937, Jacob Wolffe assigned his interest in the £600 or the investments representing the same to the plaintiff, Walter Thomas Shapley. By a deed of release and indemnity dated Dec. 1, 1947, made between Rosa Hill, Moss Wolffe and Annie Cohen, Annie Cohen released her life interest in the investments representing the balance of the £600 and the investments were transferred to Rosa Hill in January, 1948. Annie Cohen died in September, 1949, and Moss Wolffe died on Oct. 30, 1950. On Mar. 8, 1951, letters of administration to his estate were granted to his widow, the first defendant, Florence May Wolffe.

M. Browne for the plaintiff, the assignee of the interest of Jacob Wolffe.

G. B. H. Dillon for the second defendant, Rosa Hill.

The first defendant, Florence May Wolffe, legal personal representative of Moss Wolffe, was not represented.

HARMAN, J. (having stated the facts): It will be observed that there is a gift to Rosa during spinsterhood. There is no further gift of income to her, but there is a gift to her of the capital of the fund on her marriage to a person of the Jewish faith and the child of Jewish parents. That is the only event in which she is to have the capital. Of course, if she had remained a spinster, she would have continued to enjoy the income during the rest of her life, and the residuary bequest would then have operated on her death. The testatrix has, therefore, dealt with the fund if Rosa lives and dies a spinster, and with the case of Rosa marrying one of Jewish faith and parentage, but not further. By the proviso she proceeds to fill the gap, which, she conceives, can arise only if Rosa marries a person not of the Jewish faith and not the son of Jewish parents. In that case, Rosa is to have only £100 and the other £500 is to go to her aunt and uncle.

This case seems to be the first of its kind. There is no question here, as I see it, of a vested life interest in Rosa, cut down by a proviso in the form of a condition subsequent. If it be a condition at all, this is a condition precedent, and it seems to me that considerations entirely different from those in the case of conditions subsequent apply. It is now well known, since the decision of the House of Lords in Clayton v. Ramsden (1), that a condition of defeasance on an estate or interest by way of condition subsequent on marriage to a person not of the Jewish faith and not of Jewish parents is bad, since it is too uncertain, and, being too uncertain, the condition subsequent fails and the gift remains. The legatee can, therefore, take the benefit without complying with the condition. That principle does not apply to conditions precedent, for there the legatee must qualify for the gift, and she can qualify only by marrying a person of Jewish faith and parentage. It may be that that is something which, in the eye of the law, she cannot do. It is said, therefore, that this is a condition precedent which is impossible to fulfil and should, therefore, be rejected. I do not follow that argument. If one rejects the condition, there is no gift. There is no gift to her on her marriage, but only a gift to her on her marriage to a person of Jewish faith and parentage, and it seems to me that, on the true view, this is not a condition but a limitation which fails. I see, therefore, no limitation on Rosa's interest in the events which have happened. Moreover, I regard the proviso which follows the residuary gift as really an alternative limitation in these words: "If the condition I have imposed be not fulfilled, then, in the alternative, I give it over in another way". I think I have authority for construing the will in that way in Re Wilkinson (2) before TOMLIN, J. There the bequest was of a fund to be paid to the niece so long as she resided in a certain house, and then, if she ceased voluntarily to reside in the house, the fund was to go over. TOMLIN, J., held that there was nothing bad in those limitations on the face of them. In the event, having regard to the word "voluntarily", he concluded that the lady might not be bound if obliged by the duties of her husband to live elsewhere. That does not affect the way he construed the will. He says ([1926] Ch. 848):

"When I come to examine the language of this will, I am satisfied that I am not dealing with a case of a gift cut down by a condition subsequent, but that I am dealing with a case of limitation. The language of the gift is 'pay the income . . . to my niece . . . (in order to enable her to reside . . .) for and during the term of her natural life or until she shall voluntarily cease to make the . . . dwelling-house her permanent home'. If the clause had paused there, I feel great difficulty in appreciating what argument could have been addressed to me to suggest that that was other than a limitation similar to the ordinary limitation to a woman for life, or until she shall marry again. But it is said, and said truly, that in construing these words, I must read the clause as a whole. And it is contended that when I go on to find the direction that after her death the trustees shall hold the sum of £7,000 in trust as she shall appoint, and that in default of appointment this sum shall fall into residue followed by the proviso 'Provided however that in the event of my said niece voluntarily ceasing to make the said dwelling-house her permanent home as aforesaid I direct that the said sum of £7,000 and the investments representing the same shall fall into 'residue, I must in some way modify my view of the earlier language, and read it as though it were a gift to her for life, with a condition subsequent that her interest shall cease if at any time she voluntarily ceases to make the dwelling-house her permanent home. I am unable to follow that argument. The scheme of the clause seems to me to be reasonably plain. There is, first of all, a limitation of the income to her for life, or until the happening of the named event. The next branch of the clause, as I read it, deals with the alternative, of her death without having ceased to occupy the house, and then the proviso deals with the other alternative of her ceasing to reside in the house. The words 'provided however' seem to me to mean nothing more than 'but in the other alternative'."

Those words seem to me to fit very well the form of the will here, but, supposing I am wrong about that, it is not even suggested here that this can be read as a condition subsequent, and rightly, because there is no suggestion of a gift to the lady of the income for anything more than her spinsterhood. Suppose, then, that this be a condition precedent. It is a condition which, having regard to the state of the law, is impossible. It is not said to be contrary to the policy of the law, but it is argued that an impossible condition will not be insisted on having regard to the ecclesiastical law on the subject inherited by the Court of Chancery.

B

Both ROMER, J., and myself have recently given judgments independently on this subject, and I am glad to say that, although his case was not cited to me, our judgments seem to be congruous. The case before ROMER, J., was Re Piper (3), and the case before me was Re Elliott (4). We both cited a passage from the judgment of COTTON, L.J. (39 Ch.D. 128) in Re Moore (5), which he took from JARMAN ON WILLS, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 12:

D

"The rule is thus stated by MR. JARMAN: 'But with respect to legacies out of personal estate, the civil law, which in this respect has been adopted by courts of equity, differs in some respects from the common law in its treatment of conditions precedent; the rule of the civil law being that where a condition precedent is originally impossible, or is made so by the act or default of the testator, or is illegal as involving malum prohibitum, the bequest is absolute, just as if the condition had been subsequent. But where the performance of the condition is the sole motive of the bequest, or its impossibility was unknown to the testator, or the condition which was possible in its creation has since become impossible by the act of God, or where it is illegal as involving malum in se, in these cases the civil agrees with the common law in holding both gift and condition void'."

If I apply that passage, as both ROMER, J., and I did in those decisions in Re Piper (3) and Re Elliott (4), I feel that the condition here exactly complies with the second sentence: the performance of the condition seems to me to have been the sole motive of the bequest. Furthermore, the impossibility of the performance of the condition must have been, as I see it, unknown to the testatrix; no testator would ever guess that one cannot marry a Jew in the eyes of the law, and it is only by reasoning from the peculiar doctrine which covers conditions subsequent that it is impossible to say whether a man is a Jew or of Jewish parentage. Those who select scholars for Jewish charitable scholarships have no difficulty at all. It is not to be supposed that the testatrix knew that it was an impossible condition, and, therefore, as she only posed one which, having regard to the highest authority, I must hold to be impossible, the condition goes and the gift goes with it. It is then argued in the interest of residue that if in law you cannot say that a man is a Jew, so you cannot say that a man is not. I find it very difficult to believe that if a man marries a woman of pure Zulu parents, anyone can say that she is a Jewess of Jewish parents; at some point there comes a limit on these things, and that is reached. When I come to the proviso, and I find this:

"If my grand-daughter . . . shall marry a person not of the Jewish faith and not the son of parents of the Jewish faith",

I cannot see any difficulty. She has married and nobody suggests that the person she married satisfied those conditions. In that event, the trustees were not to transfer to her more than one-sixth of the investments representing the £600. The result is that on her marriage the fund became payable as to one-sixth to Rosa Hill and the remainder became divisible between Jacob and Ruth Merritt in equal shares. Order accordingly.

EVANS v. JONES.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 16, 1953.]

Food and Drugs—Milk—Adulteration—Milk of good quality after addition of water.

The respondent was charged with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser milk which was not of the quality demanded, contrary to the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 3 (1). Samples taken of the milk were found to contain added water, but there was no evidence to show who had added the water, and analysis showed a deficiency in milk-solids other than milk-fat under the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1939, reg. 2. The magistrates found that, even though water was present, the milk was still good milk in that the percentage of fat-solids exceeded the percentage prescribed by reg. 1 of the regulations of 1939 and that the offence was trivial, and they dismissed the informations.

HELD: offences of watering milk were not to be regarded as trivial; in the present case the offence had been proved; and, therefore, the magistrates had no power to dismiss the summons, but they must convict, and, if they thought the offence trivial, grant a conditional or an absolute discharge under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7 (1).

(1) Banks v. Wooler, (1900), 81 L.T. 785; 64 J.P. 245; 25 Digest 128, 497.

CASE STATED by Montgomery justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Machynlleth on Feb. 4, 1953, the appellant, Evan Walter Evans, an inspector of food and drugs for the county of Montgomery, preferred two informations against Alfred Lewis Jones, a dairy farmer, charging that on Dec. 10 and Dec. 12, 1952, he unlawfully sold to the prejudice of the purchaser, the Milk Marketing Board, milk which was not of the quality demanded by the purchaser, contrary to the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 3 (1).

It was proved or admitted that on Dec. 10, 1952, the respondent supplied milk from his farm in pursuance, or purported pursuance, of a written contract between himself and the Milk Marketing Board and of a written direction made thereunder, to a milk retailer, Meirion Lewis, which was from the previous evening's milking and had been kept overnight at the farm. On the same day the appellant purchased a pint of the milk from the retailer for the purpose of analysing it. The retailer knew that a sample of the milk would be taken for analysis and he did not tamper with it or add any water or other milk to it. The public analyst found in his certificate of analysis under s. 69 (3) of the Act that, calculated on the standard of 8.5 per cent. for solids not fat, the milk contained added water to the extent of nine per cent. of the bulk, and that it contained 7.7 per cent. solids not fat and 4.6 per cent. fat-solids. On Dec. 12, 1952, the appellant, together with the retailer, visited the respondent's farm and found there two churns of milk awaiting collection by the retailer. One of the churns contained milk from the previous evening's milking and the other contained milk from that morning's milking. The appellant took samples of approximately one pint from each churn for analysis. The public analyst found that the previous evening's milk, calculated on the standard of 8.5 per cent. for solids not fat, contained added water to the extent of four per cent. of the bulk, and that it contained 8.2 per cent. solids not fat and 4.4 per cent. fat-solids. The sample from the morning's milk was found to be pure and unadulterated, containing the prescribed quantities of non-fat and fat-solids. The respondent did not require the public analyst to be called as a witness nor did he call as witnesses his sister-in-law and a manservant who both handled milk which was left at the farm overnight. Apart from the fact that water was present in both the samples of the evening milk, it was good milk, notwithstanding that in each case the percentage of milk-solids other than milk-fat was below the percentage of 8.5 per cent. prescribed in the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1417), reg. 2. There was no evidence to show who had added the water to the milk. The appellant had known the respondent since 1937, had carried out previous tests on his milk from time to time, and had found no cause for complaint.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the milk in both cases, notwithstanding its good quality in that the percentage of fat-solids exceeded the prescribed percentages, was sold to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of s. 3 (1) of the Act as it was not of the quality demanded by virtue of the addition of the water, and that the respondent had failed to rebut the presumption laid down in reg. 2 of the regulations of 1939 that the milk was not genuine since it contained less than 8.5 per cent. of milk-solids other than milk-fat. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that both samples of milk were of very good quality and that the purchaser was not prejudiced, notwithstanding the unexplained presence of a small quantity of water therein.

The justices dismissed the informations and the appellant appealed.

Ahern for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

PARKER, J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Montgomery before whom the respondent was charged with two offences under s. 3 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, in that he sold milk that was adulterated or was not genuine milk. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The magistrates held that, although no attempt had been made, by calling the sister-in-law or the manservant, to prove that the milk was in the same state as when it came from the cow, nevertheless it was, by reason, presumably, of the content of fat-solids, very good quality milk, and that the presence of water in the quantities proved did not make its sale prejudicial to the purchaser. There is ample authority for holding that where the purchaser does not get what he demands, which here was genuine milk, the sale is to his prejudice, but the magistrates, apparently, held that, as the milk was still good, the offence was trivial, and so they were entitled to dismiss it. They did that in reliance on the decision of Banks v. Wooler (1), decided under the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 6, where CHANNELL, J., said (81 L.T. 785):

"If the milk had been exceptionally good after adulteration, the justices might have considered the offence too trifling to convict. If the milk had only been exceptionally good before adulteration, the offence was not trifling, and they should have convicted."

- That case, however, was decided before the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1939, and the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. The summons was dismissed under s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which empowered justices to dismiss a summons in the case of a trifling offence. Whatever was thought in 1900 as to the gravity or triviality of selling milk with an adulteration of ten per cent., it seems to me that, today, any adulteration of milk is far from being a trivial offence. Indeed, if one takes CHANNELL, J.'s words literally, they mean that the richer the milk the more you are entitled to adulterate it and treat the matter as a triviality.
- In my opinion, an offence was clearly proved here. By reason of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7 (1), the magistrates might, if they considered the offence trivial, have granted either a conditional or an absolute discharge after finding the offence proved, but they have confused matters of defence with matters of mitigation and have failed to convict when an offence was clearly proved. Whether the matter is to be considered trivial or not is for the magistrates to decide, but because in 1900 an adulteration of ten per cent. of water was treated as trivial it does not follow that it is the same today. In my opinion, this case should go back with a direction to the magistrates to convict.

DONOVAN, J.: I agree. It should be remembered that a great deal of public money is spent on milk today under the provisions of the various welfare schemes. That would appear to me to underline the importance of not regarding adulteration by water as trivial.

- LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree. I only want once more to emphasise how careful magistrates should be not to confuse matters of defence with matters of mitigation. In Banks v. Wooler (1) the passage on which the magistrates relied only showed that in the days when s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was in force magistrates, if they thought a case trivial, were required to dismiss it. They are no longer required to dismiss a case which they consider trivial. They must convict, but they can grant an absolute discharge or a conditional discharge under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7 (1). In spite of the fact that one of the judges who decided Banks v. Wooler (1) was CHANNELL, J., for whose judgments I always have the highest respect, I certainly cannot agree that, if I buy milk and am served with milk and water, that is a trivial offence. PARKER, J., has pointed out that it would mean the better the milk the greater the adulteration permitted. No adulteration is permitted today, and here there is clear evidence that there was adulteration. In my opinion, the magistrates cannot treat this as a trivial case. On the question of penalty, I think the magistrates must pay attention to what this court has said in giving judgment today, that these offences of watering milk are not to be regarded as trivial merely because the result of the adulterated milk will give the purchaser the butter-fat he is entitled to get.

POPE v. CLARKE.

Street Traffic—Notice of intended prosecution—Time of alleged offence wrongly stated—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 21 (c).

On Dec. 4, 1952, a collision took place between a motor car driven by the respondent and a lorry. A notice of an intention to prosecute him for dangerous driving was sent to him by registered post under s. 21 (c) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. In the notice the intended charge and the date and place of the collision were correctly stated, but the time of the alleged offence was inserted incorrectly.

Held: the provision in s. 21 (c) that a notice of intended prosecution should be served on a defendant was mandatory, but the provision with regard to the specification of the time of the alleged offence was only directory; the purpose of the notice was to call the respondent's attention to the fact that he was to be prosecuted while the circumstances were still fresh in his mind; that purpose had been fulfilled; and, therefore, the incorrect statement as to the time of the collision did not invalidate the notice.

CASE STATED by Essex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Brentwood on Jan. 29, 1953, the appellant, Walter Steven Pope, a superintendent of police, preferred an information against the respondent, Harry William James Clarke, charging that, on Dec. 4, 1952, on a road at Great Warley, Essex, he unlawfully drove a motor vehicle in a manner dangerous to the public having regard to all the circumstances of the case, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1).

It was proved or admitted that on Dec. 4, 1952, at about 11.15 a.m., a collision occurred on the road leading from Brook Street, Brentwood, to Ingrave at Mascalls Lane, Great Warley, at the junction with Warley Hill, between a motor car, driven by the respondent, and a motor lorry. The appellant alleged that the circumstances of the respondent's driving immediately before the collision constituted the offence to which the information related. The respondent was not warned at the time of the alleged offence that the question of prosecuting him for an offence of reckless, dangerous, or careless driving would be taken into consideration, and the summons for the alleged offence was not served on him within fourteen days of the commission of the alleged offence, but a notice of intended prosecution was sent to him by registered post in accordance with the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21 (c).

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the provisions of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21 (c), stipulated that the notice of intended prosecution must specify, inter alia, the time at which the offence was alleged to have been committed, that those provisions must be strictly complied with, that that had not been done because the time of the alleged offence was proved to have been at or about 11.15 a.m. on Dec. 4, 1952, whereas the notice stated it as 1.15 p.m., and that, therefore, the notice was invalid and the information bad. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the time was sufficiently specified in the notice by the statement of the date, namely, Dec. 4, 1952, the statement of the hour being unnecessary and superfluous. The purpose of the notice, being to call the respondent's attention to the time and circumstances in respect of which he might be charged, had been fulfilled, and the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21 (c), had been substantially and sufficiently complied with. Therefore, the notice was adequate and valid.

The justices dismissed the information and the appellant appealed.

Moules for the appellant.

Jellinek for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Essex, before whom the respondent was charged with the offence of driving a motor vehicle in a manner dangerous to the public, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 11 (1). [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] By some mistake the police put in the notice 1.15 p.m. instead of 11.15 a.m. The notice said:

" . . . I hereby give you notice that it is intended to institute proceedings against you in respect of an offence under s. 11 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the particulars being that, at or about 1.15 p.m. on Thursday, Dec. 4, 1952, whilst driving Austin motor car, Index No. KGH 521, on the road leading from Brook Street, Brentwood, to Ingrave at Mascalls Lane, Great Warley, at the junction with Warley Hill, you did drive the said motor car in a manner which was dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case."

As I said in Venn v. Morgan (1) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 563), in considering whether a notice purporting to be given under s. 21 is sufficient, we ought to use a modicum of common sense. OLIVER, J., in giving judgment in that case, pointed out that these notices are not formal documents like informations or indictments. He said (ibid., 564):

" The object of the notice is to call the attention of the driver of the motor car to the time and circumstances in respect of which he may be charged so as to give him . . . an opportunity, in good time while memories are still fresh, to prepare his defence."

In my opinion, the principle we have to bear in mind here is that there is a distinction between the construction to be placed on provisions of a statute which are mandatory and provisions which are merely directory. In that connection I may quote a passage from MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 10th ed., p. 376:

" It has been said that no rule can be laid down for determining whether the command [of the statute] is to be considered as a mere direction or instruction involving no invalidating consequence in its disregard, or as imperative, with an implied nullification for disobedience, beyond the fundamental one that it depends on the scope and object of the enactment. It may, perhaps, be found generally correct to say that nullification is the natural and usual consequence of disobedience, but the question is in the main governed by considerations of convenience and justice (R. v. Ingall (2) 2 Q.B.D. 208, per LUSH, J.), and, when that result would involve general inconvenience or injustice to innocent persons, or advantage to those guilty of the neglect, without promoting the real aim and object of the enactment, such an intention is not to be attributed to the legislature. The whole scope and purpose of the statute under consideration must be regarded. The general rule is, that an absolute enactment must be obeyed or fulfilled exactly, but it is sufficient if a directory enactment be obeyed or fulfilled substantially."

In Woodward v. Sarsons (3) LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., giving the judgment of the court, said (L.R. 10 C.P. 746):

"... the general rule is, that an absolute enactment must be obeyed or fulfilled exactly, but it is sufficient if a directory enactment be obeyed or fulfilled substantially."

That was a case dealing with the marking by a presiding officer of ballot papers for illiterate voters under r. 26 of the Rules for Parliamentary Elections in sched. I to the Ballot Act, 1872, which, it was said, was absolute. The rules were held to be directory, and disregard of their provisions was held not to invalidate the votes provided that the object of the Act was obtained, that is to say, the effect of the voting was kept secret. Here, the object of the Act, as OLIVER, J., said in the passage I have read, is to bring to the defendant's mind, when the events are still fresh in his memory, the fact that he is going to be prosecuted. The respondent could have been under no conceivable doubt what he was to be prosecuted for. He was told the exact place where he was alleged to have committed the offence, and that was the place where the accident happened. Therefore, it is idle to say that his mind was not at once directed to the actual occurrence in respect of which he was going to be prosecuted. In my opinion, we should apply the passage I have quoted from Woodward v. Sarsons (3) and say that the mandatory part of s. 21 (c) is the serving of a notice of intended prosecution on the defendant specifying the nature of the offence in respect of which he is going to be prosecuted. Here that offence was dangerous driving at the place mentioned, and the mere fact that the actual hour was incorrectly stated in the circumstances makes no difference. If a person met with two accidents on the same day at or about the same place, possibly other considerations might apply, because he might then say he was misled. Here the respondent, on whom was the onus of showing he was misled, gave no evidence.

In my opinion, the justices came to a wrong decision. The case must go back to them with an expression of opinion that the notice was good, and they must proceed to hear the case.

DONOVAN, J.: I also agree.

Power of Appointment—Fraudulent exercise—Purchase of appointee's interest by appointor—Appointor and appointee in relationship of parent and child.

A Where an appointor and appointee stand in the relationship of parent and child and the appointor who appoints in favour of the child then purchases the interest of that child there is no inflexible rule that the transaction is a fraud on the power. The court must, in each case, inquire what is the purpose and intention of the appointor, and if, and only if, it appears from the evidence that the appointor's object was to secure a benefit for himself or for a non-object of the power is the transaction to be held invalid.

E ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, (i) whether the defendant, Gladys Wilson, had under or by virtue of the joint effects of (a) her execution of a deed-poll of appointment dated June 16, 1952 (being an irrevocable appointment by her, subject to her own life interest therein, of all the trust funds subject to the trusts of a settlement dated May 5, 1908, to her daughters the second and third defendants, in equal shares), and (b) the subsequent purchase by herself on or before July 1, 1952, of the whole of the reversionary interest of each of her said daughters under the said settlement, become the sole and beneficial owner of the whole of the said trust fund; and (ii) whether and to what extent the power of appointment by the said settlement given to the said Gladys Wilson had been validly exercised by the said deed of appointment and whether and to what extent she had by virtue of the joint effect of the execution thereof and the said subsequent purchase acquired a beneficial title in possession to the said trust fund.

G By the terms of the settlement dated May 5, 1908, the trustees were directed, inter alia, to pay the income of the trust fund to the defendant Gladys Wilson for life and after her decease "and subject to the power of appointment in favour of any husband of hers thereafter contained" to hold the trust fund in trust

H "for such of the issue of Gladys Wilson . . . as she may at any time by any deed or deeds with or without power of revocation . . . appoint and in default of appointment in trust for all her children . . . in equal shares."

By the deed-poll of appointment dated June 16, 1952, after a recital that Gladys Wilson was desirous of making such irrevocable appointment in favour of her daughters, Rosemary Helen Blake Tyler and Diana Mary Erica Bridgeman, the second and third defendants, the said Gladys Wilson appointed that the trust fund subject to the trusts of the settlement should (subject to her life interest therein) be held in trust for the second and third defendants in equal shares, free and discharged from the power in favour of any husband conferred on her by the trusts of the settlement. On or before July 1, 1952, Gladys Wilson purchased the reversionary interests of the second and third defendants respectively. The fourth defendant, Ralph Minto Wilson, the son of Gladys Wilson, who was under a disability and in whose favour she had made no appointment, was interested in one-third of the trust fund in default of appointment. It appeared from the evidence that Gladys Wilson had made generous provision for the fourth defendant, the aggregate amount of the capital sums so provided exceeding the amount provided for the second and third defendants.

H. A. Rose for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee.

Bathurst, Q.C., and N. C. Armitage for the first defendant.

W. F. Waite for the second and third defendants.

Tonge for the fourth defendant.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This summons raises the short and, to my mind, simple question whether or not there is ground for saying that the appointment followed by the purchase constitute an invalid transaction. It can be held to be an invalid transaction, and even then only partially invalid, only if it can be shown that there is some inflexible rule established by the authorities that where the appointor and the appointee stand in the relationship of parent and child the appointor who appoints in favour of the child and then purchases the interest of the child cannot benefit thereby beyond the interest which the child would have in the fund had the appointment never been made.

Counsel for the fourth defendant, that is, the son under a disability, was constrained at the outset to say that he was unable successfully to challenge this transaction. He directed my attention to three modern authorities, to two of which I propose shortly to refer. The first was Vatcher v. Paull (1), in the course of his speech in which case LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON said ([1915] A.C. 378):

"The term fraud in connection with frauds on a power does not necessarily denote any conduct on the part of the appointor amounting to fraud in the common law meaning of the term or any conduct which could be properly termed dishonest or immoral. It merely means that the power has been exercised for a purpose, or with an intention, beyond the scope of or not justified by the instrument creating the power. Perhaps the most common instance of this is where the exercise is due to some bargain between the appointor and appointee, whereby the appointor, or some other person not an object of the power, is to derive a benefit. But such a bargain is not essential. It is enough that the appointor's purpose and intention is to secure a benefit for himself, or some other person not an object of the power."

It appears to me that that is a clear direction to the court in each case to inquire what is the purpose and intention of the appointor, and if, and only if, it appears from the evidence that the object was to secure a benefit for himself or for some other person not an object of the power is the transaction to be held invalid. Those words of LORD PARKER direct that the courts shall embark on that inquiry, and they are, therefore, the reverse of words which are apt to establish or recognise the existence of any inflexible rule.

The other case to which I desire to refer is Re Dick (2), in the Court of Appeal. In that case, SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in the course of his judgment, quoted the words of LORD PARKER which I have just read, and continued ([1953] 1 All E.R. 563):

"I should not wish to be thought to lay it down that whenever there is any intention, however much secreted in the bosom of the appointor, that some non-object will be in some measure benefited, therefore, the exercise of the power is bad. After all, although the phrase 'fraud on the power' does not carry the sense of deceit which the word 'fraud' bears in other contexts, still it indicates the doing of something which is not right, using those words in their broad sense—at least, a deliberate defeating of what the donor of the power has authorised and intended."

A Those words appear to me again to recognise the duty of the court to embark on the inquiry to which I have referred and are inconsistent with any inflexible rule that the mere circumstance that the appointor, standing in the relation of parent to the appointee, purchases the appointee's share thereby does something which vitiates to any extent the transaction. That is the state of the modern authorities.

B There are two old authorities to which my attention was directed. Smith v. Lord Camelford, Lord Camelford v. Smith (3) was the first. In the course of the judgment in that case this observation appears (2 Ves. 714):

"Even a well executed appointment could not take from her one moiety; for though he could entitle himself to all Lady Camelford could claim, it could be only to that she could claim absolutely against the other daughter.

C He could not make an appointment in truth beneficial to himself: but in truth he has not."

The sidenote against that passage is:

"A father having power to appoint among children and purchasing the share of one cannot by appointment entitle himself to more than the share of that child in default of appointment."

D That sidenote is only explained by the passage from the judgment to which I have referred and cannot be regarded as any authority for the proposition that there is any such inflexible rule as that to which I have referred. Even if there could be extracted from the context any such inflexible rule, then, in my view, such a rule would have to give way to the modern authorities and, particularly, to the overriding authority of the speech of LORD PARKER in the House of Lords ([1915] A.C. 378).

Finally, in Noel v. Lord Walsingham (4), the headnote is (2 Sim. & St. 99):

"A father being tenant for life under his marriage settlement, with power to appoint the shares in which his younger children were to take a sum to be raised for their portions, having exercised the power by his will, afterwards made a provision for one of his daughters, took a release from her of her portion, and by a codicil revoked the appointment in his will, so far as it respected her. Held, that her share did not sink into the freehold, or belong to his residuary legatee, but that the other younger children were entitled to the whole fund."

G At the beginning of his judgment SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., said (ibid., 110):

"Mr. Paul Cobb Methuen [the settlor] became the purchaser of the £3,000 which he had appointed to Lady Walsingham; and that sum not being more than her equal aliquot share of the £15,000, it might be difficult to question the validity of that appointment or purchase, if the interest of any party required it . . ."

H That passage appears to be the key to the rest of the judgment and it is couched in language which is quite inconsistent, on examination, with there being any such inflexible rule as that to which I have referred. It, therefore, appears to me that the two older authorities are not inconsistent with the modern authorities. In each case there must be the inquiry by the court, and the court is free as a result of that inquiry to come to such conclusion as appears to be right, being guided only by the principle stated by LORD PARKER ([1915] A.C. 378). The court has to ask itself what was the appointor's purpose and intention. Was it to secure a benefit for himself or for some person not an object of the trust? If the answer is "Yes", there is vice, and if the answer is "No", there is no vice.

In this case I come, without hesitation, to the conclusion that, on the evidence and in the light of the instruction to be derived from these cases, the transaction was entirely valid. It was effective to pass the whole of the interest in the fund to the two daughters and it was effective by the subsequent step to vest the whole of the interest in the fund in the mother.

Order accordingly.

JOSEPH v. JOSEPH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), July 15, 1953.]

Divorce—Desertion—Termination—Jewish bill of divorcement.

In 1937 the husband deserted the wife. Subsequently, she sought from the Beth Din, the Court of the Chief Rabbi in London, a Get, or Jewish bill of divorcement, given by the husband, and on Sept. 19, 1948, she received from the Beth Din a certificate stating that the Get had been allowed. On Jan. 8, 1952, she filed a petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion.

HELD: although the Get had no effect in English law, either as a decree of divorce or as an agreement to separate, it had effect between persons of the Jewish faith, and, by obtaining it, the wife must be taken to have consented to her husband's continuing to live separate and apart from her, and, therefore, since she had thereby brought her husband's desertion to an end, the petition failed.

APPEAL from an order of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, Q.C., dated Mar. 25, 1952.

The parties who were of the Jewish race and faith were married in Shanghai in 1926 where the husband was then domiciled. In 1937 the husband deserted the wife, and thereafter he took no steps to make provision for her or for the child of the marriage, and shortly after his desertion he expressed his intention not to return to her. The wife, who was in England between 1938 and 1940, went back to China, where she remained until 1948, in which year she returned to England. She then applied to the Beth Din (the Court of the Chief Rabbi) in London, as she wished to obtain from her husband a Get, or Jewish bill of divorcement, and in September, 1948, she received a certificate that the Beth Din had allowed a Get on a date corresponding with Sept. 19, 1948, and she was free to marry again in accordance with Jewish religious law after ninety clear days from that date.

By a petition dated Jan. 8, 1952, the wife sought a decree of divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion. The husband, in his answer, denied desertion, and alleged that, if he had deserted the wife, the desertion had been terminated by the wife's consenting to their continued separation by obtaining the Get at the Beth Din. The learned commissioner dismissed the wife's petition, holding that by obtaining the Get the wife had consented to the husband living apart and that his desertion had been terminated as from Sept. 19, 1948.

Quass, Q.C., and Millner for the wife.

Power for the husband.

A SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The petition is dated Jan. 8, 1952, and, therefore, under our law for the wife to succeed it had to be shown that the husband was in a state of desertion for three years previous to that date. On the facts, apart from the effect of the Get, the learned commissioner accepted in substance the wife's evidence that the husband was in desertion and I think he also accepted that the husband had intimated in the plainest possible way that in no circumstances was he prepared to return to her. The question remains whether the circumstances attending the issue of the Get and its effect prevent desertion running as from the date of issue.

B In her evidence the wife said that in 1940 she went to the Beth Din and told them the circumstances of her case. Her evidence continued:

C "Q.—What was it you were wanting at that time when you went to the Beth Din as far as your husband was concerned? A.—I wanted at that time either my husband to return to me—I wanted him back—or to let him give me a Jewish divorce."

D She was then asked about 1948 when she came back and lived in London with a Mr. and Mrs. Jacob, Mr. Jacob being her nephew. The learned commissioner accepted her evidence, which was supported by Mrs. Jacob, that they got into touch with her husband and asked him if he would come back and he again refused. She then approached the Beth Din, and she was asked what her motive was in pressing for the Jewish divorce. She replied that she wanted to return to China where the Get would regularise her position before the community by whom a Jewish divorce was regarded as a complete dissolution of the marriage. There was no evidence before the court as to the law in Shanghai, and, for the purpose of this judgment, I accept that she believed that this document was one which, if she returned to Shanghai, would be recognised as a divorce in that place. She said later, when asked about the position in this country as distinct from Shanghai:

E "I always did appreciate it, but, seeing I was going back to China, I did not bother much about it. Seeing, however, that I am residing here I found that legal divorce is a necessity, and so I started a civil divorce as soon as I got back here."

F Shortly after she received the Get circumstances in China made her change her mind about going back to Shanghai, and she is now in this country, seeking, in these proceedings, a divorce based on the desertion which started in 1937. G One has some sympathy with her if the step which she took in 1948 to obtain the Get has resulted in an obstacle to her relying on the desertion which started in 1937 and obtaining a divorce in this country.

The learned commissioner read the Get and said:

H "That, on the face of it, is a very final document, although it is quite clear that, according to English law, it has no effect as a divorce. I was informed, and I had some evidence before me, that such a divorce can only be applied for by the husband. Therefore, it has to be with his consent, and the wife has also to consent, but she cannot apply for such a divorce. I was informed that just mutual consent was not sufficient ground for the pronouncement of such a Jewish divorce, but it is quite clear, whatever the ground for such a divorce, that each of the parties has to consent. Undoubtedly, the wife was persisting, right from comparatively early days, in urging her husband to give her this Jewish divorce."

Whether that is right in all cases it is unnecessary to determine, and the evidence as to a Get was very tenuous. But it is clear that in this case, where the wife was plainly the aggrieved party, she herself suggested and initiated the Get, although, in form, it had to be demanded by the husband and he was the person to deliver it (if that be the right expression) to her. The learned commissioner then refers to two cases—Preger v. Preger (1) and Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos (2), neither of which, in my view, is conclusive—but he summarises the matter in this way:

“The conclusion to which I am driven is that the wife, by obtaining this Get and insisting on it in the way in which she did, had consented to her husband living apart from her and that, from that moment, there was no desertion of the wife by the husband. That remains the position, unless it can be said that there has been any conduct of the wife or the husband to take the matter out of the category of a consensual living apart.”

I think that conclusion is inescapable. She asked for a divorce valid according to Jewish law. There is no suggestion that both parties did not realise that it had no legal effect in English law, and, indeed, the wife's evidence emphasises that point, in that she wanted it because, in her opinion, at any rate, it would be effective in Shanghai. She clearly asked the authorities to produce the document with her husband's consent, indicating that she and he should, in future, by consent live separate and no longer be man and wife according to the Jewish law. In those circumstances I do not see how one can avoid the conclusion that she was bringing her husband's desertion to an end. He was not in a position to return to her, and, if he had sought to return, she was in a position to say that she must abide by the decision of the Get. For the reasons which I have given I think the learned commissioner came to a right conclusion and that the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Counsel for the wife invited us to ignore the Get given to the wife as a mere nullity having no effect in English law, either as a decree of divorce or as an agreement to separate. I agree with him that the Get has neither operation. It clearly does not effect a divorce, and it does not in itself constitute an agreement to separate under English law. Nevertheless, it must, in my judgment, have some efficacy within its own field, that is to say, the field of Jewish religious law. I cannot accept the position that where a Get, which purports to effect a divorce according to Jewish law, has been given by a husband to a wife with the approval of the Beth Din, both spouses being of the Jewish faith, it would be consistent with the religious obligations of those two persons to ignore the Get and live together again as man and wife. The result seems to me to be inescapable, that in the present case the wife cannot consistently with the Get, given at her own request, maintain that the husband is in desertion. I think her successful request for the Get indicated her unwillingness to receive the husband back and amounted to a consent on her part to his continuing to live separate and apart from her. With my Lord, I find it unnecessary to decide in what circumstances it may be possible for the wife hereafter to take fresh proceedings on the ground of the husband's desertion, but in the present proceedings it seems to me that the Get is an insurmountable obstacle. Accordingly, I agree that the commissioner came to a right conclusion and that this appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the wife has argued that the certificate given to the wife by the Beth Din that she had received the Get is of no effect and he supported his argument by referring to Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos (2). The essential features of that case were that the husband left his wife in 1913 and in 1914 they came to an agreement which was subsequently held in the courts in this country to be invalid and illegal according to English law. In 1929 the wife, by proceedings in a court of summary jurisdiction in this country, re-asserted her rights. In subsequent proceedings by the wife for judicial separation on the ground of desertion it was found that, at any rate as from that time (1929), the wife was entitled to complain that her husband had deserted her, and merely expressed a doubt whether she could not establish desertion during the period between the date of the agreement in 1914 and 1929, without coming to a final decision on that matter. That was the case of an invalid and illegal agreement, but this case has nothing invalid or illegal about it. The certificate is a valid document for what it purports to be, namely, a certificate of a Jewish bill of divorcement given according to Jewish religious law. It does not purport to be a decree of divorce dissolving the marriage according to the law of this country. The action of the husband and the wife before the Beth Din seems to me to involve a consensus between the parties that thereafter they should live apart. Up to that time there had been desertion by the husband of the wife. As the learned commissioner found, some years previously the wife had persisted in requesting her husband, if he would not rejoin her, to give her this bill of divorcement. He did so, acting on her request, and I think it is impossible for her to maintain thereafter, so long as that agreement exists, that they are not living apart by consent. In those circumstances the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

FISHER v. SANTOVIN, LTD. FISHER v. YARDLEY'S LONDON AND PROVINCIAL STORES, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 17, 1953.]

Food and Drugs—Proceedings against third party—Information against retailer still on file—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 83 (3).

On Dec. 11, 1952, at the instance of the local authority, Y., Ltd., were charged under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 3 (1), with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser food, namely, a bottle of wine, which was not of the substance demanded by the purchaser. On Jan. 6, 1953, the authority, being reasonably satisfied that the offence of which complaint was made was due to the act or default of the respondents and that Y., Ltd., could establish a defence under s. 83 (1) of the Act, cause proceedings to be taken under s. 83 (3) against the respondents. The appellant, who prosecuted on behalf of the authority, did not ask the magistrate for leave to withdraw the information against Y., Ltd., and both informations remained on the file.

HELD: the rights of the authority to proceed under s. 3 (1) against the seller of the article and under s. 83 (3) against some other person responsible for the commission of the offence charged were alternative rights, and, therefore, the authority could take proceedings under s. 83 (3) against the respondents only if no proceedings were in existence against Y., Ltd., and the summonses should be dismissed.

FOR THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1938, s. 83, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, p. 458.

CASES STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Clerkenwell the appellant, Stanley George Fisher, a sanitary inspector, on behalf of the mayor, aldermen and councillors of the metropolitan borough of Holborn, laid an information against Yardley's London and Provincial Stores, Ltd., the first respondents, on Dec. 11, 1952, and against Santovin, Ltd., the second respondents, on Jan. 6, 1953. In the case of the first respondents the information charged that they at their branch at 56 Lamb's Conduit Street, Holborn, did sell to the prejudice of the purchaser a food which was not of the substance demanded by the purchaser in that they did sell to Lieut. D. M. Grant, R.A.M.C., instead of a bottle of sherry demanded by him a bottle containing 99.96 per cent. of water, contrary to the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 3. In the case of the second respondents the information, which was in respect of the same sale of sherry (supplied by the second respondents to the first respondents), was laid under s. 83 (3) of the Act and stated that the food and drugs authority for the borough of Holborn were satisfied that the offence was due to the act or default of the second respondents and that the first respondents could establish a defence under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (1).

On the hearing of the informations on Feb. 20, 1953, it was proved or admitted that on Dec. 22, 1952, the first respondents sent to the appellant a copy of a warranty given by the second respondents in respect of the bottle of sherry together with a notice which complied with s. 84 of the Act of 1938. On Jan. 6, 1953, the appellant laid an information against the second respondents who, on Jan. 15, 1953, informed the appellant that they also intended to rely on a warranty under s. 84 of the Act, given by their suppliers Geo. Jones and Co. (London), Ltd. On Jan. 24, 1953, the appellant laid an information against Geo. Jones & Co. (London), Ltd. in respect of the sale of the bottle of sherry stating that he was satisfied that the sale was due to the default of Geo. Jones & Co. and that the first and second respondents could both establish defences under s. 83 (1) of the Act. On the hearing of the informations against both respondents and Geo. Jones & Co., it was contended on behalf of both respondents that in making use of s. 83 (3) against prior parties in the chain the appellant withdrew or abandoned the summonses against the respondents, and that in so doing the appellant had acknowledged that in law the respondents were not guilty of an offence and that the summons should be dismissed. In addition it was contended on behalf of the second respondents that s. 83 (1) entitled the defendant and not the prosecution to have any person to whose act or default he alleged that the contravention in question was due, brought before the court in the proceedings and that the scheme of s. 83 contemplated that the prosecution should elect against which one of the parties he would cause proceedings to be taken. On the part of the appellant it was contended that a chain of distributors and vendors having been established, they could all be brought before the court as defendants and at the same time; that it was not for the appellant to usurp the privileges of the court by discontinuing proceedings which had been properly brought; and that the appellant was reasonably satisfied that the respondents had a defence because of their pleas of a warranty, but could not be completely satisfied until this defence had been proved to the satisfaction of the court and all the conditions imposed by s. 84 had been complied with.

The learned magistrate dismissed the informations.

Paul Wrightson for the appellant.

J. C. G. Burge for the first respondents.

J. N. Hutchinson for the second respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: These are Cases stated by a metropolitan magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell Police Court, who dismissed two summonses issued under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938. The point that has arisen is under s. 83 of that Act.

Yardley's London and Provincial Stores, Ltd. (to whom I refer hereafter as "Yardleys") sold a bottle of so-called wine. The bottle contained nothing but coloured water. Yardley's had purchased it from a firm known as Santovin, Ltd., and we were told that Santovin, Ltd., obtained it from one, Jones, but he is not before the court. The food and drugs inspector of the Holborn Borough Council quite properly thought that proceedings should be taken, and he took proceedings against Yardley's.

A The Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83, was designed largely to save costs and also to give a complete defence in some cases where there was not a warranty. By s. 83 (1), if a shopkeeper has sold to a purchaser goods which turn out to be adulterated and is summoned for a breach of the Act, he has the right of bringing in as a defendant the person by whom he was supplied with those goods, i.e., his wholesaler, and, moreover, the wholesaler can also make use of the goods, so it has been held, and bring in the person who supplied him, e.g., the shipper, but for the purposes of this case we confine ourselves to the retailer and wholesaler. Section 83 provides by sub-s. (1):

B "A person against whom proceedings are brought under this Act shall, upon information duly laid by him and on giving to the prosecution not less than three clear days' notice of his intention, be entitled to have any person to whose act or default he alleges that the contravention of the provisions in question was due brought before the court in the proceedings, and, if, after the contravention has been proved, the original defendant proves that the contravention was due to the act or default of that other person, that other person may be convicted of the offence, and, if the original defendant further proves that he has used all due diligence to secure that the provisions in question were complied with, he shall be acquitted of the offence."

C That is a very valuable sub-section. It allows the shopkeeper to bring in the wholesaler, but it also provides that, unless the shopkeeper shows that he has taken reasonable steps, he also can be convicted. Then it is provided by sub-s. (2) that where a defendant is brought in under sub-s. (1):

D " (a) the prosecution, as well as the person whom the defendant charges with the offence, shall have the right to cross-examine him, if he gives evidence, and any witness called by him in support of his pleas, and to call rebutting evidence; (b) the court may make such order as it thinks fit for the payment of costs by any party to the proceedings to any other party thereto."

E It may be that one or both of the defendants are responsible, but it frequently happens that the food and drugs inspector knows quite well that the shopkeeper who is selling some proprietary article has no reason to suppose that the proprietary article is other than it is represented to be, yet when it is bought and analysed it is found that it is adulterated. The fault there clearly lies with the supplier. If the retailer has sold packet goods in the same condition as he had bought them, justice requires that the person who is really responsible, i.e., the supplier—it may be the manufacturer or the wholesaler—should be brought before the court and dealt with and not the shopkeeper, and so the Act provides by sub-s. (3):

F "Where it appears to the authority concerned that an offence has been committed in respect of which proceedings might be taken under this Act against some person [the shopkeeper] and the authority are reasonably satisfied that the offence of which complaint is made was due to an act or default of some other person [the manufacturer] and that the first-mentioned person could establish a defence under sub-s. (1) of this section, they may cause proceedings to be taken against that other person without first causing proceedings to be taken against the first-mentioned person. In any such proceedings the defendant may be charged with and, on proof that the contravention was due to his act or default, be convicted of, the offence with which the first-mentioned person might have been charged."

H The wording of that sub-section and the use of the word "may" seem to indicate that proceedings will not be taken against the first person if proceedings are to be taken against the "other person" under s. 83 (3).

A summons was issued against Yardley's. Yardley's might have used s. 83 (1), which they would have to do not less than three days before the hearing, or they might have availed themselves of the provisions of s. 84, which deal with relying on a warranty. Before this case came on, however, a further summons was issued against Santovin, Ltd., and it was therein recited that Yardley's had been charged with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser and that the council of the metropolitan borough of Holborn were reasonably satisfied that the offence was due to the act or default of Santovin, Ltd., and that Yardley's could establish a defence under s. 83 (1). Leave of the magistrate to withdraw the information against Yardley's was not sought. It is absurd that Yardley's are being prosecuted while Santovin, Ltd., are being prosecuted on the ground that the prosecutors are satisfied that the offence was that of Santovin, Ltd., and that Yardley's have a good defence.

It seems to the court that s. 83 (3) is only applicable where no proceedings are taken against the retailer. These two proceedings cannot be carried on concurrently because it is an abuse to ask a court to hear a case and convict a man whom the prosecutor, being a public authority, is satisfied or reasonably satisfied has committed no offence and has a perfectly good defence. I am not saying by any means, speaking for myself, that if the proceedings had been taken against Yardley's and then the local authority had come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that Santovin, Ltd., were really liable, they might not have asked for the leave of the court to withdraw the proceedings and then have taken proceedings under sub-s. (3), but I think that it is quite clear that proceedings under sub-s. (3) cannot go on contemporaneously with proceedings against the retailer. The retailer might in this case three days before the summons was heard have served notice that he was going to bring in Santovin, Ltd., but one cannot expect him to do that when Santovin, Ltd., have been brought in by the local authority. At any rate, we think these proceedings were misconceived, and, therefore, the magistrate was quite right in dismissing these two proceedings which have been left on the file because, as counsel for Santovin, Ltd., has properly pointed out, if the proceedings had been taken by Yardley's under s. 83 (1), s. 83 (2) gives him certain rights which he has not got under s. 83 (3). For these reasons, I think the magistrate came to a right conclusion in point of law and the appeals should be dismissed.

R. v. METROPOLITAN POLICE COMMISSIONER. Ex parte PARKER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.),
July 16, 17, 1953.]

Certiorari—Cab licence—Decision of Commissioner of Metropolitan Police to revoke—Reference of matter by commissioner to licensing committee for further investigation—London Cab Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 1346), para. 30 (1).

On Oct. 20, 1952, the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, as licensing authority, having become satisfied that the applicant, a licensed cab driver, was not a fit person to hold such a licence, decided to revoke it in the exercise of his powers under the London Cab Order, 1934, para. 30 (1). The commissioner, however, directed that the applicant should appear before the licensing committee to be confronted with two police constables who had made complaints about him, and he also gave instructions that the applicant's licence was to be revoked unless anything transpired before the committee which, in their opinion, might lead him to alter his decision. At the sitting of the committee the applicant denied the allegations made by the constables and wished to call a witness in support of his denials, but he was not allowed to do so. The committee reported to the commissioner that nothing had transpired which, in their opinion, should influence him to alter his decision, and the applicant's licence was revoked. On a motion for certiorari to quash the order of revocation,

HELD: in exercising his power to revoke a licence under para. 30 (1) the Commissioner of Police was exercising an administrative, and not a judicial or quasi-judicial, function; as the decision to revoke had already been reached and the function of the committee was merely to confront the applicant with the police officers, the committee was not exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial function; and, therefore, certiorari would not lie.

SEMBLE: if the commissioner had set up an inquiry, charging it to hear evidence and report its finding to him so that he might decide whether to revoke the licence or not, such a committee would be acting judicially and would have to observe the rules of natural justice.

MOTION for order of certiorari.

On Oct. 20, 1952, the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police became satisfied that, by reason of circumstances coming to his notice, the applicant, Albert Arthur Parker, a licensed cab driver, was not a fit person to hold such a licence. The commissioner, however, assented in writing to a proposal by Assistant-Commissioner Henry Dalton that the applicant should be brought before the licensing committee and be confronted with Police-constables Key and Scarborough who had made complaints about the applicant. The commissioner also orally informed Assistant-Commissioner Dalton that the applicant's licence should be revoked unless anything transpired before the committee which, in their opinion, might lead him to re-consider his decision to revoke the licence. At the sitting of the committee on Oct. 23, 1952, Police-constables Key and Scarborough read statements to the effect that on Oct. 4, 1952, between 11 p.m. and midnight, they had kept observation on the applicant's taxicab and had seen the applicant take into his cab prostitutes and men and that at midnight the flag of the cab was in the "For hire" position and no money was charged on the meter. The applicant denied this, and said that at about 11 p.m. he had taken a Mr. Gray from the Regent Palace Hotel to the Benelux Restaurant and between 11 p.m. and midnight was waiting, on Mr. Gray's instructions, for him to come out of the restaurant. He also denied that his flag was in the "For hire" position, and said that when he had taken Mr. Gray back to the Regent Palace Hotel 8s. 3d. showed on the meter. The applicant asked to be permitted to call Mr. Gray as a witness to support his contentions, but he was not allowed to do so. In the opinion of the committee, nothing had transpired which might lead the commissioner to re-consider his decision to revoke the applicant's licence, and, accordingly, the assistant commissioner informed the applicant that his cab licence was revoked.

On a motion for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the order for revocation of the licence, it was contended on behalf of the applicant that the inquiry before the committee was in the nature of a judicial proceeding, and in view of the refusal of the committee to allow the defendant to call Mr. Gray as a witness there had been a denial of natural justice.

Paul Wrightson for the applicant.

Buzzard for the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant moves for an order of certiorari to bring into this court for the purpose of being quashed an order made against Albert Arthur Parker dated Oct. 23, 1952, by the Commissioner of Police for the metropolis revoking his hackney carriage driver's licence, pursuant to the London Cab Order, 1934, para. 30 (1). Briefly stated the grounds are that an inquiry was held by the Commissioner of Police and at that inquiry the applicant desired to call a witness, but the persons holding the inquiry declined to hear the witness. Therefore, it is said, the rules of natural justice were violated.

The applicant was licensed some years ago, and his career as a taxicab driver has not been without blemish. He has been warned and convicted of offences against various Acts of Parliament in relation to the use of his cab. According to a letter which is exhibited in these proceedings, that was with regard not only to traffic offences, but also to other breaches of the law. The letter says:

"He was repeatedly warned of the possible consequences if he continued to offend. Despite these warnings he continued to incur convictions and as a result his cab-driver's licence was suspended for one month in 1947, and again for three months in 1950."

At the material times in this case it was brought to the attention of the commissioner that the applicant was alleged by the police to have been allowing his cab to be used by prostitutes for the carrying on of their trade and to have been permitting men to enter the cab for the purpose of sexual intercourse. The result was that the commissioner resolved to withdraw his licence.

It is necessary to remember that we are here asked to grant certiorari, and when the application was made for leave to move for certiorari both PARKER, J., and I expressed considerable doubt whether or not certiorari would lie. The argument which has taken place today has confirmed me in the opinion I then expressed that certiorari will not lie. Certiorari is a remedy of a very special nature. For the purpose of quashing an order it lay originally only to a court. In SHORT AND MELLOR, THE PRACTICE OF THE CROWN OFFICE, and other works, the function of the writ of certiorari is discussed. The writ called on an inferior court to return to this court the order which the inferior court had made and which it was sought to challenge, or the record of the court if it was a court of record.

It was then for this court to examine the record or order and see whether or not the order was made in accordance with law. One of the most common cases in which it was moved was to ascertain whether there had been an excess of jurisdiction. There have been many cases recently of certiorari, but in all of them it was sought to challenge an order of a tribunal of some description. Formerly, no doubt, the writ did not lie to anybody except what could be called a court, but in recent years, with the development of what may be called administrative law under which government departments are given wide powers of holding inquiries and making orders affecting the property of various persons, the remedy of certiorari has been considerably extended. The principles on which it will be granted are to be found most clearly stated in the well-known judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in R. v. Electricity Comrs. Ex p. London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920), Ltd. (1).

One matter which counsel for the applicant specially emphasised when he applied for leave to move was that mandamus would lie to the Commissioner of Police in respect of hackney carriage licences, and he sought to argue that, as mandamus would lie, certiorari would lie. There is an essential fallacy in his argument on that point. Mandamus will lie to any person who is under a duty imposed by statute or by the common law to do a particular act. If that person refrains from doing the act or refrains from wrong motives from exercising a power which it is his duty to exercise, this court will by order of mandamus direct him to do what he should do. Mandamus may go to individuals. It may go to corporations, and it goes quite independently of whether the individual or body to which it is addressed is or is not a court.

The position of the Commissioner of Police in respect of hackney carriage licences ought, I think, to be stated. We need not go back further than the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869. By s. 6 of that Act, the duty of licensing cabs and drivers was placed on the Secretary of State, and by s. 11 the Secretary of State was empowered to delegate his powers—and he has delegated them—to the Commissioner of Police. So far as the granting of licences is concerned, it was provided in an order made by the Secretary of State, dated Dec. 30, 1907, that

“ . . . (A) a licence shall not be granted to any person under the age of twenty-one years, and any licence so granted shall be void.”

In that case, there is no discretion at all; if an applicant is under twenty-one years of age, he cannot have a licence. Then:

“(b) The commissioner may at his discretion refuse a licence to any person who has been convicted of a felony, misdemeanour, or of cruelty to animals, or who, having previously held a licence for a cab or a stage carriage, has had such previous licence revoked or suspended.”

It was decided by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Metropolitan Police Comr. Ex p. Holloway (2), that that provision limited the discretion of the commissioner in that he could only refuse an application on the grounds which are set out in the regulation—in other words, he had not an unfettered discretion. If any person of twenty-one years of age applies to the commissioner for a licence, unless one of the exceptional circumstances which are dealt with in the order apply to him, he is entitled to have one granted to him subject to the right of the commissioner to revoke the licence.

The present position with regard to the revocation of a licence is to be found in para. 30 of the London Cab Order, 1934, which was made under the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869, and that paragraph shows clearly, as one would expect, that a licence may be revoked or suspended. Indeed, leaving out of account irrevocable licences granted under seal and possibly licences coupled with an interest, the very fact that a licence is granted to a person would seem to imply that the person granting the licence can also revoke it. A licence is nothing but a permission, and, if a man is given permission to do something, it is natural that the person who gives the permission will be able to withdraw the permission. As a rule, where a licence is granted, the licensor does not have to state why he withdraws his permission. Unless he has given a licence for a definite period, thereby giving some contractual right, he can withdraw it. Paragraph 30 (1) of the order is in these terms:

"A cab-driver's licence shall be liable to revocation or suspension by the Commissioner of Police if he is satisfied, by reason of any circumstances arising or coming to his knowledge after the licence was granted, that the licensee is not a fit person to hold such a licence."

In the present case, facts having come to the commissioner's knowledge with regard to the alleged repeated use of the applicant's cab by disorderly women, the commissioner decided to withdraw the licence. Counsel for the applicant, in my opinion, very properly conceded that, if the commissioner had simply said: "I withdraw your licence", he could not argue that the commissioner was bound to hold an inquiry or hear evidence or anything else. The wording of the paragraph seems to me to make it clear that it is not intended that there should be held anything in the nature of a judicial inquiry or that the commissioner should be put in the position of a judge or quasi-judge. The commissioner can withdraw the licence or suspend it by reason of any circumstance which comes to his knowledge. In other words, he can act on hearsay if he likes, and I suppose in many cases he acts on a complaint, though in most cases, I expect, he would satisfy himself as far as he can that the information that comes to his knowledge is accurate. In this case the commissioner in his affidavit, which the court sees no reason to doubt, says:

"On Oct. 20, 1952, I became satisfied by reason of circumstances arising after the said licence was granted that the said Albert Arthur Parker was not a fit person to hold such a licence. I thereupon assented in writing to a proposal by Henry Dalton, Assistant-Commissioner 'B' Department, Metropolitan Police, that the said Albert Arthur Parker should be brought before the licensing committee and that he should be confronted with Police-constables Robert Key and Carl Scarborough. The said committee is a departmental committee set up by me to assist me in such matters. I further instructed the said assistant-commissioner orally that the said Albert Arthur Parker's said licence should be revoked unless anything transpired before the said committee which in their opinion might lead me to re-consider my decision to revoke the said licence."

It is argued that the commissioner, if he chose, having been satisfied that the applicant was not a fit person to hold a licence, could have said: "I withdraw your licence", and that would have been perfectly valid and his decision could not be challenged, but that, having made up his mind to that effect, he took the view that there might be some room for mistake, and he, therefore, decided on the course which was adopted. As I have said, it is impossible to find on the wording of para. 30 (1) under which the commissioner acted that he was in the position of either a judge or a quasi-judge. Exactly what a quasi-judge is nobody has ever attempted to define, but I suppose he is a person who has to hear evidence and come to a conclusion on facts. One would expect, where an order of certiorari is sought, that a judge or quasi-judge would have made an order or something in the nature of an order, because otherwise what is to be brought up to be quashed in this court? The motion is to bring up an order of the commissioner. There is nothing here to show that there ever was an order. It was simply a decision of the commissioner that, by reason of facts coming to his knowledge, he was satisfied that the licensee was not a fit person to hold the licence. In all the cases which have been cited to us (and I do not propose to go through them because all the cases on the subject were considered by the court in R. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee. Ex p. R. A. Brand & Co., Ltd. (3)) a department of State has either passed a resolution or made an order consequent on a resolution which can be quashed or to which some objection can be taken. Here, there is nothing, and, in my opinion, it is impossible to say that the commissioner—in fact, it is not said—if he acted alone was in a judicial or quasi-judicial position. He was exercising what I may call a disciplinary authority, and where a person, whether he is a military officer, a police officer, or any other person whose duty it is to act in matters of discipline, is exercising disciplinary powers, it is most undesirable, in my opinion, that he should be fettered by threats of orders of certiorari and so forth, because that interferes with the free and proper exercise of the disciplinary powers which he has. In this case the applicant was given a chance, by cross-examination of or confrontation with the police officers, of extracting some fact which, if it was brought to the notice of the commissioner, might have influenced him before his decision was actually promulgated through the mouth of the assistant-commissioner.

For these reasons, in my opinion, there is no ground for saying that the withdrawal of the licence granted by the Commissioner of Police to the applicant was a judicial act, nor that it was done by a judicial or quasi-judicial person, and consequently, certiorari will not lie and this application fails.

- C PARKER, J.: I agree that this motion fails, and I can give my reasons very shortly. Under the London Cab Order, 1934, para. 30, the commissioner is given very wide powers, and it is clear that he may revoke a licence if he is satisfied by reason of any circumstances arising or coming to his knowledge after the licence is granted that the licensee is not a fit person to hold it. Accordingly, he is in no way bound to hear evidence or hold an inquiry or cause any inquiry to be held.
- D Should he revoke a licence on the report, for instance, of a police constable alone, this court could not interfere whether by certiorari or otherwise. Indeed, as I understand it, counsel for the applicant conceded that that was the position. In the present case, as my Lord has said, the commissioner, having decided to revoke the licence, gave the applicant an opportunity of appearing before a departmental committee and being confronted with the police constables. Can
- E it make any difference that he said: "I am satisfied, but will you, the committee, confront the applicant with the police constables and report back to me if you think there is anything more I ought to consider". In my view, if he is not bound to hear any evidence from the applicant himself or on his behalf, the committee cannot be bound to do so. A different position might arise—I only say might arise—if the commissioner were to say, in effect: "I have not the necessary
- F evidence on which to decide this, and I will cause an inquiry to be held so that I can have a report on the facts". The position might then be different, but that is far from the facts of this case where the commissioner has come to his decision that the licence should be revoked and is merely giving the applicant an opportunity of, in effect, cross-examining the constables concerned. In these circumstances, I find it quite unnecessary to consider all the cases that have been
- G cited as to when certiorari will lie. It is clear that it does not lie in this case. I should add that counsel for the applicant further argued that the remedy of certiorari should lie in this case in that the decision here was not the decision of the commissioner, but was the decision of the assistant-commissioner or of the committee. In my opinion, there is nothing in this contention because it seems to me perfectly clear, on the facts, that the decision here was, and would
- H in any event be, whatever the committee did, the decision of the commissioner himself, and the fact that that decision is communicated orally by the assistant-commissioner or somebody else cannot in any way invalidate the decision of the commissioner. I agree that this motion fails.

DONOVAN, J.: I agree. Had the commissioner himself immediately acted on the view he had formed that the applicant was not fit to hold a licence and at once revoked it, it is admitted on behalf of the applicant here that the writ would not lie, such revocation being purely an administrative act. Having regard to the language of the London Cab Order, 1934, para. 30, I think that admission is right. Instead of doing that, however, the commissioner referred the matter to a committee, giving instructions that the applicant and the two police officers should be there and that the licence should be revoked unless something transpired which, in the committee's view, might lead to a re-consideration by the commissioner of his decision. I agree that that involved hearing the applicant and the two police officers and coming to a view as to whether the latter's allegations had in any way been shaken.

The question here is whether, in discharging their duty, the committee were performing a judicial or quasi-judicial act. It can, of course, with some degree of plausibility, be argued that they were. They were in a sense hearing two sides to a dispute, viz., whether the applicant had allowed his cab to be used for improper purposes, and so it is said that, although the act of revoking the licence may be an administrative one, yet, if the commissioner causes an inquiry to be held at which evidence is taken and weighed, the rules of natural justice must be observed, and each side must be allowed to call witnesses, particularly the man whose livelihood is at stake. That argument has some force, and if the commissioner had set up an inquiry, as PARKER, J., has just said, charging it to hear evidence and report its finding to him so that he might decide whether to revoke the licence or not, then, in my view, such a committee would be acting judicially, and would have to observe the rules of natural justice. Suppose, on the other hand, the commissioner, having already taken a decision to revoke the licence, called in two or three members of his staff and said: "I have decided to revoke this licence, but before I implement that decision, just see Parker and the two policemen and hear what each has to say, and then, if you think I ought not to revoke, let me know", would the ensuing inquiry be a judicial or quasi-judicial one? If so, one is very near the position when every policeman who is taking notes of the statements made by each party to a street collision or some other untoward happening which might lead to a prosecution would be said to be acting in a judicial or quasi-judicial role. On the contrary, as it seems to me, he is performing an administrative act simply for the purpose of reporting to his superiors, and none the less so because it involves hearing, noting, and reporting allegation and counter-allegation.

If that be right, the question here is whether the licensing committee were really doing anything more. In the circumstances of this case, I think they were not. They were to see the policemen and Parker. They were to hear their allegations and counter-allegations and to report if they thought the result would or might change the commissioner's decision to revoke. In doing that they were, in my opinion, simply taking a share in the administrative acts culminating in the revocation of the licence, and that share did not involve that they were taking part in judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings. Had it been otherwise, I think the applicant should have been allowed to call the witness Gray, whose evidence might have been that the taxi-meter showed 8s. 3d. at midnight and thus might have conflicted with the evidence of the officers that it showed nothing. This was a material issue, since, if Gray convinced the committee that he was right, the reliability of the two police officers as witnesses would have been at least to some degree affected. That point, of course, does not arise once the conclusion is reached that this is not a proper case for the issue of the writ.

I would add, on the alternative argument that the commissioner wrongfully delegated his power of revocation to the assistant-commissioner or the licensing committee, that on the facts as disclosed by the commissioner's affidavit, the commissioner took the decision to revoke and simply communicated it through the assistant-commissioner, and in this I see no delegation of authority.

I agree that the application must be dismissed. Motion dismissed.

Re LIVESEY'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. LIVESEY v. LIVESEY AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), July 16, 17, 1953.]

Satisfaction—Portions—Sums of money given for “advancement or preferment” to be taken pro tanto for portion—Testamentary gift of mortgages.

A By a settlement dated Jan. 30, 1904, a settlor created a term in the usual form to secure portions for his younger children. It was further provided, by cl. 9 of the settlement, that, if the settlor should give any child or children for whom a portion was thereby intended to be provided any sum or sums of money “on his, her or their marriage or for the payment of his, her or their debts or otherwise his, her or their advancement or preferment in the world”, then, unless the settlor should in writing otherwise direct, such sum or sums of money should be taken pro tanto for the portion or respective portions for the child or children so advanced. By his will dated May 4, 1948, the settlor, who died on Dec. 31, 1951, gave, inter alia, substantial mortgage investments to each of his two younger sons.

B HELD: the mortgage investments were “money” within the meaning of cl. 9, which would extend to “advancement or preferment in the world” afforded by a testamentary gift, but the testamentary gifts to the two younger sons were (especially as they were accompanied by other gifts which were not claimed to be caught by cl. 9) mere bounty to which the words “advancement or preferment” did not extend, and, therefore, they had not to be brought into account against the portions of the younger sons.

F ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (inter alia) whether gifts under the will of the settlor of mortgage investments and a mortgage for £30,000 charged on settled estates to his younger children were for “their advancement or preferment in the world” within cl. 9 of a settlement dated Jan. 30, 1904, so as to be sums of money to be taken into substitution for their respective portions under the settlement.

G By a deed of settlement dated Jan. 30, 1904, made in contemplation of marriage (which was shortly afterwards solemnised) between Algernon Montague Livesey, the settlor, of the first part, the intended spouse, of the second part, and the original trustees, of the third part, the settlor assured real property to trustees to the use of the settlor and his assigns during his life and on his death, in the events which happened, to the use of the trustees for one thousand years from the death of the settlor, and subject thereto to the use of the first and every other son of the settlor successively in remainder according to their respective seniorities
H and their heirs male with remainders over. By cl. 1 it was declared that the settled estates were limited to the use of the trustees for one thousand years to raise portions for the younger children of the marriage of the amount therein specified, being, if there should be two such younger children, £10,000 to be payable, in default of appointment to the contrary, to the younger children in equal shares. By cl. 9, it was provided:

“If the [settlor] shall give or secure to or with any child or children for whom a portion or portions is or are intended to be hereby provided as aforesaid any sum or sums of money on his, her or their marriage or for the payment of his, her or their debts or otherwise his, her or their advancement or preferment in the world, then, unless the [settlor] shall in writing otherwise direct, such sum or sums of money shall be taken into substitution [sic] pro tanto and according to the amount thereof for the portion or respective portions intended to be provided for the child or respective children severally so advanced as aforesaid and such amount only (if any) shall be appropriated for the portion of any child so advanced by the [settlor] as aforesaid as together with the amount of such advancement will make up and complete the portion hereby or by appointment as aforesaid provided for such children and the remainder or balance of such portion or the whole of such portion if the amount of the advancement shall equal or exceed the amount of the portion shall sink into the estate for the benefit of the inheritance unless the [settlor] shall in writing declare his intention to purchase the same for his own benefit in which case the same shall form part of his personal estate ”.

There were three sons of the marriage, the plaintiff, the eldest son, and the two defendants, who were also the present trustees of the settlement. On Dec. 31, 1951, the settlor died, and by his will dated May 4, 1948, he gave to the defendant, Amyatt Edmund Livesey, his freehold and leasehold properties in the city of Sheffield and such of the mortgage investments which “ I inherited from my late uncle . . . as shall be in existence at the time of my death ”, and to the defendant, Evelyn Montague Livesey, he gave “ My four private farms in the county of Lincoln and the mortgage for £30,000 charged on the settled estates at Stourton and elsewhere and of which I am now the life tenant under my marriage settlement . . . ”.

The plaintiff contended that the defendants should bring into account the mortgage investments and the mortgage respectively against their portions under cl. 9 of the settlement.

Cross, Q.C., and R. Gwyn Rees for the plaintiff, the eldest son.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and T. A. C. Burgess for the defendants, the two younger sons and the present trustees of the settlement.

ROXBURGH, J.: By a settlement made on Jan. 30, 1904, between Algernon Montague Livesey, of the first part, the Honourable Evelyn Livesey, of the second part, and Arthur Norman Charles John Coleman and Philip Witham, trustees, of the third part, the settlor, Algernon Montague Livesey, created a term in the usual form to secure portions for his younger children, of whom there were two. The plaintiff in this summons is his eldest son, and the defendants are the two younger children. Clause 9 of the settlement provides that:

“ If the said Algernon Montague Livesey shall give or secure to or with any child or children for whom a portion or portions is or are intended to be hereby provided as aforesaid [the two defendants are such children] any sum or sums of money on his, her or their marriage or for the payment of his, her or their debts or otherwise his, her or their advancement or preferment in the world, then, unless the said Algernon Montague Livesey shall in writing otherwise direct, such sum or sums of money shall be taken into substitution [sic] pro tanto and according to the amount thereof for the portion or respective portions intended to be provided for the child or respective children severally so advanced as aforesaid and such amount only (if any) shall be appropriated for the portion of any child so advanced by the said Algernon Montague Livesey as aforesaid as together with the amount of such advancement will make up and complete the portion hereby or by appointment as aforesaid provided for such children and the remainder or balance of such portion or the whole of such portion if the amount of the advancement shall equal or exceed the amount of the portion shall sink into the estate for the benefit of the inheritance unless the said Algernon Montague Livesey shall in writing declare his intention to purchase the same for his own benefit in which case the same shall form part of his personal estate."

A On Dec. 31, 1951, the settlor died, and by his will he gave to his son Amyatt, who is the first defendant to this application, his freehold and leasehold properties situate in the city of Sheffield and such of the mortgage investments which "I inherited from my late uncle Arnold Philip Marshall as shall be in existence at the time of my death". To his son Evelyn, the second defendant, he gave

B "My four private farms in the county of Lincoln and the mortgage for £30,000 charged on the settled estates at Stourton and elsewhere and of which I am now the life tenant under my marriage settlement dated Jan. 30, 1904."

C Counsel for the plaintiff has submitted, with much force, that the mortgage investments which the settlor inherited from his late uncle have to be brought into account against the first defendant's portion, and the mortgage for £30,000 has to be brought into account against the second defendant's portion. I must confess that the case has caused me much difficulty. Counsel contends that these mortgage investments in the first case or this mortgage in the second case is a sum or sums of money which have been given. On the whole, I think he is right so far, though I have doubt even about that. I have no idea what the words "secure to or with" in cl. 9 mean, but counsel contends that the word "give" applies to these two mortgages, and I am prepared to accept that submission.

D I should have hesitated, but for authority, to believe that a clause in the form of cl. 9 of the settlement had any application to a testamentary disposition, but I think the course of authority, such as it is, is sufficiently strong to compel me to hold that such a clause does apply to a testamentary disposition.

E Then remains the final question. The words in the will are "I give" in each case, and these mortgages are in each case coupled with other gifts, which counsel for the plaintiff does not contend have to be set against the portion. In those circumstances I feel compelled to hold that, so far as I know from the documents, these gifts are mere bounty. I cannot see any reason for thinking, for instance, that the gift of the mortgage investments differs from the gift of the freehold and leasehold properties, situate in the city of Sheffield, in any manner whatsoever. I regard them both as mere testamentary bounty.

F Counsel for the plaintiff has put his case in two alternative ways. First, he says that the words of the settlement require nothing beyond mere bounty. Then he says that, if he is wrong about that, where the sum is substantial it must be presumed to be an advancement in the absence of any evidence. Certainly the amount given by the will is substantial in this case. Counsel disclaimed the idea that his doctrine could be applied to a small sum, say, of £100.

G Counsel's first authority is Onslow v. Michell (1), which at first sight is helpful to him, and which has, I think, throughout been his chief anchor. When counsel referred me to this case, I wondered when we should come to the modern authorities, but in very truth there is none, and this is really the beginning and the end of authority, with one single exception. In Onslow v. Michell (1) the relevant clause was (18 Ves. 490):

H "If the said parents, or either of them, should in their or either of their life-time settle, give, or advance, unto, for or upon any child or children of the marriage, entitled to portions under the appointment therein before contained, any sum or sums of money, lands, tenements, goods or chattels, for or towards his, her, or their advancement or preferment in marriage or otherwise, then such sum or sums of money, and the value of such lands, tenements, goods or chattels, so to be received by, or advanced or given to,

or settled upon, such child or children respectively, should be accounted, deemed and taken, as part, if less, and if as much or more, for the whole of the portion or portions thereby provided for them, as aforesaid, unless the said parents, or the survivor of them, should, by writing, signify or declare the contrary."

Then the parent made a disposition by will in favour of the child in question, and the real contest was whether, having regard to the words "in their life-time"—which do not occur in the present case—the clause was applicable to a testamentary disposition. As far as I can see, that was the only point which was dealt with, and SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., decided that it did apply to a will. I must confess that that decision on that particular settlement surprises me.

I might have been shy at making observations about so great a judge as SIR WILLIAM GRANT, if it were not for the fact that in Cooper v. Cooper (2) LORD SELBORNE, L.C., when dealing with the cases, of which Onslow v. Michell (1) was one, said (8 Ch. App. 825):

"... when examined, these cases are found to present a most remarkable example of the extraordinary manner in which the use of precedents has, sometimes, caused the courts of this country, first to slide into manifest error, and afterwards to follow that error under the notion that they are bound to do so."

The point with which I am concerned is not discussed in Onslow v. Michell (1), and did not arise, or at any rate did not arise in any acute form, in any of the later cases, because they are concerned with clauses which contain the much wider word "benefit". At first sight, I thought Onslow v. Michell (1) was very strongly in the plaintiff's favour, but I am not at all sure how SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., construed the settlement in that case. He certainly has not told posterity how he did it, and, bearing in mind that the word "give" occurs in the settlement in Onslow v. Michell (1), he may have treated the words "or otherwise" as not limited by "for their advancement or preferment in marriage". In other words, he may not have treated the words as meaning their advancement or preferment in marriage, or their advancement or preferment otherwise, which is what at first I thought they meant. He may have thought, having regard to the word "give", that the words "or otherwise" were quite general.

SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., did not have the advantage, which I have, of the decision in Lowther v. Bentinck (3). That decision shows plainly that words relating to advancement or preferment are much narrower than mere bounty. I think that there is no escape from that. There may be doubt as to what exactly the phrase "advancement or preferment in the world" means, but it is, I think, settled by authority that it is something more restricted than mere bounty. Therefore, in my judgment, whatever these words mean, they would not cover a payment which was mere bounty.

If that be my view, then counsel for the plaintiff argues: "Well, this was a large sum. What can it have been for? It must have been an advancement or preferment in the world." That is not an acceptable argument. Certainly there is no existing authority for any such argument, and it seems to me that it is a question of fact. The settlor has thought fit to limit the categories of sums of money which have to be brought into account. He has made the purpose of the payments the test in every case except marriage, with which we are not concerned. It is for the payment of his or her or their debts or otherwise for his, her or their advancement or preferment in the world.

The plaintiff in this action claims against the two defendants that they must bring these sums into account. In my judgment, he must prove that these moneys were for the purpose, or one of the purposes, specified. If he is unable to obtain any evidence at all, then he fails to prove his case. I have no doubt that these testamentary gifts were, on the construction of the will, mere bounty, but I can well believe that the facts were different from the inference which I draw from the will per se. They may well have been, but, in my judgment, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove it, and there is no presumption of law that because a payment is substantial it is to be presumed to be an advancement or preferment in the world unless the contrary is proved. Accordingly, in my judgment, the plaintiff fails.

Arbitration—Practice—Order that arbitration clause should cease to have effect—Application to Divisional Court—Arbitration Act, 1950 (c. 27), s. 24 (2).

- D MOTION by the claimants under a policy of insurance for an order that a clause in the policy by which the parties agreed to submit disputes to arbitration and a provision in the policy that an award under the agreement should be a condition precedent to the bringing of an action against the insurers should cease to have effect, and that the stay of all further proceedings in an action by the claimants for indemnity under the policy be removed.

- E The policy was in respect of damage by fire, and, in addition to the arbitration clause, it contained, inter alia, a clause that, if any claim thereunder were in any respect fraudulent, or if fraudulent means or devices were used by the insured or anyone acting on his behalf to obtain any benefit under the policy, all benefit thereunder should be forfeited. On Feb. 9, 1953, the insurers repudiated a claim by the claimants for indemnity under the policy on the ground that fraudulent means or devices had been used by the claimants within the meaning of the policy, and the claimants thereupon commenced an action against the insurers in respect of their claim. On May 21, 1953, on an application by the insurers, Master BAKER made an order under the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 4 (1), staying the proceedings in the action. On June 12, 1953, BARRY, J., dismissed an appeal from the order of the master without prejudice to the claimants' right to apply for an order, under s. 24 (2) of the Act of 1950, that the arbitration clause contained in the policy should cease to have effect. As doubts had arisen whether an application for an order under s. 24 (2) could be heard by a single judge, the motion was set down in the Divisional Court List.

BULSTRODE v. LAMBERT.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), July 14, 15, 1953.]

Easement—Right of way—Right to “pass and re-pass” over yard “with or without vehicles”—No such user at time of reservation—Implied right to halt vehicles in yard for purpose of unloading and loading—Failure to exercise right for some years.

The plaintiff and his father were estate agents and auctioneers. In 1921 the father became the owner in fee simple of two semi-detached houses, known as No. 11 and No. 13 S. Road, and of premises behind them which he and the plaintiff used as an auction mart. On the west side of No. 13 was a yard, sixteen feet wide, leading to the main door of the mart, and on the east side of No. 11 was a smaller yard, some eleven feet wide, which led to a small door in the mart. In the yard, near this door, was a garage, and the immediate approach to the mart on this side was only some seven to eight feet wide. In 1944 the plaintiff's father sold No. 11, together with the yard and garage to the east of the house, to the defendant's predecessors in title. The conveyance, dated Oct. 10, 1944, contained a reservation in the following terms: “except and reserving unto the vendor his tenants and workmen and others authorised by him the right to pass and re-pass with or without vehicles over and along [the yard] for the purpose of obtaining access to the building at the rear of the . . . premises and known as the auction mart”. At the time of the conveyance it was impossible for large furniture vans to enter the yard of No. 11, as inside the entrance was a double gate, six feet wide, with a small gate adjoining it on one side and a fence on the other. In 1950 the plaintiff's father died and the plaintiff became the owner of No. 13 and the auction mart. In 1951 the defendant purchased No. 11, and he then removed the double gate and improved the yard. Before he did so, pedestrians leaving the mart might, occasionally, have crossed the yard, but furniture had never been carried to or from the mart across the yard. The plaintiff now claimed that he was entitled, under the reservation in the conveyance, to bring furniture vans into the yard, to allow them to remain in the yard for half an hour or an hour for the purpose of unloading and loading, and to allow his men to carry the furniture through the narrow part of the yard to the auction mart.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the reservation in the conveyance, the plaintiff had a right of way over the whole yard for the purposes of his business, including the right to enter with goods vehicles of any size appropriate to pass down the yard, and that right was not affected by the fact that there was a double gate, only six feet wide, at the entrance to the yard at the time of the conveyance; the failure to exercise the right under the grant for several years did not prejudice the plaintiff's right to exercise it when he found it convenient to do so: dictum of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Keewatin Power Co., Ltd. v. Lake of the Woods Milling Co., Ltd. ([1930] A.C. 657), applied; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to bring furniture vans and other heavy vehicles on to the yard as far as they could go, and to transport the furniture and other chattels from the vehicles by hand past the garage into the auction mart.

Dictum of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Cannon v. Villars (1878) (8 Ch.D. 421), applied.

(ii) the plaintiff was entitled to keep his vehicles in the yard for such time as was necessary to unload and load them, this being an incident of the easement and ancillary thereto.

ACTION AND COUNTERCLAIM.

The plaintiff claimed (i) a declaration that he was entitled to a right of way from Stour Road, Christchurch, in the county of Hants, over and along a certain part of the defendant's premises, known as 11 Stour Road, to the plaintiff's auction mart at the rear of the premises, and back over the said way, for himself, his servants and licensees on foot and with vehicles at all times and for all purposes; (ii) a declaration that he was entitled in the proper exercise of the said right of way to halt vehicles outside the entrance to the auction mart as often and so long as might be necessary for the purpose of unloading and loading goods for delivery to or removal from the auction mart and for the purpose of depositing or taking on board persons proceeding to or from the auction mart; and (iii) an injunction restraining the defendant from obstructing the said right of way.

In 1919 the plaintiff's father purchased the leasehold interest in No. 11 and No. 13 Stour Road and the premises behind them, which latter premises became known as the auction mart, and from that time he and the plaintiff carried on there the business of estate agents and auctioneers, holding an auction in the mart, on alternate Thursdays, of freehold properties and furniture and other chattels. The houses, No. 11 and No. 13 Stour Road, were semi-detached. On the west side of No. 13 was a yard, some sixteen feet wide, leading to the mart, the entrance to which, on this side, was by large sliding doors. On the east side of No. 11 was a smaller yard, some eleven feet wide at the entrance and then becoming wider, which also led to the mart. The entrance to the mart, on this side, was by a small door, some three feet six inches wide. The immediate approach to this door through the yard was only some seven to eight feet wide, as at this end of the yard was a shed, which was later used as a garage. In 1921 the plaintiff's father acquired the freehold reversion of all the above-mentioned properties. In 1944 he sold to the defendant's predecessors in title the premises known as No. 11 Stour Road, including the yard and garage to the east of the house and a yard immediately to the north, but reserving a right of way over the yard to the mart. The deed of conveyance, which was dated Oct. 10, 1944, was made by the father, as vendor, of the one part, and Mr. and Mrs. F. Flewker, as purchasers, of the other part, and, in consideration of the sum of £1,500 paid to him by the purchasers, the vendor, as beneficial owner, conveyed No. 11 Stour Road to the purchasers "except and reserving unto the vendor his tenants and workmen and others authorised by him the right to pass and re-pass with or without vehicles over and along the land coloured brown on [the plan attached to the conveyance] for the purpose of obtaining access to the building at the rear of the said premises and known as the auction mart."

The land coloured brown on the plan was the yard of No. 11. At the time of the conveyance there was a double gate situated some six feet within the entrance of this yard. Each part of the gate was three feet wide and was hinged on a substantial beam which was fixed to the ground. To the west of the double gate was a small gate, and to the east a fence. Some six to eight feet above the double gate was a permanently fixed beam.

In 1950 the plaintiff's father died and the plaintiff became the owner of the auction mart and No. 13 Stour Road. In 1951 the defendant purchased No. 11, and since then he had carried on, on the premises, the business of a guest house and restaurant proprietor and of a car-hire proprietor. The guests in the guest house normally used a door which gave access to the yard, and the defendant kept the car which he drove for hire in the garage in the yard. After purchasing the premises, the defendant removed the double gate near the entrance as it was in a bad condition, and during 1951 and 1952 he greatly improved the yard. Until then the plaintiff had never used the defendant's yard for carrying furniture to or from the mart, but pedestrians leaving the mart might, occasionally, have crossed the yard. After the gate had been removed and the yard improved, the plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to bring into the yard large vans carrying furniture to be auctioned in the mart, to unload the vans in the yard, and to let his men carry the furniture through the narrow part of the yard into the mart. By his counterclaim the defendant claimed that the reservation in the deed of conveyance was limited to a user of the yard for persons or passenger vehicles, and that it did not include the right to halt a vehicle in the yard except for a brief space to put down a passenger.

H. E. Francis for the plaintiff.

I. G. H. Campbell for the defendant.

UPJOHN, J., stated the facts, and said: The plaintiff claims that, to bring furniture for sale to the auction mart, he is entitled to bring large vans into the defendant's yard, to unload them there, and to let his men carry the furniture through the narrow part of the yard by the door into the auction mart. Not unnaturally, the defendant finds that a cause of great inconvenience. While furniture is being unloaded, a van may be in the yard for half an hour or an hour, and, while it is there it obstructs the light into the kitchen, makes it difficult to use the door giving access from the guests' rooms on to the yard, which is the normal method of ingress and egress, and, also, makes it difficult, if not impossible, to get to the coal shed, the boiler house, the outside water closet, the store room and the refuse bins. It is also a source of further grave inconvenience to the defendant if a van is unloading when he wants to get his car out of his garage in response to some call for hire, as he has to wait until the back parts of the van are locked up and the van is moved into the road, all of which takes time. Therefore, the defendant is, naturally, greatly concerned at this user by the plaintiff, but that fact cannot affect the rights of the parties, whatever they may be, under the conveyance. The plaintiff claims to use the defendant's yard only when he is extremely busy and when the yard to the west of No. 13 is not available by reason of it being blocked up by vans already there. I gathered that the user of the defendant's yard was not frequent, but that, again, cannot affect the parties' rights, whatever they may be.

To construe the deed of conveyance, I must know the facts at the time of the grant. As is stated in GALE ON EASEMENTS, 12th ed., p. 315:

"In the case of a grant the language of the instrument can be referred to. It is for the court to construe that language, and, in the absence of any clear indication of the intention of the parties, the maxim that a grant must be construed most strongly against a grantor must be applied. In particular, in construing a grant the court will consider (1) the locus in quo over which the way is granted; (2) the nature of the terminus ad quem; and (3) the purpose for which the way is to be used."

In Callard v. Beeney (1) WRIGHT, J., said ([1930] 1 K.B. 360):

"As LORD WENSLEYDALE said in Lord Waterpark v. Fennell (2) (7 H.L.

Cas. 684): 'The construction of a deed is always for the court; but, in order to apply its provisions, evidence is in every case admissible of all material facts existing at the time of the execution of the deed, so as to place the court in the situation of the grantor'."

A The physical situation at the time of the grant in 1944 was very different from that which obtains today. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, and continued:] I am satisfied that until the defendant removed the gates and generally improved the state of his property in the yard, the plaintiff never used the yard for carrying furniture into the auction mart, although it may have been used occasionally by pedestrians who came away from the mart by that route. That fact, however, cannot affect the rights of the parties where their rights depend, not on user, but, as in this case, on an express grant. In Keewatin Power Co., Ltd. v. Lake of the Woods Milling Co., Ltd. (3) VISCOUNT DUNEDIN, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, said ([1930] A.C. 657):

B "When you are dealing with grant, the grantee may always, if he chooses, not exercise his right under the grant to the full without in any way prejudicing his full right if he finds it convenient to use it."

C That is all that has happened here. Therefore, the failure to exercise the right under the grant for several years, in the absence of any claim of abandonment—which would, obviously, be impossible to suggest in this case—is again irrelevant.

I turn to the construction of the deed in the light of the facts. It was submitted by the defendant that the deed must be construed against the grantor. I am not satisfied that that is correct. That rule, which applies to exceptions, does not, I think, apply to a reservation, but I need not say anything more on that point. D Counsel for the defendant contended that, if one looked at all the circumstances, the nature of the locus in quo, the nature of the terminus ad quem, and the purpose for which the yard was used, one found that it was an easement for the passage of persons only and not for the passage of goods. He pointed out that the main means of access to the auction mart was, not the defendant's yard, but the yard to No. 13, that the door to the mart from the defendant's yard was only some three feet six inches wide, and that the reservation in the deed was for the purpose of obtaining access, not to business premises, but merely to the business described as an auction mart. He further contended that the easement must be confined to hand vehicles or personnel vehicles because only personnel vehicles could have passed through the double gate which was inside the entrance to the yard in 1944 and was only some six feet wide. He pointed out that lorries, and especially large pantechnicons used in the furnishing trade, varied in width up to seven feet six inches, and, therefore, he submitted that, on the true construction of the reservation, it was intended that the yard should be used only for the passage of persons in ordinary private cars to the back door of the auction mart and not for the carriage of goods.

E I am unable to accept that submission. The reservation is for "the vendor his tenants and workmen"—I think that those words are important—"to pass and re-pass with or without vehicles"—there is no limitation whatever on the vehicles—"over and along the land coloured brown" on the plan. In my judgment, the true effect of those words, viz., that there is a right of way over and along the land coloured brown, cannot be affected by the circumstance that at the date of the grant there was the gate and bar across the entrance to the yard. The words of the grant are plain and unambiguous, and, in my judgment, the plaintiff has a right over the whole of the yard, and not merely a right to enter through the double gate some six feet in width. Not only that: he has a right to enter it "with . . . vehicles". That must mean vehicles of any size appropriate to go down the yard, and, as the yard is at no stage, until the garage is reached, less than eleven feet wide, there seems to be no reason why a pantechnicon should not use the yard. Furthermore, the object of the reservation is made perfectly plain. It is "for the purpose of obtaining access to the building at the rear of the said premises and known as the auction mart."

The vendor and his workmen and others authorised by him are entitled to use that way for that purpose, and it seems to me clear that the whole object and purpose of the reservation was to give to the plaintiff an alternative means of getting to his business premises, and that includes, in the case of an auction mart, bringing goods for sale on those premises.

Counsel for the plaintiff cited a passage from the well-known judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Cannon v. Villars (4), which, I think, is helpful on this point, although it is clear, as counsel for the defendant pointed out, that the Master of the Rolls was dealing there, not with a particular grant of a right of way, but with a grant of a right of way per se. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (8 Ch.D. 421):

"Again, if the road is not to a dwelling-house but to a factory, or a place used for business purposes which would require heavy weights to be brought to it, or to a wool warehouse which would require bags or packages of wool to be brought to it, then a grant of right of way would include a right to use it for reasonable purposes, sufficient for the purposes of the business, which would include the right of bringing up carts and waggons at reasonable times for the purpose of the business."

It seems to me that that is exactly what the parties had in mind when the reservation in the conveyance of 1944 was made, and I am quite satisfied that on its true construction the plaintiff is entitled to bring on this yard pantechicons and other heavy vehicles and to transport from those vehicles the furniture and other chattels, by the door at the end of the yard, into the auction mart.

It was said, however, that, as it was impossible for a large van to get to the door, there was no right in the plaintiff to stop his vans short of the garage and to carry furniture and chattels from that point to the door by hand. I am unable to accept that submission. The way may be used partly with a vehicle and partly on foot. If, owing to the existence of the garage, it is impossible to get a van to the door, I see nothing to prevent the plaintiff from bringing a van as far along the yard as it can be brought and then transporting the furniture by hand, past the garage, into the mart. There is, however, this to be said. There is, no doubt, great inconvenience to the defendant, and the plaintiff is under a duty to minimise that. It is his duty, for instance, so to back in his vehicles, or to see that customers bringing the furniture so back in their vehicles, as to leave ample space for the defendant and his licensees to use the means of egress from the door of the defendant's house into the side of the yard, either for the purpose of going out on to the road or for the purpose of going to the boiler house, the coal cellar, the water closet, or the store house. There is ample room for them to do that, and if the plaintiff's customers' vehicles do not give that amount of room, then, in my judgment, the defendant will have a just cause of complaint. It is also the plaintiff's duty to move any vehicles out if at any time the defendant desires to get his car out from the garage.

So far, therefore, I have no doubt that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, but a more difficult question is: Is he entitled to halt on the yard while the vans, his own or his customers', are unloading, an operation which takes half an hour to an hour? If the right which the plaintiff has under the deed of conveyance does not include that right, then the right of way is virtually useless to him. That, again, is, perhaps, an immaterial consideration. The whole question is: What is the true construction of the reservation in the deed of conveyance? Counsel for the defendant contended, with much force, that it was merely a right "to pass and re-pass . . . over and along" the right of way, and that a right to pass and re-pass was something which connoted motion. "To pass" is defined in the OXFORD DICTIONARY as: "To go, proceed, move onward". Therefore, said counsel for the defendant, the right to pass did not include a right to halt.

He conceded that, in the case of the ordinary putting down of a passenger, there must be a halt for a brief moment, but that was a matter de minimis, and he submitted that it was for the vendor to insert appropriate words in the reservation if he wished to exercise the right to halt for an hour or more while unloading.

- Curiously enough the point seems to be without authority. I have to look at the words of the reservation to see what is intended. The yard is a cul-de-sac and, therefore, every vehicle that goes in must, at some time, come out, and it must halt in that process. The plaintiff concedes that a vehicle may halt only for so long as is necessary to load or unload the furniture, and that there is no other right to halt in the yard. The whole object of the reservation is for the purpose of the vendor, his workmen and others obtaining access to the auction room. What is the object of that? It is to get access to business premises, with or without vehicles. Therefore, as I have already held, the plaintiff can, in my judgment, bring goods in the vehicles to his auction room. If he is entitled to do that, then he must, of necessity, in my judgment, be entitled to unload them. And if he is entitled to unload them, he must, per contra, be entitled to load them. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff must be entitled to remain in the yard for such time as is necessary to enable him to enjoy his easement of bringing vehicles into the yard, that is, for such time as it takes to load or unload lorries.
- C This right is only an incident of easement and may be described as ancillary to the easement, because without the right he cannot substantially enjoy that which has been reserved to him.

The principle is well stated by LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Pullbach Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Woodman (5), where he said ([1915] A.C. 646):

- D “My Lords, the right claimed is in the nature of an easement, and apart from implied grants of ways of necessity, or of what are called continuous and apparent easements, the cases in which an easement can be granted by implication may be classified under two heads. The first is where the implication arises because the right in question is necessary for the enjoyment of some other right expressly granted.”

- E It seems to me that the right of coming on the defendant's yard to get to the auction mart is virtually useless to the plaintiff unless he can unload his vehicles there, and, therefore, he must have the right to keep his vehicles there while he unloads and loads them, and I think that the principle which I have just read is applicable here. Accordingly, the plaintiff succeeds in this action, and I must make declarations accordingly.

Rent Control—Reasonable rent—Application by deserted wife in occupation of matrimonial home—Husband the tenant—No authority to act as husband's agent—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 1 (1).

The applicant was the wife of the tenant of a dwelling-house which was subject to the provisions of the Rent Control Acts. The husband had deserted the wife who remained in possession of the house, which was the matrimonial home. The wife, claiming to be entitled to act as the husband's agent, but without any authority from him, applied to a rent control tribunal under s. 1 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, to determine what rent was reasonable for the house, but the tribunal refused to entertain the application on the ground that she was not the tenant of the house. On a motion by her for mandamus directing the tribunal to hear and determine the application,

HELD: the only person who could apply to the tribunal to fix a reasonable rent was the tenant; the wife was not the tenant, nor had she the authority of the tenant to make the application on his behalf; and, therefore, she was not entitled to make the application and no order for mandamus would be granted.

"as agent for and on behalf of her husband Douglas William Dunn, pursuant to s. 1 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, to determine the reasonable rent of Flat 2, Royston Court, 1 Spencer Road, Chiswick, in the county of Middlesex, whereof the said Douglas William Dunn is the tenant and one A. Stokes the landlord."

The house, to which the Rent Control Acts apply, was demised by Mr. Stokes to Mr. Dunn at a certain rent. Mr. Dunn and Mrs. Dunn have parted, and I assume that the husband deserted the wife, although I do not know that that point has been decided by any court. Mrs. Dunn, having been granted maintenance by the High Court to the amount of £500 a year, and finding that the rent reserved imposed a strain on her, applied to the tribunal to reduce the rent. She first of all applied in her own name, and that application was rejected by the tribunal—in my opinion, rightly—because she was not the tenant of the house, so she sought to avoid the consequences of that decision by applying on behalf of her husband as his agent. Such a case has never arisen before and is illustrative of the inconveniences and difficulties which arise where one has to apply a statute which interferes with the freedom of contract.

This house is subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts and so the husband cannot sue his wife for ejectment, for a series of decisions, more particularly, Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (1), Middleton v. Baldock (2) and Bendall v. McWhirter (3), have established that, if a wife is deserted by her husband, she has a right to remain in the matrimonial home and, so long as she pays the rent and performs the covenants, if that matrimonial home is subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, she cannot be dispossessed. As I understand the ratio of the

- A decisions in the Court of Appeal she becomes a licensee of a very special character. The mere fact that she is the wife gives her an implied authority from the husband to remain in possession of the premises, and she can remain in possession so long as she pays the rent and performs the covenants. The husband has given notice in the present case, as husbands have done in other cases which have been the subject of decisions in the Court of Appeal, that he does not want to remain in the house. It has not yet, so far as I know, been decided whether in those circumstances the husband who is willing to give up the house to his landlord, but cannot give the landlord vacant possession because the wife is there, remains liable for the rent, but I will assume for the moment that he does. He does not pay it, but the wife does, and so long as the wife pays the landlord the rent, the landlord cannot, by reason of the Rent Restrictions Acts, recover possession of the house.

- C That, however, does not seem to me to make the wife the husband's agent. The husband may have given the wife authority to remain in the house, but, so far as I can see, he has not given her authority to act as his agent. It is a very special and anomalous character with which, by the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal, the wife has been clothed. Her licence to remain in possession cannot be revoked by the husband and her possession cannot be assailed by the landlord so long as he receives the rent, but I cannot see that these cases in the Court of Appeal have clothed her with any further positive rights. The only passage which, I think, can be prayed in aid is a passage in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., in Bendall v. McWhirter (3), in which he said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1311):

- E "The authority [to remain in the house] is, of course, purely personal to her. She alone can exercise it. She cannot assign it. It does not give her any legal interest in the land. She may, perhaps, sub-let some of the rooms so as to help keep herself, but even then, she does so, not out of any legal interest of her own in the land, but on the presumed authority of her husband."

- F No other judgment of any lord justice has gone as far as that, and it should be observed that that is only dictum. The learned lord justice does not purport to decide that the wife can sub-let some of the rooms; he only says that, perhaps, she may sub-let some of the rooms. I think that point is left open, and, so far as the position of the wife as agent for the husband is concerned, I know of no doctrine of the common law which confers an authority on the wife other than an authority to pledge her husband's credit for necessities. That, I think, is the extent of the authority which a wife has as agent for her husband. She can, for instance, taking a case which is not complicated by the Rent Restrictions Acts, if she is deserted by her husband, take rooms, or lodgings, or, possibly, a house on the credit of her husband if she can find anybody who will let premises to her on the terms that he might have to recover the rent from the husband on the ground that the wife had authority to pledge his credit.

- H Speaking for myself, I am not prepared to extend the privileges or the position of the wife to the extent that she can exercise a right which her husband as tenant could have exercised, because she is not the tenant of the house. The only person who can apply to have the rent reduced is the tenant. The cases, at any rate, decide one thing, and that is that the wife is not the tenant of the house, and, if she is not the tenant of the house, I do not see myself how she can get the right to go to the tribunal and ask for a reduction. I do not think that it is desirable to confer that right on her. After all, if a person takes a house and agrees to pay the rent, many people would consider that he ought to pay the rent he has agreed to pay. The husband in this case has never complained about the rent he agreed to pay. He has not asked, and does not want to ask, the tribunal to say that the landlord is charging an excessive rent. Why should the wife be entitled, because she chooses to remain in the house, to say to the tribunal: "The rent which my husband agreed to pay and did pay and has always been willing to pay as long as he lived in the house is excessive"? Why should she be entitled to ask the tribunal to break a contract which the husband made with the landlord and has never sought to repudiate? I can find nothing in the cases in the Court of Appeal which oblige, or, indeed, entitle, me to hold that the wife is the agent for the husband to exercise any right which the husband might exercise. The only agency there is in a wife is to pledge the husband's credit in a case where the husband has not provided for her. This wife has been provided by the husband with £500 a year and £100 for the child of the marriage. That is by an order of the court, so she cannot say that she has not got provision made for her by her husband. I do not think that she has shown any decision which would oblige me to hold that she has any authority from her husband, either express or implied, merely because she is clothed with this particular special position as a licensee, entitling her to apply to the tribunal. In my opinion, the tribunal were justified in refusing to entertain her application, and this motion must fail.

PARKER, J.: I agree so entirely with what my Lord has said that I do not think I can usefully add anything.

DONOVAN, J.: Section 1 of the Act of 1949 allows a tenant to make an application to the tribunal for reduction of rent. The applicant before us is not the tenant. The Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1096), reg. 7, made under the Act contemplates that at the hearing of an application the tenant may be represented by his agent. The applicant before us is not her husband's agent. We are asked to say that she should be treated as the agent of her husband for the purposes both of making the application and prosecuting it although the husband repudiates any such agency, and it is said that we should be justified in so doing because of the decisions which lay down that a wife who has been deserted by her husband has a right to "live" or "stay" in the matrimonial home on the terms of her husband's tenancy. It is merely a logical extension of this right, it is argued, to allow her to exercise her husband's statutory right to go to the rent tribunal. The decisions in question are directed to preserving a deserted wife's right to remain in the matrimonial home, and it is not necessary to the preservation of that right that the wife should have a further right to apply for reduction of rent. If that were granted to her, it would, in my view, not be a logical extension of her rights as a licensee under a presumed irrevocable licence from her husband, but it would be a new departure altogether and a bridging of a void which has been left, wittingly or unwittingly, by Parliament. In my view, Parliament alone can give the right which is sought here, and I, therefore, agree with the judgments already delivered.

Motion dismissed.

HAWES v. EVENDEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), July 22, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—Claim by tenant's mistress to remain in possession—Parties and children living as a family—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

The defendant had lived with the tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts as his mistress for some twelve years prior to his death. There were two children, one of whom had been adopted by foster parents, while the second child was living with her parents at the date of the tenant's death and thereafter had continued to live with the defendant at the house. After the tenant's death the landlord claimed possession of the house from the defendant who contended that she was entitled to protection under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act, as a member of the deceased tenant's family.

HELD: since the evidence justified a finding that the tenant, the defendant, and their children all lived together as a family, the defendant was a member of the deceased tenant's family within s. 12 (1) (g), and was, therefore, entitled to the protection of the sub-section.

Principle stated by COHEN, L.J., in Brock v. Wollams ([1949] 1 All E.R. 718), applied.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE DONE at Clerkenwell County Court, dated Apr. 27, 1953.

The defendant, Miss Evenden, had lived with a Mr. Randall, the tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, as his mistress for some twelve or thirteen years prior to his death. Two children had been born of the union, one of whom had been adopted by foster parents, while the younger, who was some eight years old at the date of the proceedings, was living at the house in question with her parents when her father died and thereafter continued to live there with her mother. After the tenant's death the landlord claimed possession of the premises, but the defendant claimed the protection of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as a member of the deceased tenant's family. The county court judge held that the defendant was protected by the section and refused an order for possession.

R. B. Willis for the landlord.

Miss S. F. Norwood for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The only question before the court is whether the defendant had the right to stay on in the house under the provisions of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which provides:

"... the expression 'tenant' includes the widow of a tenant . . . who was residing with him at the time of his death or, where a tenant . . . leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

In Gammans v. Ekins (1) a man and a woman had been living together for some years in a house. They were not married, the man had taken the woman's name, and they were regarded in the neighbourhood as man and wife. The woman, who was the tenant, died, and the man claimed the protection of s. 12 (1) (g). It was held that he could not be a member of the deceased tenant's family, but the question whether the result would or might have been different if there had been children was left open. We are here dealing with a case where there are children and where the claim is put forward by their mother. As was pointed out by ASQUITH, L.J., in Gammans v. Ekins (1) ([1950] 2 All E.R. 141), a husband has been held to be a member of his wife's family, and an adopted child a member of the family of the adopting parent. A

The basic principle which has been referred to a number of times as the test which should be applied to these matters was laid down by COHEN, L.J., in Brock v. Wollams (2), where he said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 718):

"... the question the learned county court judge should have asked himself was: Would an ordinary man, addressing his mind to the question whether Mrs. Wollams was a member of the family or not, have answered 'Yes' or 'No'?" B

The learned county court judge after summarising the facts and the evidence in the present case, said:

"They all lived together as a family. He treated and acknowledged the children as his own and they used his surname. She did not take his name. She said it would have made no difference as all the neighbours knew they were not married. Parents and children continued to live together in this way up to Randall's death." C

In her evidence the defendant said that the original suggestion was that she should go to the house as a housekeeper and in one part of her evidence she referred to wages. It seems to me, however, perfectly plain from her evidence as a whole that she went as the tenant's mistress, and that she received from him small sums from time to time for the general housekeeping expenses. There is nothing in the evidence to challenge the learned judge's findings that they all lived together as a family. Later in his judgment he followed the language which JENKINS, L.J., used in Gammans v. Ekins (1) ([1950] 2 All E.R. 142), when he said: D

"There was here in fact 'the equivalent of a marriage with the natural consequences of a marriage'." E

He then held that on the facts of the case not only the children, but also their mother, were members of the tenant's family. From that decision the landlord appeals and the question left open in Gammans v. Ekins (1) falls to be decided. F

In my view the learned judge was right and he put the right question to himself. The mere fact that someone living in a house, possibly as one of a number of domestic servants, has had a child by the tenant and the tenant makes provision for the child would not in itself, I think, constitute the father and the mother of the child a family within the meaning of the section, but here the evidence justifies a finding that they all lived together as a family, and so, applying the test indicated by COHEN, L.J., I think that the defendant is a member of the family within s. 12 (1) (g). In those circumstances I would dismiss the appeal. G

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. H

HODSON, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

FREDERICK E. ROSE (LONDON), LTD. v. WM. H. PIM, JUNR.
& CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.JJ.), June 29, 30, July 16, 1953.]

Contract—Rectification—Mistake—Written contract correctly stating terms agreed orally—Mutual error as to meaning of expression used.

A

Having received an inquiry for a supply of "horsebeans described here as feveroles", and not knowing that feveroles were a special medium size variety of horsebeans, buyers asked sellers what they were and were informed that feveroles and horsebeans were the same thing. The two parties being under this misapprehension, the buyers entered into an oral agreement for the purchase from the sellers of five hundred tons of Tunisian horsebeans, the agreement being incorporated in a written contract. The buyers subsequently brought an action for the rectification of the written contract by the addition of the word "feveroles" after the words "Tunisian horsebeans".

HELD: the oral agreement was for the sale of horsebeans, and, notwithstanding the mutual mistake as to the meaning of "feveroles" and "horsebeans", as the written contract correctly expressed that oral agreement, it could not be rectified.

D

Per DENNING, L.J.: A previous continuing common intention is not sufficient to justify rectification unless it has found expression in outward agreement (disapproving a dictum of SIMONDS, J., in Crane v. Hegeman-Harris Co. Inc. [1939] 1 All E.R. 664).

APPEAL by the defendants (the sellers) from an order of PILCHER, J., dated Jan. 23, 1953, granting rectification of two written contracts of sale by the insertion of the word "feveroles" after the words "Tunisian horsebeans" and "Algerian horsebeans" in the specifications of the goods sold appearing respectively in the two contracts.

The sellers contended that there was no ground for rectification in law since the written contracts correctly stated the terms agreed orally between the parties.

T. G. Roche for the sellers.

Diplock, Q.C., Eustace Roskill, Q.C., and Bateson for the buyers.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 16. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This dispute arises out of two contracts for the sale of North African horsebeans. The buyers and the sellers carry on business in the city of London. The representative of the former in these transactions was Mr. Hampson. The sellers have a considerable business in North African products. The buyers have an associated company in Egypt, which is conveniently referred to as Rose (Middle East). On Oct. 26, 1950, Rose (Middle East) sent a cable to the buyers in these terms:

"Have inquiry Egypt up to five hundred tons Moroccan horsebeans described here as feveroles. Please offer c.i.f. Port Said single and double bags indicating admixture."

Mr. Hampson was ignorant of the meaning of the French word "feveroles", and he, accordingly, communicated with Mr. Brooks, who was well known to him, and who was the representative of the sellers. As at the trial the judge accepted the evidence of Mr. Hampson, I think it desirable that I should refer to it. Mr. Hampson was asked: "Why did you pick on [the sellers] and Mr. Brooks?", and he answered:

"I chose [the sellers] because I have known for many years past that they have a very important connection in North Africa and I had always understood that the shippers in North Africa whom they represent are easily the biggest firm in North Africa. I also chose them because I have known Mr. Brooks for a matter of twenty-five years or more and, as I was in some little difficulty in dealing with something I had never handled before, I felt I could rely on Mr. Brooks as an old friend to help me to get the right thing. Q.—Had you ever come across the word 'feverole' before? A.—No. I had never seen it in my life. Q.—When you rang up Mr. Brooks what did you do? A.—I am quite certain that I quoted to him that part of the telegram which says 'five hundred tons Moroccan horsebeans described here as feveroles'. I am about ninety-nine per cent. certain that I read the whole telegram. (PILCHER, J.): The descriptive words? A.—Yes. (Counsel for the buyers): Did you refer to Egypt? A.—Yes. Q.—That is one of your one hundred per cent. certainties? A.—Yes, because I needed to buy them for shipment to Egypt. Q.—Having read out the telegram, did you ask him what 'feveroles' meant? A.—Yes. Q.—What did he reply? A.—Mr. Brooks said he did not know, but he would find out."

A few days later there was another conversation, of which Mr. Hampson said:

"I heard from Mr. Brooks that 'feveroles' just means horsebeans, and that the commodity that I needed to buy was Algerian/Tunisian/Moroccan horsebeans."

Thereafter there were offers and counter-offers which are shown in the documents, of which copies are before the court. It is important to bear in mind that both the buyers and sellers were middlemen. If there came about a contract between them, the sellers were buying from North Africa, and the buyers were to sell through Rose (Middle East) to Egypt. The matter came to a head on Nov. 2, 1950, and there was another conversation between Mr. Hampson and Mr. Brooks, of which Mr. Hampson's account is given in the transcript of the evidence, and I read it as far as is material. Mr Hampson said:

"On the 2nd [the sellers] came back and said they were unable to accept the bid of £30 10s., but they again made me a firm offer—all this was quite early in the morning—for reply back again in London at five

A o'clock on the same day, of Tunisian horsebeans, which they said were the best of the three countries concerned, Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco, and they offered these to me at £32. I also heard—it is difficult to say whether from [the sellers] or on the market—that there was a possibility of all these kinds of beans being freed from control in this country and I knew that the United Kingdom was short of them and I felt that, as soon as that news was known, the price was sure to go up, so I added a comment in my telegram giving that news. That was telephoned to the cable company at 10.50 in the morning. The reply had to be back in [the sellers'] hands by five o'clock on that day."

On that Mr. Hampson cabled to Rose (Middle East) a document:

B "Horsebeans firm here five today Tunisian which best quality thirty-two stop Believe about sellers' lowest paragraph very confidentially rumoured our government will restore to private trade within few days when rush buyers expected."

C He received a reply which reads: "Yours today booked five hundred horsebeans." Thereupon he accepted the sellers' offer, and there came into existence a string of contracts, three in number. They are all dated Nov. 2. The first is the sale by an Algerian company to the sellers of five hundred tons Tunisian horsebeans, fair average quality, at £32 a ton less 1½ per cent. The second records the sale by the sellers to the buyers of the like quantity and quality of Tunisian horsebeans at £32 a ton, and the third records the sale by the buyers to Noujaim of Port Said of the same quantity of horsebeans at £33 a ton, in each case c.i.f. Port Said. There was an arbitration clause in each of the contracts, which were on Form 62 of the London Corn Trade Association, and there was attached to each a slip containing provisions as to payment, and also providing:

E "Certificate: Certificate of cargo superintendents at shipment to be final as to weight, quality, condition and admixture. Cost of such certificate to be for sellers' account. Admixture: Any admixture of dirt and other foreign substance over four per cent. to be allowed for by sellers on certificate of cargo superintendents."

F Some four days later Mr. Brooks told Mr. Hampson that they could work a further two hundred tons of the same commodity, and there came into existence the contract of Nov. 7, 1950, between the buyers and the sellers for the sale of two hundred tons Algerian horsebeans, and corresponding contracts between the sellers and their sellers, and the buyers and their buyer, who in this case was one Bassionini of Alexandria, to which port shipment had to be arranged. As in the case of the earlier contract there was a slip attached in the same terms as before. It appears that the two hundred tons of Algerian horsebeans arrived first, and a complaint was made as to them. This is shown by the letter from the buyers, dated Dec. 11, to which the sellers replied. On Dec. 18 the buyers wrote to Rose (Middle East) a letter which relates to the five hundred tons of horsebeans which had been shipped in the s.s. Sylva. The buyers write:

H "We had arranged to assign the credit from Noujaim to [the sellers], but in view of the dispute over the Gunda [the ship on which the two hundred tons had been shipped] the writer went along to the Bank this morning and inspected the certificate issued by cargo superintendents. A note of the salient points on the certificate (which is a printed form) is enclosed herewith. On seeing the goods described as 'Feves de Tunisie' we immediately objected and said that we would not accept 'feves' as equivalent to horsebeans. The bank thereupon refused to make a payment to [the sellers] and we understand this evening from [the sellers] that they are arranging to put the matter right, having telephoned to Paris on the subject. Exactly what steps their shipper is taking is not yet clear but we are watching the position very closely. We have been making a few inquiries on the Baltic from various people to check up on these matters, particularly as regards the nomenclature of the beans. One man tells us that there is only one sort of bean shipped from North Africa and that they are all horsebeans. Another man contradicts that and says that broad beans are also shipped and that they are known as 'feveroles' which is what you originally asked for in your cable of Oct. 26. We may mention here that we used the word 'feveroles' when first speaking to [the sellers] and that they assured us that the translation of 'feveroles' was 'horsebeans'. It seems to be agreed that there are both f.a.q. horsebeans and 'small horsebeans' to be had, but they are all 'horsebeans' and one has to specify 'small' if one wants that sub-division. Another comment is that whatever one may call them in English all the beans which are shipped from North Africa are called in 'French' 'feves'. In spite of this we shall not accept this word on the cargo superintendents' certificate as being sufficient. It would be very interesting if you could let us know from your end, where it is much easier to get English/French translations accurately, what you consider is the exact equivalent of 'horsebeans' and 'broad beans' and also what 'favettes' or 'fevettes' are."

This shows the complete uncertainty as to what was understood by the word "feveroles", and it brings in the question of "feves", also "favettes" and "fevettes". That is after inquiries had been made in the market by the buyers. That uncertainty has not been cleared up, though it appears that both are horsebeans, and that "feves" are larger than "feveroles", although that does not appear from the letter which I have read, but rather the contrary. In the correspondence there is a copy of a letter from the buyers to the sellers dated Dec. 18, 1950, which reads:

"Our purchase of Algerian and Tunisian horsebeans. In view of the difficulties which seem to be arising in connection with our two contracts with you, we should like to remind you of the circumstances leading up to our transaction. We received on Oct. 27, from our Alexandria associates, the following telegram which we believe we read out in full to your Mr. Brooks: 'Have inquiry Egypt up to five hundred tons Moroccan horsebeans described here as feveroles. Please offer c.i.f. Port Said single and double bags indicating admixture.' We are quite certain that we told you that our inquiry was for feveroles, because we ourselves were not sure at that time of the exact translation. Mr. Brooks consulted others in the firm and told us that 'feveroles' meant 'horsebeans' and that f.a.q. Algerian/Tunisian/Moroccan was the commodity intended. In telegraphing backwards and forwards to Alexandria we used the word 'horsebeans' all through, and your contract to us was also on this basis and our contract to our buyers the same. On examining the cargo superintendents' certificate today for the shipment per Sylva we found that the description of quality was 'Feves de Tunisie'. We feel quite sure that you will agree that 'feve' is a word which can only be translated as 'bean' and that it covers quite a variety of different types. Clearly 'feve' is not the same as 'horsebean', and therefore we instructed the bank that we could not agree to their accepting this certificate. We are pleased to note that you are arranging to put this right. The above circumstances naturally tend somewhat to make us feel that the buyer of the shipment per Gunda has right on his side in claiming that the beans shipped were not 'horsebeans'. However, we are purely intermediaries in the matter and have no desire to do other than clear it up as quickly and as satisfactorily as possible."

The five hundred tons of Tunisian beans had been shipped in the s.s. Sylva, and when the documents were presented it was seen that the cargo superintendents' certificate showed, not horsebeans, but "feves de Tunisie"; and it is interesting to notice that the confirmation of sale between the sellers and the Algerian sellers showed the description as "feves" (horsebeans). The cargo superintendents' certificate was altered so as to put the documents in order. No point is made of this, as the alteration was made with the approval of both the buyers and the sellers. None the less, it appears somewhat odd, in view of the importance of the cargo superintendents' certificate.

- Disputes arose between the buyers and the sellers and were referred to
- A arbitration. The award of the arbitrators in regard to the five hundred tons was given on Mar. 2, 1951, and it was in favour of the sellers, and an award to the like effect was made on July 18, 1951, in respect of the second contract. Appeals were entered, but stand adjourned. Proceedings were taken in the courts of Egypt by the buyers of the two hundred tons. After an incursion into the Chancery Court the buyers commenced this action against the sellers. By their
- B statement of claim they claimed rectification of both contracts by the addition of the word "feveroles" after the words "Tunisian horsebeans" and "Algerian horsebeans" respectively, and also damages for breach of warranty. The latter claim was based on an allegation in the statement of claim that Mr. Brooks had warranted that goods described as Algerian/Tunisian/Moroccan horsebeans were goods commonly known in Egypt as "feveroles" and could be re-sold
- C in fulfilment of a requirement for "feveroles", and that in consideration of such warranties the buyers accepted the sellers' offers.

- During the hearing before PILCHER, J., the buyers abandoned their claim to damages for breach of warranty. It appears from the judgment that the reason given was that the sellers had pleaded s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as a defence to the claim. That could not provide an answer, in view of the fact that
- D the goods had been delivered and payment had been made. It is unnecessary to consider the merits of the claim except to say that, though it might have been difficult to establish in law, it is something which cannot be overlooked, as the pleader seems to have thought at one time.

- The action was heard before PILCHER, J., on Jan. 21 and 22, 1953, and he gave his judgment on Jan. 23. He held that the buyers' claim must succeed, and that
- E they were entitled to have the two forms of contract rectified by the addition of the word "feveroles" after the word "horsebeans". The sellers appeal against that judgment.

- Apart from any question of law, one sees at once the difficulty caused by the uncertainty as to the meaning of "feveroles". The first cable of Oct. 26, 1950, mentioned horsebeans described in Egypt as "feveroles", and that cable led to
- F discussions between Mr. Hampson and Mr. Brooks. I cannot say that it is clear from the evidence that the word "feveroles" has the same meaning everywhere, though it seems fairly clear that they are a type of horsebean. I have not thought it necessary to refer to the evidence of Mr. Brooks, as PILCHER, J., preferred the evidence of Mr. Hampson. It is, perhaps, not surprising that he did so. Some of Mr. Brooks's answers were not convincing. They appear to me
- G to show that he had very little knowledge of horsebeans, or of "feveroles", whatever impression he may have endeavoured to create. None the less, the judge said he had come to the conclusion that, at the time of the conversations, Mr. Brooks honestly believed that "North African horsebeans described in Egypt as 'feveroles'" were in fact the same commodity as "North African horsebeans, fair average quality." The judge said, further:

- H "As I have already indicated, Mr. Hampson knew what was wanted. Mr. Brooks knew what was wanted by Rose (Middle East). But Mr. Hampson had no idea what it was and Mr. Brooks honestly thought that what was required was just North African horsebeans. He was wrong. He innocently, in my view, misled Mr. Hampson, with the result that the sellers bought from the Compagnie Algerienne horsebeans which were broad beans or feves and which were not feveroles. They then passed this commodity on to the buyers, who in their turn sold it to their buyer. It is quite true that, from the moment people started putting pen or pencil to paper, the commodity was always described as Tunisian or Algerian horsebeans. That was solely because of the mutual mistake which had originated with Mr. Brooks and which had been accepted, as it were, by Mr. Hampson. In the result I find that both the buyers and the sellers, through their respective market agents, made an oral agreement in which they intended to deal in horsebeans of the feverole type. All the documents thereafter, owing to a mutual mistake, were made out as though the deal were an order for horsebeans or feves."

Innocent misrepresentation may give rise to a right of rejection. That right was not exercised in this case. And it might have been possible to establish a breach of a collateral warranty. Neither of these questions arises. The sole question is whether the buyers are entitled to rectification of the contracts. This depends, not on intention, but on proof that the written contract is not the contract into which the parties entered, and the terms of the contract into which they had entered must be clearly proved. In Crane v. Hegeman-Harris Co. Inc. (1) SIMONDS, J., said ([1939] 1 All E.R. 665):

"I would rather, I think, say that the court can only act if it is satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the instrument does not represent their common intention, and is further satisfied as to what their common intention was. For let it be clear that it is not sufficient to show that the written instrument does not represent their common intention unless positively also one can show what their common intention was. It is in the light of those principles that I must examine the facts of this somewhat complicated case."

When that case was before the Court of Appeal SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R. ([1939] 4 All E.R. 71) spoke of the "high degree of conviction which unquestionably is to be insisted upon in rectification cases."

I accept without hesitation the finding of PILCHER, J., that both Mr. Hampson and Mr. Brooks were under a mistaken view as to what "feveroles" or beans described in Egypt as "feveroles" were, and that that mistake came about as the result of what Mr. Brooks said. Still, it is necessary to ascertain what the contract was. That is shown by Mr. Hampson's evidence as to the conversation on Nov. 2. It is really all contained in the passage to which I come again:

"On the 2nd [the sellers] came back and said they were unable to accept the bid of £30 10s., but they again made me a firm offer—all this was quite early in the morning—for reply back again in London at five o'clock on the same day, of Tunisian horsebeans, which they said were the best of the three countries concerned, Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco, and they offered these to me at £32."

I need not read further.

The offer clearly was Tunisian horsebeans. It was so treated by the buyers in their cable to Rose (Middle East), who accepted it the same day. On acceptance by the buyers, a slip was made out in the sellers' office, and that formed the groundwork of the contract, as Mr. Turner, the director, said. The oral contract between the buyers and the sellers was in fact for five hundred tons of Tunisian horsebeans, and the written contract is in the same terms. In those circumstances, a claim to rectify the written contract by adding the word "feveroles" could not succeed. The written contract is in the same terms as the oral contract. Whatever remedies the buyers might have, or might have had, rectification is not one of them.

Counsel for the sellers submitted that either there was a contract for horsebeans or there was no contract at all. That seems to me to be right. I cannot accept the submission of counsel for the buyers that, because of the conversation some days before Nov. 2 to the effect that "feveroles" meant "horsebeans", the oral contract was a contract for the sale of "feveroles". We know that the sellers passed on to the buyers an offer for the sale of horsebeans. If it had been sought to introduce the word "feveroles" into the contract, it is almost certain that inquiries would have been made in North Africa, and some information might have been forthcoming as to the varieties of horsebeans, in which event Mr. Hampson and Mr. Brooks might not have agreed on terms, or they might have agreed on terms other than those at which they arrived. The same considerations apply to the second contract as to the first. I do not regard this as a case in which rectification can be granted. I am in favour of allowing the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The parties in this case have got involved over the meaning of some French words for some kinds of beans. The position is not altogether clear even now, but, so far as I understand it, it is this. In certain countries in North Africa, notably Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia, the people grow beans which are known in those countries as "feves", and in English as horsebeans. There is a special kind of them known as "feveroles", a word which has no exact equivalent in English, but which denotes horsebeans of medium size. There is another special kind called "fevettes", which denotes the very small horsebeans. The medium size and small size are more valuable than the large ones. The trouble in this case has all arisen because the English word "horsebeans" covers all the three varieties, "feves", "feveroles" and "fevettes", and the English business men did not realise that there were those three different varieties.

On Oct. 26, 1950, an English firm in Alexandria telegraphed to its London house in these words:

"Have inquiry Egypt up to five hundred tons Moroccan horsebeans described here as feveroles. Please offer c.i.f. Port Said."

The London house of the buyers did not know what "feveroles" were. So their market clerk, Mr. Hampson, got into touch with Mr. Brooks, of the sellers, who had much knowledge of the North African trade. Mr. Hampson read the telegram to Mr. Brooks and told him that the buyers wanted to make an offer in accordance with it. They wanted to supply "horsebeans described in Egypt as feveroles", but did not know what "feveroles" were. Mr. Brooks made inquiries of his colleagues, and, as a result, told Mr. Hampson: "What you want is horsebeans. 'Feveroles' just mean horsebeans. We can supply you with them, and I will get an offer for you." A few days later Mr. Brooks rang up Mr. Hampson and said that the sellers could supply five hundred tons of horsebeans at £33 a ton, whereupon the buyers, on Oct. 31, 1950, telegraphed to their Alexandria house a firm offer to supply "horsebeans" stating in the telegram: "Understand horsebeans exact translation feveroles." That was, of course, based on what Mr. Brooks had told Mr. Hampson. In all the negotiations thereafter the word "horsebeans" was used and not "feveroles", because it was an English word and the parties thought that it meant the same thing as "feveroles". Eventually, on Nov. 2, 1950, three written contracts were signed whereby: (1) the sellers agreed to buy from an Algerian company five hundred tons of Tunisian horsebeans at £32 per ton less 1½ per cent.; (2) the sellers agreed to sell to the buyers of London five hundred tons of Tunisian horsebeans at £32 per ton; and (3) the buyers of London agreed to sell to Messrs. Noujaim of Port Said five hundred tons of Tunisian horsebeans at £33 per ton. Payment was to be made by net cash against shipping documents by confirmed irrevocable letters of credit to be opened by buyers with a London bank.

In pursuance of these contracts, on Dec. 11, 1950, five hundred tons of horsebeans were shipped at Tunis for despatch to Egypt. The certificate of the cargo superintendents at Tunis at first described them as "Feves de Tunisie", whereupon the buyers told the bank not to honour the credit, because they could not accept "feves" as equivalent to horsebeans (they still thought that "feveroles" were horsebeans and that horsebeans were "feveroles"), whereupon the cargo superintendents altered the certificate so as to describe the goods as horsebeans, which they in fact were. Thereupon the conditions of the credit were fulfilled and the bank paid the price in exchange for the shipping documents. When the Egyptian buyer took delivery of the goods the mistake was discovered. He found that they were not "feveroles", but only "feves". He complained at once, but as he had already paid for the goods by means of the irrevocable credit, he did not reject them, but accepted them and claimed damages. It is quite plain that neither the Egyptian buyer nor the buyers could claim damages under the written contracts, because those contracts were contracts for horsebeans and the goods delivered were in fact horsebeans, and that has been so found by arbitrators in London. In those circumstances the buyers seek in this action to have their contract with the sellers rectified so as to make it refer to "feveroles" instead of horsebeans. If they get the contract rectified, they will claim damages for failure to deliver "feveroles". Their object in so doing is, of course, to cover themselves against a claim by their Egyptian buyers. We were told that the courts in Egypt have, on a similar parcel of two hundred tons, already held the buyers liable for not supplying "feveroles". Hence the desire of the buyers to be able to claim over against the sellers.

The facts which I have stated raise nice questions on the law of mistake. It is quite clear on the evidence that the parties to the second and third contracts (though not to the first) were under a common mistake. The sellers, the buyers and Noujaim all thought that "feveroles" meant horsebeans, and that horsebeans meant "feveroles". They thought that if they got horsebeans they would get the "feveroles" which they wanted. It was under the influence of that mistake that they entered into those contracts for horsebeans. The sellers were, of course, the cause of all the trouble. Thinking that "feveroles" just meant horsebeans, they asked their Algerian supplier to supply horsebeans, and he did so. They ought to have asked him to supply "feveroles", and then there would have been no trouble. The Algerian supplier, no doubt, knew the difference between horsebeans ("feves") and "feveroles". If he had been asked for "feveroles", he would have quoted for "feveroles" and supplied "feveroles", but being asked only for horsebeans, he supplied horsebeans.

What is the effect in law of this common mistake on the contract between the buyers and the sellers? Counsel for the sellers quoted Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd. (2), and suggested that the contract was a nullity and void from the beginning, though he shuddered at the thought of the consequences of so holding. I am clearly of opinion that the contract was not a nullity. It is true that both parties were under a mistake, and that the mistake was of a fundamental character with regard to the subject-matter. The goods contracted for—horsebeans—were essentially different from what they were believed to be—"feveroles". Nevertheless, the parties to all outward appearances were agreed. They had agreed with quite sufficient certainty on a contract for the sale of goods by description, namely, horsebeans. Once they had done that, nothing in their minds could make the contract a nullity from the beginning, though it might, to be sure, be a ground in some circumstances for setting the contract aside in equity. In Ryder v. Woodley (3), where a buyer contracted to buy a commodity described "St. Gilles Marais wheat", believing that it was wheat when it was not, the contract was held to be binding on him and not a nullity. In Harrison & Jones, Ltd. v. Bunten & Lancaster, Ltd. (4), where parties contracted for the supply of "Calcutta Kapok 'Sree' brand", both believing it to be pure kapok containing no cotton, whereas it in fact contained ten to twelve per cent. of cotton, PILCHER, J., held that their mistake, although fundamental, did not make the contract a nullity. In McRae v. Commonwealth Commission (5), where sellers contracted to sell a stranded oil tanker, described as lying at a specified point off Samarai, believing that there was a tanker at such a place when there was in fact no such tanker there, or anywhere in the locality, the High Court of Australia held that the mistake, although fundamental, did not make the contract a nullity, and that the buyers were entitled to damages.

A The court showed convincingly that Couturier v. Hastie (6) was a case of construction only. It was not a case where the contract was void for mistake. The other old cases at common law can likewise be explained.

At the present day, since the fusion of law and equity, the position appears to be that, when the parties to a contract are to all outward appearances in full and certain agreement, neither of them can set up his own mistake, or the mistake of both of them, so as to make the contract a nullity from the beginning. Even a common mistake as to the subject-matter does not make it a nullity. Once the contract is outwardly complete, the contract is good unless and until it is set aside for failure of some condition on which the existence of the contract depends, or for fraud, or on some equitable ground:

C have been set aside? I think it could, if the parties had acted in time. This contract was made under a common mistake as to the meaning of "feveroles" and "horsebeans". This mistake was induced by the innocent misrepresentation of the sellers, made to the buyers and passed on to the sub-buyers. As soon as the buyers and sub-buyers discovered the mistake they could, I think, have rejected the goods and asked for their money back. The fact that the contract
D was executed would not be a bar to rescission. But once the buyers and sub-buyers accepted the goods, and treated themselves as the owners of them, they could no longer claim rescission: see Leaf v. International Galleries (8).

The buyers now, after accepting the goods, seek to rectify the contract. Instead of its being a contract for "horsebeans" simpliciter, they seek to make it a contract for "horsebeans described in Egypt as feveroles" or, in short, a contract for "feveroles". The judge has granted their request. He has found that there was "a mutual and fundamental mistake" and that the sellers and the buyers, through their respective market clerks, "intended to deal in horsebeans of the feverole type". And he has held that, because that was their intention—their continuing common intention—the court could rectify their contract to give effect to it. In this I think he was wrong. Recti-

F fication is concerned with contracts and documents, not with intentions. In order to get rectification, it is necessary to show that the parties were in complete agreement on the terms of their contract, but by an error wrote them down wrongly. And in this regard, in order to ascertain the terms of their contract, you do not look into the inner minds of the parties—into their intentions—any more than you do in the formation of any other contract.

G You look at their outward acts, i.e., at what they said or wrote to one another in coming to their agreement, and then compare it with the document which they have signed. If you can predicate with certainty what their contract was, and that it is, by a common mistake, wrongly expressed in the document, then you rectify the document. But nothing less will suffice. It is not necessary that all the formalities of the contract should have been executed so as to

H make it enforceable at law: see Shipley Urban District Council v. Bradford Corpn. (9); but, formalities apart, there must have been a concluded contract. There is a passage in Crane v. Hegeman-Harris Co. Inc. (1) ([1939] 1 All E.R. 664, at "C"), which suggests that a continuing common intention alone will suffice, but I am clearly of opinion that a continuing common intention is not sufficient unless it has found expression in outward agreement. There could be no certainty at all in business transactions if a party who had entered into a firm contract could afterwards turn round and claim to have it rectified on the ground that the parties intended something different. He is allowed to prove, if he can, that they agreed something different: see Lovell & Christmas, Ltd. v. Wall (10), 104 L.T. 88, per LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and ibid., 93, per BUCKLEY, L.J.; but not that they intended something different.

The present case is a good illustration of the distinction. The parties, no doubt, intended that the goods should satisfy the inquiry of the Egyptian buyers, namely, "horsebeans described in Egypt as feveroles." They assumed that they would do so, but they made no contract to that effect. Their agreement, as outwardly expressed, both orally and in writing, was for "horsebeans". That is all that the sellers ever committed themselves to supply, and all they should be bound to. There was, no doubt, an erroneous assumption underlying the contract—an assumption for which it might have been set aside on the ground of misrepresentation or mistake—but that is very different from an erroneous expression of the contract, such as to give rise to rectification. The matter can best be tested by asking what would have been the position if the contract between the sellers and the buyers had been for "feveroles". Surely, then, the sellers on their side would have stipulated with their Algerian suppliers for the delivery of "feveroles", and the buyers on their side would have agreed with their sub-buyers to deliver "feveroles". It would not be fair to rectify one of the contracts without rectifying all three, a thing which is obviously impossible.

There is one other matter I must mention. In the statement of claim the buyers originally claimed damages for breach of a collateral warranty—a warranty that the horsebeans would be a compliance with a demand for "feveroles"—but that claim was formally abandoned at the trial. I do not myself quite see why it was abandoned. Section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was no bar to it. Nor was such a warranty in any way in contradiction of the written contract. (Smith v. Jeffries (11) was not an action on a collateral warranty.) The only difficulty might be whether it was a contractual warranty or merely an innocent misrepresentation. I should myself have thought that it had a better chance of success than the claim for rectification. It was put forward by the buyers very forcibly in their letter on Mar. 12, 1951, but its abandonment at the trial makes it impossible for us to consider it. We have only to consider the question of rectification, and on that I think that the buyers fail. I agree that the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the sellers.

MORRIS, L.J.: When the buyers received from their associated company in Alexandria an inquiry for "horsebeans described here as feveroles" Mr. Hampson, being puzzled, sought the advice of Mr. Brooks. When it was ultimately given that advice was that "horsebeans" and "feveroles" were interchangeable terms. With liberal opportunity of assessing the actions and bearing of Mr. Brooks, the learned judge was "certain" that he was an honest witness. Mr. Brooks knew precisely what was the inquiry received by the buyers. As "an honest man" he

"honestly believed at the time that the commodity 'North African horsebeans, f.a.q.' was identical with 'North African horsebeans, described in Egypt as feveroles'."

So it came about that the parties proceeded on that basis. On Nov. 2, 1950, Mr. Brooks offered to Mr. Hampson five hundred tons of Tunisian horsebeans, and Mr. Hampson agreed to buy. It was understood between them that there would be a written contract on the appropriate corn trade form. When it was prepared and signed it related to Tunisian horsebeans. A later contract, dated Nov. 7, which (as in the case of the earlier contract) was on Form 62 of the London Corn Trade Association, related to two hundred tons of Algerian horsebeans. Both buyers and sellers are merchants engaged in the grain trade and dealing on the Baltic Exchange, and there can be no doubt that the buyers would appreciate that the sellers did business for forward shipment. The buyers would appreciate that the sellers bought and sold simultaneously and would buy from a shipper in order to sell to the buyers. The sellers knew that the buyers were buying in order to re-sell. These circumstances do not, however, govern the determination of the issue of rectification

A now raised between the parties.

It seems to me clear beyond doubt that both parties proceeded on the basis that "feveroles" and "horsebeans" were the same. Mr. Hampson expressed the matter succinctly when he said:

"I had agreed to buy because feveroles were horsebeans and horsebeans were feveroles."

B In that belief the parties came to agreement, and the formal written contracts were prepared and signed. The parties had throughout a clear common intention and purpose of buying and selling horsebeans, and their written agreements faithfully embodied and exactly recorded what they had agreed. In these circumstances it seems to me that no claim for rectification can succeed. Both parties thought that the result of what they clearly understood and clearly

C expressed would be that the buyers as buyers would be able to satisfy the inquiry which, as the sellers knew, had been received. In that they were mistaken as a result of the advice honestly given by Mr. Brooks. But the fact that they were under a mistaken impression as to what their agreement would achieve does not disturb the clarity and the fixity of the agreement which they in fact made. The sellers intended to offer horsebeans and the

D buyers intended to accept horsebeans. The written agreements correctly reflected and incorporated what they had agreed.

The learned judge, in the course of his judgment, said that

"Both the buyers and the sellers through their respective market agents made an oral agreement in which they intended to deal in horsebeans of the feverole type."

E With respect, that was not quite the position. There was no question of contracting in reference to a "type" of horsebeans. There was a joint understanding that they should contract in reference to "horsebeans" simpliciter which they thought were the same as "feveroles". If, as now appears to be the case, they were wrong, it appears probable that they would not have acted

F as they did had they been enlightened. But this does not enable one party to convert the contract into something different from what it was. On the assumption that "feveroles" are different from "horsebeans", it cannot be said that the parties agreed on the sale of a commodity of the separate existence of which they had no knowledge. The sellers were selling "horsebeans", and in order to sell they would have to acquire "horsebeans". If "feveroles"

G are different, then the sellers, and equally the buyers, never even gave their minds at all to the question of a sale of some products which are different from "horsebeans". I consider that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. CHAIRMAN, COUNTY OF LONDON QUARTER SESSIONS.

Ex parte DOWNES.[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 23, 24, 1953.]Criminal Law—Indictment—Indictment quashed on ground that evidence in depositions insufficient to support conviction—Mandamus to hear and determine.

HELD: mandamus would go directing him to hear and determine the indictment.

MOTIONS for certiorari and mandamus.

In January, 1953, indictments were preferred by Alec Downes, a higher executive officer of the Ministry of Supply, at the County of London Quarter Sessions against the respondents charging them with unlawfully selling, on divers dates between June and October, 1951, steel of a class mentioned in the schedule to the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 252), as amended, at a price which was in excess of the maximum price, contrary to art. 1 of the order, as amended, and to reg. 55AB of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. The cases D came up for hearing on May 7, 1953, when counsel for the respondents moved, before the arraignment of the respondents, to quash the indictments on the ground that the depositions disclosed insufficient evidence to support a conviction. Notice had been given that additional evidence would be adduced by the prosecution. The chairman, having examined the depositions, quashed the indictments on the ground that, having regard to the decision in Defiant Cycle Co., Ltd. v. Newell (1), the prosecution would not be able to obtain a conviction since there was insufficient evidence to show that the schedules to the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951, as amended, had been published or brought to the respondents' knowledge. The applicant applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the chairman's order quashing the indictments, and for an order of mandamus directing the chairman to hear and determine the indictments. July 24. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment. In these cases counsel for the applicant moves for orders of certiorari and mandamus directed to the County of London Quarter Sessions to bring up and quash an order whereby the court purported to quash indictments preferred against the several individuals and companies named therein, and commanding the sessions to hear and determine the indictments according to law.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The questions that arise are (i) whether the court had any power to act in this manner, and (ii) if not, what steps, if any, this court can take to compel the sessions to try the case. No member of this court has ever known, or heard, of a court quashing an indictment in such circumstances, nor can authority be found to support it. It is said, however, that the court must have power at common law to quash an indictment if satisfied, from a perusal of the depositions, that there must be an acquittal in the end. This seems to ignore entirely the method by which an indictment comes before a court of trial. At common law any person could prefer an indictment to the grand jury and seek a presentment on the information he could give by himself or by witnesses. It was unnecessary to have any depositions at all. Depositions, as at present understood, are entirely the creation of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, s. 17, though before that Act, no doubt, justices took statements from witnesses in the absence of the accused and also examined him and returned the examinations to the court of trial. A grand jury acted on any evidence they saw fit to admit, and could, and constantly did, act on their own knowledge. The sonorous and stately oath (which, unfortunately, is no longer heard after the opening of the commission at the assizes) was diligently to inquire and true presentment make of all such offences, matters and things which were given them in charge or might otherwise come to their knowledge. If anyone takes the trouble to read the old sessions papers published by various individuals from time to time (and very good reading they are), he will find that they are full of cases down to the reign of Queen Victoria of grand juries presenting all manner of things to the court of quarter sessions, which in those days was really the source of local government for the county in such matters as roads which were known to be out of repair, bridges that were in danger, public nuisances, disorderly houses, gaming houses, and the like, all out of their own knowledge. Once a presentment was made, so that the bill became an indictment, the court had to try it unless the alleged offence was unknown to the law, or was imperfectly set out so that it would have been bad on error, or unless matter in bar was alleged by plea, in which case the plea in bar had, and still has, to be tried. Objection to the matter or form of the indictment could be taken by motion to quash, or, less usually, by demurrer. The only question then was whether the indictment was good in substance and form, and not whether the evidence which had been before the grand jury would support it. Indeed, the grand jury's oath obliged them to keep all their proceedings secret: "The King's counsel, your own, and your fellows', you shall well and keep secret." As, however, the liberty of any individual to present a bill was liable to abuse, the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, limited the right of the private prosecutor to prefer a bill for certain specified alleged offences.

When grand juries were abolished by the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, s. 1 (1), committal for trial was substituted for presentment, although provision is made in s. 2 (2) of that Act for enabling any person to prefer a bill by leave of the judge. The signing of the bill by the proper officer of the court is equivalent to presentment, and if the accused has been formally committed for trial the officer must sign it, though, if he is in doubt whether the committal was regular, the matter must be decided by the presiding judge. If he decides it is irregular, no doubt his ruling would have the same effect as the ignoring of a bill by the grand jury. Once an indictment is before the court the accused must be arraigned and tried thereon unless (a) on motion to quash or demurrer pleaded it is held defective in substance or form and not amended; (b) matter in bar is pleaded and the plea is tried or confirmed in favour of the accused; (c) a nolle prosequi is entered by the Attorney-General, which cannot be done before the indictment is found; or (d) if the indictment discloses an offence which a particular court has no jurisdiction to try, for example, an indictment at quarter sessions for an offence punishable with imprisonment for life in the first instance.

I know of no power in the court to quash because it is anticipated that the evidence will not support the charge. The only ground on which the court can examine the depositions before arraignment is to see whether, if a count is included for which there has not been a committal, the depositions or examination taken before a justice in the presence of the accused disclosed that offence. Accordingly, the course taken by the sessions in this case was not warranted by law. It amounts to saying that the court has satisfied itself, not on evidence given before the court, but on depositions taken elsewhere, that the accused has a defence. Moreover, if this course were permissible, it would enable a court, the members of which disapproved of, or disliked, a statute the breach of which formed the subject of the indictment, simply to quash it and decline to try it. It is, of course, well known to every practitioner that, if the prosecution is satisfied that there is a good defence to the charge, or that for some reason it is inadvisable to proceed, it is permissible, with the leave of the court after issue joined, to offer no evidence, when a verdict of acquittal will be directed. Again, if there is more than one indictment against a prisoner it is quite common practice, after the trial of one indictment, to direct that the other indictment or indictments are to remain on the file and not to be prosecuted without leave. I would also add that it often happens (and, indeed, we were told it was so in this case) that the prosecution intend to call evidence in addition to that given before the court of committal. This they are entitled to do, and, though modern practice requires at least, if it involves the calling of additional witnesses, that notice of the fresh evidence should be given, there is no statutory requirement to this effect.

The question then arises what, if anything, this court can do to correct the error into which the sessions have fallen. I feel no doubt that an order of mandamus to hear and determine the indictment can issue. The sessions, in effect, have refused to try the case. No one suggests that the indictments do not disclose an offence, or that they are not good in form, or that the sessions had no jurisdiction to try them. They cannot quash because they are of opinion that the respondents have a defence. They must try the case. This court has on several occasions sent an order of mandamus to quarter sessions where they have declined to proceed. A recent instance is R. v. Norfolk Quarter Sessions. Ex p. Brunson (2), where the court declined to proceed because some inadmissible evidence had been given before the committing justices, and the court, by order of mandamus, directed the sessions to hear and determine. With regard to certiorari, the question is by no means so clear, and I may refer to a recent learned note by Mr. D. M. GORDON in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, vol. 69, p. 175. It seems that when quarter sessions are sitting as a court of oyer and terminer to try prisoners on indictment, certiorari will not lie to bring up a judgment either of acquittal or conviction. The quashing of an indictment is not a judgment of acquittal, nor, a fortiori, of conviction. It is true that in the Norfolk case (2), where this point was not taken, this court did order certiorari to issue both for the order quashing the indictment and for the order as to costs. It may be that, had the point been taken, the court would have confined the certiorari to the order for costs, but, in truth, I do not think any certiorari is necessary, so that we need not consider the cases and learning on this subject. The court, by its order of mandamus, will direct the sessions to try the indictments, so it would be eminently futile to take the objection that they have made an order quashing them. It is just because they have made that order that the court directs them to try the case, thus, in effect, directing them to ignore the order they have made. The order of mandamus will go, and the defendants will pay the costs of the application.

ORMROD AND ANOTHER v. CROSVILLE MOTOR SERVICES,
LTD. AND ANOTHER (MURPHIE, Third Party).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.JJ.), July 8, 9, 13, 14, 1953.]

Negligence—Driving of motor vehicle—Liability of owner—Car driven by friend of owner partly for owner's purposes.

While the owner of a motor car was attending the Monte Carlo motor car rally, a friend of his, under an arrangement made between them, was to drive the owner's car from Birkenhead to Monte Carlo. He was to carry a suitcase belonging to the owner of the car, was to make the journey in his own time and manner, was to visit friends in Bayeux (for which purpose he left Birkenhead earlier than he otherwise need have done), and was to arrive in Monte Carlo before the end of the rally. Thereafter he and the owner of the car were to go on holiday with the car in Switzerland. While on the direct route from Birkenhead to the coast to cross to France, owing partly to the negligence of the friend, the car collided with a motor omnibus which was damaged.

HELD: at the time of the accident the car was being used wholly or partly for the car owner's purposes, and, therefore, the friend, while driving it, was the agent of the owner, and, in so far as the friend was guilty of negligence, the owner was vicariously liable therefor.

APPEALS by plaintiffs and third party against an order of DEVLIN, J., at Chester Assizes, dated Feb. 6, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 711.

Under an arrangement made between the male plaintiff and the third party, while the third party with another person was driving a Standard Vanguard car from Glasgow as a competitor in the Monte Carlo motor car rally, the plaintiffs, Mr. and Mrs. Ormrod, were to drive the third party's Healey car from Birkenhead to Monte Carlo. They were to carry a suitcase belonging to the third party with them, were to make the journey in their own time and manner, and were to visit friends at Bayeux on the way. It was intended that the plaintiffs should arrive at Monte Carlo before the end of the rally, and then the plaintiffs and the third party were to go for a holiday together in Switzerland, using the third party's Healey car. On Jan. 20, 1952, the plaintiffs having started earlier than would have been otherwise necessary owing to their visit to Bayeux, soon after they left Birkenhead and while they were on the direct road to the coast to cross to France, the Healey car driven by the male plaintiff came into collision with the first defendants' motor omnibus, driven by the second defendant, their employee, in the course of his employment, and both plaintiffs sustained personal injuries and both vehicles were damaged.

The plaintiffs brought actions (which were consolidated) for damages against the defendants, alleging that the injuries were caused by the negligent driving of the first defendants' servant or agent, the second defendant. The first defendants counterclaimed in respect of damage to their omnibus, alleging negligent driving of the car by the male plaintiff, and they took third-party proceedings against the owner of the car on the ground that he was vicariously liable for the male plaintiff's negligence. DEVLIN, J., found that the accident was caused by the negligence of the male plaintiff, who, he held, was acting as the third party's agent when driving the car, and that the third party, therefore, was liable for his negligence. On appeals by the plaintiffs and the third party the Court of Appeal, after hearing fresh evidence, varied the finding of DEVLIN, J., as to the liability of the male plaintiff, holding that the accident was attributable equally to the negligence of the male plaintiff and to that of the second defendant, for which the first defendants were liable. They gave an interim judgment on the liability of the third party, and the case is reported on that point.

July 9. SINGLETON, L.J.: In my view, the appeal of the third party fails. The male plaintiff was driving the third party's car from Cheshire to Monte Carlo for the purpose of the third party or for the joint purpose of both. An arrangement had been made that the car should be at Monte Carlo before the end of the rally, which the third party was attending with another car. When the rally was over the purpose of the plaintiffs and the third party was that they should go for a holiday in the car to Switzerland. In pursuance of that arrangement the male plaintiff set out, and he was driving towards Chester on the journey to Dover when the accident happened. Evidence was given to show that the male plaintiff had left his home earlier than he needed to have done, because he proposed to make a call at Bayeux, in Normandy, and I take it that that evidence was accepted by the judge. But at the time that the accident happened the male plaintiff was taking the direct route from his home, as arranged, to the coast in order that the car might be taken across to France. The learned judge concluded that in those circumstances the male plaintiff at that time was the agent of the third party.

It has been said more than once that a driver of a motor car must be doing something for the owner of the car in order to become an agent of the owner. The mere fact of consent by the owner to the use of a chattel is not proof of agency, but the purpose for which this car was being taken down the road on the morning of the accident was either that it should be used by the owner, the third party, or that it should be used for the joint purposes of the male plaintiff and the third party when it reached Monte Carlo. In those circumstances it appears to me that the judgment of DEVLIN, J., that at the time of the accident the male plaintiff was the agent of the third party was right, and the third party's appeal on that head should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: It has often been supposed that the owner of a vehicle is only liable for the negligence of the driver if that driver is his servant acting in the course of his employment. That is not correct. The owner is also liable if the driver is his agent, that is to say, if the driver is, with the owner's consent, driving the car on the owner's business or for the owner's purposes. In the present case the driver was, by mutual arrangement, driving the car partly for his own purposes and partly for the owner's purposes. The owner wanted the car driven to Monte Carlo; the driver wanted to go with his wife to Monte Carlo, and he intended to visit friends in Normandy on the way. On this account he started two or three days earlier than he would have done if he had been going solely for the owner's purposes. Counsel for the third party says that this should exempt the owner from liability for the driver's negligence, because the accident might never have happened if he had started later. He says that the owner would not have been liable for any negligence of the driver on the trip from Calais to Normandy, and he should not be liable for negligence due to the early start. I do not think that this argument is correct. The law puts an especial responsibility on the owner of a vehicle who allows it to go on the road in charge of someone else, no matter whether it is his servant, his friend, or anyone else. If it is being used wholly or partly on the owner's business or for the owner's purposes, the owner is liable for any negligence on the part of the driver. The owner only escapes liability when he lends it or hires it to a third person to be used for purposes in which the owner has no interest or concern: see Hewitt v. Bonvin (1). That is not this case. The trip to Monte Carlo must be considered as a whole, including the proposed excursion to Normandy, and as such it was undertaken with the owner's consent for the purposes of both of them, and the owner is liable for any negligence of the driver in the course of it. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I entirely agree.

EMBERSON v. ROBINSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), July 23, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—House "reasonably required by landlord"—Landlord by purchase after Sept. 1, 1939—Contract for sale of dwelling-house in June, 1939—Completion of purchase in September, 1945—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I, para. (h) (as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (1), sched. I).

In June, 1939, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the vendors for the sale of a dwelling-house to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, applied, and paid a deposit thereon. The contract provided that vacant possession of the premises should be given on payment of the balance of the purchase price and completion of the purchase. In August, 1939, the plaintiff was called up for military service. In November, 1939, the vendors let the premises to the defendant. There was no completion until September, 1945, when the vendors confirmed the amount of the purchase price and the payment of the deposit and informed the plaintiff of the letting to the defendant. The plaintiff then paid the balance of the purchase money and the transfer was completed. In an action by the plaintiff for possession of the premises the defendant contended that he (the plaintiff) was a landlord who had become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house after Sept. 1, 1939, within the meaning of para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1), sched. I, and so was not entitled to possession under that paragraph.

HELD: the completion which took place in September, 1945, was a completion of the original contract, the plaintiff having waived his right under the original contract to demand vacant possession; the plaintiff became landlord when the contract of sale was signed in June, 1939; and so he was not a landlord who had become landlord by purchasing the house after Sept. 1, 1939.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE REGINALD CLARK, Q.C., at Ilford County Court, dated May 5, 1953.

In June, 1939, the plaintiff entered into a contract of sale with the owners of a dwelling-house to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, applied and paid a deposit. The contract provided that vacant possession of the house should be given on payment of the balance of the purchase price and completion of the purchase. In August, 1939, the plaintiff was called up for national service and he served in the army until 1945. In November, 1939, the vendors let the premises to the defendant. The purchase was not completed until September, 1945, when the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the vendors' solicitors expressing the plaintiff's wish to complete the purchase. The vendors then confirmed the amount of the purchase price, the payment of the deposit, and informed the plaintiff of the letting to the defendant. Thereafter the balance of the purchase price was paid by the plaintiff and the transfer was completed. B C

The plaintiff then claimed possession of the premises, relying on the provisions of sched. I to the Act of 1933, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I, which provides: D

"A court shall, for the purposes of s. 3 of this Act, have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom without proof of suitable alternative accommodation . . . if . . . (h) the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Sept. 1, 1939) for occupation as a residence for (i) himself . . ."

The defendant contended that the plaintiff was precluded from relying on that provision by reason of the fact that he (the plaintiff) was a landlord who had become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house after Sept. 1, 1939. The learned judge made the order for possession, holding that the plaintiff had become landlord by purchasing the premises before Sept. 1, 1939. F

Merriton for the defendant, tenant.

A. E. Holdsworth for the plaintiff, landlord.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The question is whether or not the plaintiff is a landlord who became landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house after Sept. 1, 1939. Counsel for the tenant submitted that there were two points: (i) Was the completion in 1945 a completion of the contract entered into in June, 1939, or should it be regarded as a new contract? and (ii) whether, having regard to the circumstances, the plaintiff purchased in 1939 at the date of the agreement or in 1945 at the date of completion? G H

I think it is convenient to take the second point first. Assume a case where the binding contract was signed before Sept. 1, 1939, everything then proceeded with the speed which was contemplated, and the completion took place after Sept. 1, 1939. Would the purchaser have become a landlord by purchasing after Sept. 1? I think not. In my view, the relevant date in applying the exception in para. (h) to these facts would be the date when he signed the binding contract. I derive support for that conclusion from Barrett v. Marshall (1)

although that decision does not bind us. In that case the same point arose and DODD, J., held that the purchaser became landlord and the vendor ceased to be landlord when the contract of sale was signed and that what remained was merely carrying the contract into complete effect.

The question, then, is whether the length of time which expired in the present case leads to some different conclusion. That, I think, may be put in this way. Was what took place in 1945 a completion of the contract in 1939, or should it be regarded as a different contract involving a different subject-matter? Two points are relied on, and both of them seem to me to be important. It is emphasised, in the first place, that the original contract was a contract for vacant possession. It is plain that, if a vendor enters into a contract to give vacant possession, he does not fulfil his contract if he tenders a house without vacant possession. It is also emphasised that in November, 1939, the vendor let the house, and it is not suggested that either the plaintiff knew of that letting until 1945 or—although I do not think this is material—that the tenant was told anything about the plaintiff's right under the contract which had been entered into. I have come to the conclusion that the completion which took place in 1945 should be regarded as a completion under the contract of 1939. The history of this transaction was obviously due to the war. The plaintiff did not tender the purchase price within what would normally be a reasonable time, but the vendor does not appear to have taken any point on that. He was content that the matter should remain open; he did not seek to repudiate the contract owing to delay and sell to anyone else, but he let it to the tenant. When the parties came together in 1945 the plaintiff clearly waived the right which he had under the original contract to demand vacant possession. The transaction, undoubtedly, went through in circumstances other than those which were originally contemplated, but when one reads the correspondence and sees how the completion took place, I think the right view is that which was taken by the learned county court judge, namely, that it ought to be regarded, for the purpose of the application of the exception, as a completion of the original contract of June, 1939. In those circumstances, for the reasons which I gave earlier in this judgment, I do not think that the plaintiff falls to be regarded as a landlord who became landlord by purchase after Sept. 1, 1939. I would dismiss the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

F HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

EARL BEATTY v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 8, 9, 24, 1953.]

Income Tax—Assessment—Additional assessment—“If the surveyor discovers” —Facts known to commissioners adequate to support assessment—Assessment made on basis of erroneous belief that facts otherwise—Competency of assessments—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 125 (1).

In and after 1946 additional assessments to income tax and surtax were made on the taxpayer under the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18 and sched. II, in respect of the income of a Canadian company, which income had been omitted from the first assessments. The taxpayer did not dispute that the relevant facts and circumstances (viz., that transfers of assets to the company had been made by persons other than the taxpayer and his wife) resulted in his becoming chargeable to income tax and surtax as assessed, but he contended that, although those facts were known to the Crown on which an assessment could have been warranted, the Crown did not appreciate them, and, as was demonstrated by correspondence, the assessments had been made on the footing that the facts were different from the true facts (viz., that the taxpayer or his wife had made transfers of assets to the company), and that, therefore, there had been no discovery of relevant facts to support additional assessments by virtue of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125.

HELD: the discovery required by s. 125 to justify additional assessments need not be a complete and detailed or accurate appraisal of the facts necessary to support an assessment; the circumstances placed in the possession of the commissioners entitled them to make the additional assessments; and the fact that they failed to appreciate the legal effect of those circumstances did not prevent the assessments from being competent.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

In July, 1938, one Ronald Tree caused to be incorporated in Canada a company named Bretisle Co., Ltd., and he subscribed for the whole of the equity share capital and $231,000 non-interest bearing redeemable debentures in bearer form. In due course, through the hands of a nominee of Ronald Tree, the said shares and debentures were gratuitously transferred to the Montreal Trust Co., Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, for the account and subject to the order of the taxpayer, Earl Beatty. The Inland Revenue Commissioners raised various questions with regard to the taxpayer's income from foreign companies, and the relevant information with regard to Bretisle Co., Ltd., was given. The facts were not fully comprehended and the commissioners remained under the impression that the taxpayer or his wife had made transfers of assets to Bretisle Co., Ltd. Additional assessments to income tax and surtax, by virtue of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125, were raised on that footing under the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18 and sched. II. The taxpayer contended that, in the circumstances, there had been no discovery within the meaning of s. 125, and, therefore, that the assessments, which were made for each of the years 1939-40 to 1943-44 were incompetent. The Special Commissioners rejected that contention. The taxpayer appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 24. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This was an appeal to the Special Commissioners against certain assessments to income tax and surtax made on the appellant, Earl Beatty. That appeal was dismissed, and the assessments upheld. The appellant now appeals to this court, and asks that the assessments should be discharged. The only point in the case is that the assessments were invalid by reason of the absence of any previous "discovery" as required or as alleged to be required by the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125. That involves two questions: first, was a "discovery" an essential pre-requisite in the circumstances?, and, secondly, if it was, was there discovery within the meaning of the section? In a sense, therefore, the appellant's appeal is unmeritorious. On the other hand, the revenue authorities ought not to be allowed to impose or enforce taxation otherwise than in strict compliance with the prescribed procedure.

The assessments in question were made in and after 1946 under sched. D, Case VI, for the years 1939-40 to 1943-44, under the provisions of s. 18 of and sched. II to the Finance Act, 1936. They were made in respect of the income of a Canadian company named the Bretisle Co., Ltd. The correctness of the amounts assessed is not in question. For each of the relevant years other assessments had been made on the appellant to surtax and also to income tax at the standard rate under the same provisions of the Finance Act, 1936, in respect of income of certain other foreign companies. The appellant did not, and does not, dispute that the facts and circumstances stated in the Case resulted in his becoming chargeable to income tax and surtax as assessed by virtue of the said provisions of the Finance Act, 1936, as interpreted in Congreve v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), which was decided in the Court of Appeal on Dec. 9, 1946, and in the House of Lords on May 13, 1948. Notices of the assessments under appeal for the year 1939-40 were issued before the date of the decision of the Court of Appeal, while those for 1940-41 and 1941-42 were issued after the decision of the Court of Appeal but before the decision of the House of Lords. That decision establishes the proposition that transfers to Bretisle on behalf of, although not by, the appellant attracted tax as much as transfers made by himself or his wife, confirming in that respect the decision in the Court of Appeal which had reversed or substantially varied the decision of WROTTESEY, J., in the court below.

H

It is, I suppose, necessary for me to set out from the Case a statement of the facts, which are undisputed, giving rise to the question with which I have to deal:

(1) Earl Beatty and his brother, the late Honourable Peter Beatty, are half-brothers of Mr. Ronald Tree, who was the son of the late Countess Beatty by her first marriage. Under the will of her father, the late Eugene Marshall Field, Countess Beatty had power to appoint to Ronald Tree, but not to his half-brothers, the income from a fund of $1,000,000 and, upon his attaining the age of forty, the capital of the fund absolutely. This power she exercised, but Ronald Tree did not attain the age of forty till September, 1937. At the time that she exercised this power she wrote a letter dated Aug. 21, 1930, to Ronald Tree (which was lodged with the Public Trustee and communicated to him shortly after her death in July, 1932) asking him to divide equally between himself, Earl Beatty and the Honourable Peter Beatty the money passing to him by virtue of the appointment. Immediately after the receipt of this letter, Ronald Tree informed the appellant and his brother that in pursuance of his mother's wish he intended to make this division between them, but he would not be in a position to do so before he attained the age of forty, i.e., before 1937. He also wrote to them to this effect on Apr. 6, 1933. (2) The contemplated gifts were referred to from time to time in conversations between Ronald Tree and his half-brothers. Ronald Tree was willing to meet their wishes as regards the form and subject-matter of the gifts. For financial and sentimental reasons the appellant and his brother desired to keep the money and investments in the United States and Canada. They were already familiar with the American market and the financial advisers upon whom they had come to rely were in New York and Montreal. They did not, however, take the same financial views and they decided that the two sets of assets should be separately controlled. The appellant wished that part of the gift to him (i.e., $44,000) should be in cash. (3) In these circumstances Ronald Tree consulted his solicitors in London (Messrs. Withers & Co. who also act for the appellant and his brother) and counsel as to the best way of making the division so as to preserve equality between the three of them and in manner most beneficial to the appellant and his brother, and, on the advice he received, the transactions set out in the following sub-paragraphs were entered into with regard to an amount of $231,950 (being part of the sum Mr. Tree intended to make over to the appellant). (4) In July, 1938, Mr. Ronald Tree caused to be incorporated in Canada a Canadian investment company named Bretisle Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called Bretisle), and subscribed for the whole of the equity share capital (i.e., ninety-five 'B' shares of $10 each) and for $231,000 non-interest bearing redeemable debentures in bearer form. The debentures were redeemable in Canadian dollars, or, at the holder's option, in United States currency or in sterling at a fixed rate of exchange. The shares and debentures were issued to Mr. Ronald Tree's nominee, Mr. F. G. Bush, who held them to the account and subject to the order of Mr. Tree. In due course, on the instructions of Mr. Tree's Canadian lawyers, Mr. Bush transferred the said shares and debentures free of value to the Montreal Trust Co. in Charlottetown, P.E.I., for the account and subject to the order of the appellant, his executors, administrators, or assigns. These transactions were initiated through the agency of Messrs. Withers & Co. (hereinafter called Withers), who had received instructions from Mr. Tree to instruct Canadian lawyers to form the company. The Canadian lawyers so instructed arranged the transactions in direct communication with Mr. Tree, who was in Chicago at the relevant times and signed all the necessary papers there. (5) Bretisle was incorporated on July 14, 1938. The 'B' shares and the debentures were issued on Aug. 5, 1938. (6) Prior to the incorporation of Bretisle, a sum of $231,950 was placed by Mr. Tree at the Bank of Montreal in Montreal to the account of Withers. Out of this money Withers purchased certain securities, to the value of $125,786, through the Bank of Montreal, whom they instructed to hold such securities to the order of the Canadian lawyers (Messrs. Brown, Montgomery and McMichael). After the incorporation of Bretisle, Withers instructed the Canadian lawyers to have the securities transferred to Bretisle, and also instructed the Bank of Montreal to pay the balance of their account ($106,164) to Bretisle. This was done on July 27, 1938. It was by this method that Tree's subscription moneys for the shares and debentures in Bretisle were satisfied, i.e., partly by shares transferred to Bretisle and partly by cash. (7) In June, 1938, $44,550 (£9,000) was transferred from Withers' account with the Bank of Montreal in Montreal to their account with that bank in London."

The facts set out as above-mentioned were not known to the assessing Special Commissioners prior to 1943, but they did become known to them in the course of a correspondence beginning on July 12, 1943.

I think that the points in issue on this appeal can be elicited from the summary of the contentions of the parties set out in the Case. I will take the contentions of the Crown first. It was submitted under a head numbered 3 that the assessments under appeal were not additional assessments made under s. 125 of the Act of 1918, but were assessments properly made in principle under s. 18 of the Act of 1936. I am inclined to think that that contention is well founded. If it is, there is an end of the case. I was much impressed with the argument of Mr. Stamp on this point and I should have elaborated my reasons for agreeing with it if that had been the only point in the case. But as almost the whole of the arguments addressed to me were concerned with this matter of discovery or no discovery, I will, for the purposes of this judgment, assume that s. 125 does apply. I cannot, however, find that s. 125 has anything to do with surtax.

In the forefront of the Crown's submissions I find that prior to the making of each of the assessments the Special Commissioners had "discovered" (within the meaning of s. 125) that profits chargeable to tax had been omitted from first assessments so that the additional assessments were properly made in principle under that section. Now this is, or ought to be, a short, simple point. The Special Commissioners must have made the assessments because they thought that something had not been disclosed by the appellant, and, therefore, not discovered (in the fullest sense) by the Special Commissioners. The facts amount to this: that though the relevant facts had been disclosed by the appellant, their relevance was not appreciated by the Special Commissioners, and the question seems to me to be whether they can be said to have discovered something which they did not understand. They went on asking, if I may so express it, the wrong question, viz., whether there had been transfers to Bretisle by the appellant or his wife. The right question for them to have asked was whether there had been transfers to Bretisle by persons other than the appellant or his wife, though to that unasked question, strangely enough, the answer had already been supplied to them.

I have expressed my reluctance to add to the many pronouncements on the subject of what "discovery" is. To say that it means to "find out" does not seem to me to help very much. Is there, perhaps, a distinction to be drawn between "finding" and "finding out"? Does a man discover a diamond by finding it in the ground believing it to be a piece of glass, that is, not finding out that what he has found is a diamond? Such speculations as these can be indulged in to an almost unlimited extent. Looking at the words "if the surveyor discovers" without guidance from other people's opinions, I confess that I should have supposed that the object of those words was merely to prevent assessments being made blindly and officiously in cases where no omission from earlier assessments was in the surveyor's contemplation or purview or was suspected. Be it observed that he has not to discover the exact quality or quantity of the omission; it would surely suffice if he were to find out that there had been some omission, and it would not matter if it was a much greater or much smaller omission than he had supposed. If that is accepted, why should it be any less a discovery when the actual omission was of some different kind to the supposed omission? Could he not say: "I have discovered that there is an omission. I am not yet in a position to say what it is, either in quality or in quantity, but that is why I have made these assessments" ? Evidently in the present case omissions were strongly suspected, and the suspicions were acted on by the making of the assessments. It is now known that the suspicions were correct, and that they were justified by the facts already known to the tax authorities. It seems to me that this is a true analogy:—A man finds or discovers in his land a diamond. He thinks it is only a piece of glass, but, though he did not at first find out that it was a diamond, he had in the true sense discovered it on the day that he found it.

On the part of Lord Beatty, the appellant, it is admitted that at the respective times when the assessments were made, the facts of the transfers by Ronald Tree were known to the commissioners, although it was not until the last of the assessments had been made that the commissioners held or came to hold the opinion that such transfers were what operated to bring the income of Bretisle within the charge. It is said that the assessments were made solely on the basis of a suspicion (erroneous in point of fact) that there had been transfers by the appellant or his wife, and hence that there was no "discovery" to satisfy the requirements of the section.

The appellant's contentions are plain enough, but I am of opinion that they place undue emphasis on the necessity for "discovery" in the terms of the section. I think that the discovery need not be a complete and detailed or accurate discovery and that when the commissioners find out, or think that they have found out, the existence of an omission or other error it is not necessary for them to have probed the matter to its depths or to define precisely the ground on which they have made the assessments. Here the relevant facts were all known to them. What was lacking was a comprehension of those facts. The facts were there, the commissioners, to revert for a moment to my analogy, thought that the diamond which they had found was only a piece of glass, but it was none the less a discovery.

Many cases were brought to my notice, and these on the whole seem to me to support the Crown's contentions. In R. v. Bloomsbury Income Tax Comrs. (2) ([1915] 3 K.B. 785) LORD READING, C.J., paraphrases "if he discovers" by the words "if he honestly comes to the conclusion on the information in his possession". Pausing there, did not the commissioners come to the conclusion that the assessments were justified on the information in their possession? What information? Possibly because they had been told facts which tended to show that Lord Beatty had more income at his disposal than the commissioners could account for. In R. v. Kensington Income Tax Comrs. (3) the paraphrases adopted were if he "comes to the conclusion from the examination he makes and from any information he may choose to receive"—that is a quotation from BRAY, J. ([1913] 3 K.B. 889)—and also "has reason to believe": per AVORY, J. (ibid., 897); and also "finds" or "satisfies himself": per LUSH, J. (ibid., 898). Williams v. Grundy Trustees (4), and Inland Revenue v. Mackinlay's Trustees (5), are entirely favourable to the case of the Crown in this appeal: see also Commercial Structures, Ltd. v. Briggs (6).

I cannot see that even on this most technical of all technical points the appellant has any right to succeed and I dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

GODSTONE RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. BRAZIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.),
July 24, 1953.]

Town and Country Planning—Enforcement notice—Need to specify both date on which notice takes effect and period within which it must be complied with—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 23 (2), (3).

A Town and Country Planning—Development—Permission to use land “for any purpose on not more than twenty-eight days in total in any calendar year”—Information charging unlawful use on Jan. 12, 1953, and on two dates in December, 1952—Town and Country Planning General Development Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 728), art. 3 (1), sched. I, Part I, class IV, para. 2.

B The respondent was the owner of a piece of land on which, in 1951 or during January, 1952, she stationed a caravan in which from that time she lived. On Oct. 31, 1952, the local authority, acting on behalf of the local planning authority, served on her a notice purporting to be an enforcement notice under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 23 (1), which required her to remove the caravan “within seven days after the expiry of twenty-eight days from the date of the service of this notice”. As she did not comply with the notice, in February, 1953, the local authority preferred an information against her charging her with an offence against s. 24 (3) of the Act in that on Dec. 17 and 30, 1952, and on Jan. 12, 1953, she had unlawfully used her land as a site for a caravan without grant of permission under Part III of the Act of 1947 and in contravention of the enforcement notice.

HELD: (i) under s. 23 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1947, an enforcement notice should specify two periods: (a) the period at the expiration of which the notice would take effect, and (b) the period allowed for the execution of the work after the notice had taken effect, and, as the notice of Oct. 31, 1952, did not specify the former period, it was invalid.

E Burgess v. Jarvis ([1952] 1 All E.R. 592), followed.

(ii) by the Town and Country Planning General Development Order, 1950, art. 3 (1), and sched. I, Part I, class IV, para. 2, the respondent was permitted to use her land for any purpose on not more than twenty-eight days in total in any calendar year, and, therefore, the information was, on the face of it, bad as it alleged an unlawful use of the land on Jan. 12, 1953, although twenty-eight days of 1953 had not then elapsed, and it was also bad for duplicity as it alleged, not only an offence in 1953, but also offences in 1952.

CASE STATED by Surrey justices.

H At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Dorking an information was preferred by the appellant council, through their deputy clerk, charging the respondent with an offence against the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 24 (3), in that on Dec. 17 and 30, 1952, and on Jan. 12, 1953, she unlawfully used her piece of land, known as the Platt, Lone Oak Estate, Smallfield, Burstow, Surrey, as a site for a caravan for the purpose of human habitation without the grant of permission under Part III of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and in contravention of an enforcement notice which was served on her on Oct. 31, 1952.

At the hearing of the information on Feb. 18 and Mar. 18, 1953, it was proved or admitted that, at some date in 1951 or 1952 which was before Jan. 31, 1952, the respondent stationed on her land a caravan for living purposes and resided therein until Oct. 31, 1952, when the council served on her a notice which purported to be an enforcement notice, and which required her to discontinue the use of the land as a site for the caravan and to remove the caravan from the land "within seven days after the expiry of twenty-eight days from the date of the service of this notice upon you"; that the respondent did not apply for planning permission under Part III of the Act of 1947 and did not appeal against the notice; and that she did not discontinue the use of the land as a site for a caravan or remove the caravan. The council contended, inter alia, that the enforcement notice was in accordance with s. 23 of the Act of 1947 and that the offence was proved. The respondent contended that the notice was invalid in that (a) it failed to specify the two periods required to be specified by s. 23 (2) and (3) of the Act, viz., (i) the period, not being less than twenty-eight days, at the expiry of which it was to take effect, and (ii) the period within which the use was to be discontinued and the caravan removed, and (b) it failed to specify the former use of the land. The justices, being of the opinion that the respondent's contentions were correct, held that the notice was not an enforcement notice and dismissed the information. The council appealed.

Scarman for the council.

J. Deakin James for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: By the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 23 (3), an enforcement notice is to take effect at the expiration of such period, not being less than twenty-eight days after the service thereof, as may be specified therein. In Burgess v. Jarvis (1) the Court of Appeal held that, under s. 23 (2) and (3), the enforcement notice should specify two periods: (i) the period at the expiration of which the notice took effect, and (ii) the period within which the particular steps for restoring the land to its original condition had to be taken. That decision was followed by this court in Mead v. Plumtree (2). The notice served in the present case is as follows:

"Whereas it appears to the rural district council for the rural district of Godstone . . . acting for and on behalf of the Surrey County Council, the local planning authority, that the following development of land has been carried out after July 1, 1948, without the grant of permission required in that behalf . . . viz., the placing of a movable structure, to wit, a caravan, which is used for human habitation on the land specified in the schedule hereto which said caravan has remained thereon for more than twenty-eight days in total in the year 1952 . . . And whereas it is considered expedient, having regard to the provisions which will be required to be included in the development plan for securing the proper planning of the area . . . that, for restoring the land to its condition before the development took place, you should take the steps hereinafter specified within the period also hereinafter specified. Now therefore the council do hereby give you notice, in pursuance of their powers for and on behalf of the local planning authority under s. 23 and s. 24 of [the Act of 1947]: (a) to discontinue the use of the said land . . . as a site for the said caravan or movable structure; (b) to remove from the said land the said caravan or movable structure stationed thereon within seven days after the expiry of twenty-eight days from the date of the service of this notice upon you."

The council probably intended that the work should be done within thirty-five days of the service of the notice, but they did not say that the notice would take effect at the expiration of twenty-eight days from the service thereof. The object of telling the person on whom the notice is served when it is to take effect is to give him notice of the period in which he can appeal. In my opinion, therefore, this notice does not comply with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Burgess v. Jarvis (1) that an enforcement notice should specify both the date when it is to take effect and the period within which the work is to be done after the notice has taken effect, and, therefore, the decision of the justices on this point was right.

Counsel for the respondent raised a second point. The information is in these terms:

“ . . . for that she did on Dec. 17 and 30, 1952, and on Jan. 12, 1953, unlawfully use her own piece of land . . . as a site for a caravan for the purpose of human habitation without the grant of permission in that behalf under Part III of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and in contravention of an enforcement notice.”

By the Town and Country Planning General Development Order, 1950, art. 3 (1), and sched. I, Part I, class IV, para. 2, the following development is permitted without the permission of the local planning authority or the Minister of Town and Country Planning, subject to certain conditions which are not relevant in the present case:

“ The use of land . . . for any purpose on not more than twenty-eight days in total in any calendar year, and the erection or placing of movable structures on the land for the purposes of that use.”

By reason of this permission the respondent was entitled to use her land as a site for a caravan on twenty-eight days in any calendar year, and, therefore, on the face of it, the information is bad, as it alleges that she was unlawfully using the land as a site for a caravan on Jan. 12, 1953, although twenty-eight days of 1953 had not then expired. Moreover, it seems to me that, as the information alleges offences in 1952 and an offence in January, 1953, it must be alleging more than one offence. For these reasons, I think that the information is bad and that the justices were right in dismissing it.

PARKER, J.: I agree. In my view, the enforcement notice sets out only one of the periods which is required to be set out by s. 23 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1947, namely, the period during which the work must be done. Counsel for the appellant council contended that it was possible to read, and that one should read, the enforcement notice as specifying the two periods. I cannot agree with that. These notices are served on members of the public who do not know, although, no doubt, they are expected to know, all the provisions of the Act, and, in my view, the notices should set out clearly (i) the period at the expiration of which the notice is to take effect, and (ii) the period after the notice takes effect during which the work is to be done. This enforcement notice does not do so.

DONOVAN, J.: I also agree, although I was at first disposed to take the view that the enforcement notice was good.

Appeal dismissed.

CATERHAM. Ex parte PRITCHARD.

Certiorari—Mental defective—Report to Board of Control by visitors—Mental Deficiency Act, 1913 (c. 28), s. 11 (2), s. 11 (4) (a).

Discovery—Production of documents—Confidential medical report regarding mental defective—R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 16.

On June 19, 1952, an infant was detained under s. 8 of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913. On May 29, 1953, she was seen by the statutory visitors who prepared a special report under s. 11 (4) (a), which was submitted to the Board of Control, recommending that the detention order should be extended. The mother of the infant applied to the visitors to be allowed to be present at the examination of the infant and to be heard by counsel, but the visitors refused to permit this. In answer to a motion by the infant, acting by her mother and next friend, for an order of certiorari to bring up the report of the visitors to be quashed, the affidavit of the visitors referred to and exhibited medical reports received by them as to the condition of the infant, the visitors having been advised that, in view of the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 16, they were bound to disclose those reports.

HELD: under s. 11 (2) it was for the Board of Control, and not for the visitors, to decide whether the continuance of the detention order was required in the interests of the infant and to make an order for that purpose; the visitors were not a tribunal and had no power to come to any decision; the special report submitted by them to the board merely contained evidence to enable the board to come to a decision; and, therefore, certiorari would not go to quash the report of their opinion.

R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Keasley ([1939] 2 All E.R. 626), distinguished.

Per LORD GODDARD, C.J.: We do not think it was ever intended that the reports received by the visitors as to the infant's condition should be treated as other than highly confidential. The reports should be in court so that the court can look at them, but they are not to be disclosed unless the court thinks that a good purpose would be served.

EDITORIAL NOTE. Section 31 of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, was repealed by the Education Act, 1944, s. 121 and sched. IX, Part I; see now s. 57, as amended, of the Education Act, 1944. Section 1 of the Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Act, 1899, was repealed by the Education Act, 1921, s. 171 and sched. VII, which was in turn repealed by the Education Act, 1944, s. 121 and sched. IX, Part I; see now s. 34, as amended, of the Education Act, 1944. The Mental Deficiency (Notification of Children) Regulations, 1914, were repealed and replaced by the Mental Deficiency (Notification of Children) Regulations, 1928, which were in turn repealed and replaced by the Education, England and Wales, Reports to Local Authorities (Records) Regulations, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 250), as amended by the Reports to Local Authorities (Records) Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1970).

MOTION by Janet Edith Pritchard, an infant, acting by her mother and next friend, Dolly Edith Roomer, for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the report of the opinion reached by the statutory visitors of St. Lawrence's Hospital, Caterham, in the county of Surrey, on May 29, 1953.

On June 19, 1952, the infant pleaded Guilty before a metropolitan magistrate to a charge of larceny. She was remanded for a week for a medical report, and was then detained under s. 8 (1) of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913. The infant appealed to quarter sessions which declined to interfere with the order of detention. On Aug. 19, 1952, the infant was taken to St. Lawrence's Hospital, Caterham. On May 29, 1953, the statutory visitors to the hospital, appointed under s. 40 of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, assembled to examine the infant for the purposes of making a report under s. 11 (4) (a) of the Act. They allowed the mother and her counsel to enter the room in which they had met, but they did not allow either of them to be present at the examination or to address them. In their report to the Board of Control the visitors recommended that the detention order should be extended.

The infant now applied for an order of certiorari to quash the report of the visitors' opinion, or, alternatively, to quash any confirmation or order of the Board of Control subsequently made on considering the report, on the grounds (i) that the statutory visitors failed to carry out their duty under s. 11 (4) (a) of the Act in that they failed to inquire from the mother and lawful guardian of the infant what means of care and supervision would be available to the infant if she were discharged, (ii) that the opinion of the visitors was not arrived at judicially in that neither the mother nor her counsel was allowed to address them before they reached their opinion, and neither the mother nor her counsel was allowed to be present while the visitors examined the infant, and (iii) that the proceedings held by the visitors were null and void on account of denial of natural justice by the exclusion of the mother and her counsel.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant moves for an order of certiorari, to remove into this court and quash the report of the opinion reached by the statutory visitors on May 29, 1953, at St. Lawrence's Hospital, Caterham, in respect of Janet Edith Pritchard. The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 11, provides:

G

H

"(1) An order made under this Act that a defective be sent to an institution or placed under guardianship shall expire at the end of one year from its date, unless continued in manner hereinafter provided: Provided that in the case of any institution the [Board of Control] may by order direct that orders that persons be sent thereto shall, unless continued as hereinafter provided, expire on the quarter day next after the day on which the orders would have expired under the above provision. (2) An order shall remain in force for a year after the date when under the preceding provisions of this section it would have expired, and thereafter for successive periods of five years, if at that date and at the end of each period of one and five years respectively the board, after considering such special reports and certificate as is hereinafter mentioned and the report of any duly qualified medical practitioner who, at the request of the defective or his parent or guardian or any relative or friend, has made a medical examination of the defective and the means of care and supervision which would be available if the defective were discharged consider that the continuance of the order is required in his interests and make an order for the purpose: Provided that, where a defective was, at the time of being sent to the institution or placed under guardianship, under twenty-one years of age, the case shall be re-considered by the visitors appointed under this Act within three months after he attains the age of twenty-one years."

That proviso does not yet arise in this case because the infant has not attained the age of twenty-one years. It will be observed that on the clear terms of sub-s. (2) it is the Board of Control that has to come to a decision after considering "such special reports and certificate as is hereinafter mentioned" and also the report of any duly qualified medical practitioner, who, at the request of the defective or his parent or guardian, has examined the defective. Section 11 continues:

"(4) The special reports above mentioned shall be—(a) A special report by the visitors made within one month after having seen the defective as to his mental condition and the means of care and supervision which would be available if he were discharged, and stating whether, in the opinion of the visitors, the defective is still a proper person to be detained in his own interest in an institution or under guardianship."

It is now sought to quash the special report by the visitors. It seems to me that the first thing that has to be borne in mind in all these cases is: What is the scope of the order of certiorari? In these days certainly this court has no desire to limit the scope of the order of certiorari. Before modern legislation so enormously increased the number of orders and inquiries which are made by various government departments, certiorari only applied to what was strictly an inferior court. The writ of certiorari which used to be issued from this court was directed to the inferior tribunal, whatever it might be, calling on that tribunal to return into this court the record and orders it had made or the particular process it was desired to question in order that this court might examine what had been done and see whether or not it was in accordance with law. In modern times the scope of the order of certiorari has been considerably increased, and in a well-known judgment in R. v. Electricity Comrs. Ex p. London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920), Ltd. (1), ATKIN, L.J., said ([1924] 1 K.B. 205):

"Wherever any body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, and having the duty to act judicially, act in excess of their legal authority they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the [Queen's] Bench Division exercised in these writs."

It will be observed that there must be "authority to determine", and that the persons must be those who have a duty to act judicially, in which case, their orders, if they act in excess of their authority, can be reviewed by this court under the order of certiorari which has now taken the place of the writ. It is essential to remember, as we tried to emphasise recently in R. v. Metropolitan Police Comr. Ex p. Parker (2), that there must be something that can be called a determination which will affect the rights of the applicant and a tribunal whose duty it is to act judicially. It is not easy to give an exact definition of what is meant by "act judicially", but I should say that for this purpose it means a body bound to hear evidence from one side and the other. There need not be anything called strictly a lis, but the body would have to hear submissions and evidence by each side and come to a judicial

A decision approximately in the way that a court must do. Unless there is an order or a determination by the body to whom it is suggested the order should be directed the order of certiorari will not lie. Attempts are constantly made in this court nowadays to enlarge the order of certiorari beyond that which can possibly be allowed. We do not in any way desire to limit the control which this court can exercise over various bodies which are set up under a variety of statutes because it is very important that those bodies, though they may be given wide powers affecting the property of Her Majesty's subjects, should be controlled and kept within the bounds of the jurisdiction which has been conferred by Parliament. But if Parliament has put duties on, or given powers to, persons, it is not for this court to take away those powers unless we can find that the tribunal is exceeding its powers. The first question we have to decide in this case is whether the persons to whom this order is sought to be directed are a tribunal at all.

It appears clear to me, despite the authorities to which we have been referred, that these visitors are not, for this purpose, a tribunal at all and that they have no power to give a decision. The decision whether the infant is to remain in the hospital after the year has elapsed, that is to say, after Aug. 19, 1953, is to be the decision of the Board of Control, and these visitors' reports, which are prescribed in the Act, are no more than material which is put before the board to enable the board to come to a decision. The visitors have no power under s. 11 (4) (a) to say that this infant is to be detained after a year. All they have to do is to see her, to ascertain the means of care and supervision which will be available if she is discharged, and to state whether, in their opinion, she is a proper person to be detained in her own interest in the institution.

When the visitors assembled to consider this case the mother of the infant desired to be heard by them and to be represented by counsel. The visitors allowed the mother and her counsel to come into the room, but they did not hear her or her counsel in the way they would have been bound to hear her, if they had been a tribunal. If the tribunal was one which had power to come to a decision in the sense I have tried to explain, no doubt they would have heard her.

Where do we find that there is any obligation on the visitors to hear anybody? They are not entrusted with the duty of coming to a decision; that is the duty of the board. The board are told by Parliament what evidence or facts or matter they are to have before them when they come to a decision. It is always possible for the parent or guardian and the detained person himself to obtain the opinion of a duly qualified medical practitioner, who may or may not agree with the view put forward by the medical officer of the institution. To that, if it were put forward, no doubt the visitors would pay attention. Undoubtedly the board would pay attention to it. The secretary of the board has filed an affidavit in opposition to this motion in which there is set out the procedure the board follows and shows the care they take before they extend the order over a period of one year. In my opinion, it is abundantly clear that the visitors here are not a body against whom an order of certiorari will lie because they have no power to come to a decision. If the board come to a decision that this infant is to be detained, a question may then arise for our determination, but we cannot grant certiorari to bring up a report which is nothing more nor less than a piece of evidence to lay before the board. I have never heard of a case, and no case has been quoted, which shows that this court has ever granted certiorari to bring up a report.

Reliance was placed on R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Keasley (3), which, it is said, is conclusive of this case. That case was decided under s. 31 of the Act of 1913, and deals with an entirely different matter. In my opinion, that decision has no application to this case. I think that there are certain matters with regard to that decision which some day may be considered by the Court of Appeal, but I do notice that counsel for the respondents in that case appeared to admit that the order was one which could be subject to certiorari, for HUMPHREYS, J., said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 631):

"In my opinion, the order of certiorari ought to go in this case in regard to all three documents. In regard to the most important of those three—namely, the certificate of Oct. 5—as I understood the argument of [counsel for the respondents], he was not in a position to contend that, if that document was one which could not be allowed to stand, and ought not to stand, it was not a document which, in the circumstances, would fall within the language used by ATKIN, L.J., in R. v. Electricity Comrs. Ex p. London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920), Ltd. (1), to which [LORD HEWART, C.J.] has referred. Therefore, as I understood his argument, he was admitting (and certainly not contending to the contrary) that, if that document was a document exhibiting the defects which it was alleged to exhibit, it might be the subject of this order of certiorari."

Section 31 provided:

"(1) The duties of a local education authority shall include a duty to make arrangements, subject to the approval of the Board of Education, (a) for ascertaining what children within their area are defective children within the meaning of this Act; (b) for ascertaining which of such children are incapable by reason of mental defect of receiving benefit or further benefit from instruction in special schools or classes; (c) for notifying to the local authority under this Act, the names and addresses of defective children with respect to whom it is the duty of the local education authority to give notice under the provisions hereinbefore contained. In case of doubt as to whether a child is or is not capable of receiving such benefit as aforesaid, or whether the retention of a child in a special school or class would be detrimental to the interests of the other children, the matter shall be determined by the Board of Education."

In R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Kearsley (3) the local authority had made arrangements with the local education authority with regard to the education of a boy who, it was reported, was a fit subject for a special school. His parents were aggrieved by that, and wanted to argue that he could be normally educated at an ordinary school. Section 31 continued:

"(2) The provisions of s. 1 of the Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Act, 1899, shall apply with the necessary modifications for the purposes of this section."

Section 1 (1) of the Act of 1899 provided for arrangements to be made for defective and epileptic children and the manner in which they were to be made, and by s. 1 (3):

"For the purpose of ascertaining whether a child is defective or epileptic within the meaning of this section, a certificate to that effect by a duly qualified practitioner approved by the education department shall be required in each case. The certificate shall be in such form as may be prescribed by the education department."

I think it is desirable that some parts of the decision in R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Kearsley (3) should be considered by the Court of Appeal especially with regard to the admission made by counsel which, speaking for myself, I do not feel convinced was right. But there the court treated as documents which could be brought up and quashed both the certificate, which had to be given under s. 11 (4) (b) of the Act of 1913 because it was a certificate which decided the question whether the boy was an imbecile, and a letter which, it appeared to the court, decided the question whether or not the local education committee should make provision for the child. But, as I say, that has nothing to do with this particular case because here we are dealing with another section which is worded in a different manner, and whether or not it would have been desirable, at the meeting held by the visitors, that the mother should be allowed to attend and make representations, is not a matter for this court. It is a matter for Parliament.

- A It seems to me that there is nothing in s. 11 which could be construed as saying that the visitors have to receive evidence or even to allow anybody to be present other than the patient. It seems to me that such an argument is inconsistent with the provisions of the section, which, I think, is intended for the guidance of the board in considering whether they are going to make an order for the detention of the patient under the Act. After the year has expired they are to get the opinion of the visitors, who are to see the patient and form their opinion of him. Then they are to have a certificate from the doctor of the institution or some other doctor who may be appointed for that purpose with regard to the condition of the patient. If the parent or guardian of the patient chooses to have the opinion of a medical practitioner, that, no doubt, has to be considered by the board, but the decision is to be the decision of the board and not the decision of the visitors. It is impossible, looking at the whole of the section, to say that the visitors are to hold anything which can be called an inquiry in the sense that persons shall be allowed to be present at the inquiry or that they shall hear evidence. They have to form an opinion and report to the board, and to say that their report, which is nothing more than a report of their opinion, can be brought up to be quashed by this court by means of certiorari would be extending the doctrine relating to certiorari to an unlimited and an unfortunate extent. It may be that many people might think that increased facilities should be given to persons interested in these cases to make representations to the visitors. They can make representations, no doubt, to the board. As I say, the board has set out in an affidavit the procedure they follow, and I have no doubt that their desire is to consider most carefully everything that can be placed before them before they come to a decision whether or not a patient is to be detained. I am not expressing any opinion in what circumstances, if any, certiorari will lie to the board; it is not a matter with which we are concerned at the present time.

- E I ought, perhaps, to say that reliance was placed by counsel for the infant on the Mental Deficiency Regulations, 1948, reg. 99, which, he says, recognises that the report of the visitors is a decision. I do not think it does. Regulation 99 deals with visitors acting not only under s. 11 (2) of the Act of 1913, but also under s. 11 (3) which is concerned with a different matter and provides:

- G "On such re-consideration the visitors shall visit the defective or summon him to attend before them and inquire into his mental condition and the means of care and supervision which would be available if he were discharged and into all the circumstances of the case, and, if it appears to them that further detention in an institution or under guardianship is no longer required in the interests of the defective himself, shall order him to be discharged: Provided that, if the visitors do not order his discharge, the defective or his parent or guardian may, within fourteen days after the decision of the visitors has been communicated to the defective and his parent or guardian, appeal to the board."

- H The visitors are given a power to make a decision within three months after the date when a patient attains the age of twenty-one, and the patient is not entitled to be discharged by reason of the order expiring, but merely on the fact that he has arrived at an age when either he will be discharged by the decision of the visitors or his parent or guardian can appeal to the board. That is simply a provision as to what is to happen when a person who has been committed while an infant comes of age, quite irrespective, it seems to me, of the period for which the order is to remain in force under s. 11 (2). If the order has come to an end, there is no need for the re-consideration, but, if the order has not come to an end, there is to be a re-consideration and the patient may be discharged if the visitors think it is no longer necessary that he should be detained. I think reg. 99 is, as the marginal note shows, giving what I may call an omnibus form of directions to the visitors when they are inquiring under s. 11 (2) and (3), and their duties and powers are quite different. Therefore, I do not think reg. 99 helps the infant in this case.

The result is that, in my opinion, this application is misconceived because certiorari will not lie, and, therefore, the motion must be dismissed. But I want to say one other word on a matter of some importance before I part with this case. Two reports, both of which were properly before the visitors, one of the medical officer of the institution, and the other of an officer of the London County Council Public Health Department, were made exhibits to the affidavit which two of the visitors made and counsel for the visitors told us that he advised that those reports should be disclosed so that no suggestion could be made that the visitors were concealing anything from the court. I think, however, it should be understood that these reports are of a highly confidential nature. I do not suggest for a moment that Crown privilege can be claimed for them, but these are reports which officials are directed to make to enable the visitors to carry out the duty of forming an opinion under this Act. It is obvious that in making these reports matters of a private nature have to be dealt with. They have to report on the condition of the home, on their opinion of the parents, and also on the condition of the patient. It is most desirable that officers who have to make this kind of report to a body such as the visitors to be laid before the Board of Control should be able to report frankly and freely without any fear that the reports will be disclosed in courts of law or shown to persons, which might lead to actions of libel or something of that sort. The right course is that where reports have been before the visitors they should mention the facts and then submit those documents for the consideration of the court. We do not think it was ever intended that these reports should be treated as other than highly confidential and they are not to be disclosed unless the court thinks that a good purpose would be served. The reports should be in court so that the court can look at them. The court, if it thinks they ought to be shown to the other side, will so direct and, if necessary, will allow an adjournment for them to be considered. Although I can understand why they were produced, and we are not attaching any blame to counsel for the advice he gave to the visitors, we think for the guidance of the authorities in these matters that these reports ought not to be disclosed unless the court is of the opinion that they should be.

PARKER, J.: I agree. In my opinion, it cannot be too clearly understood that the remedy by way of certiorari only lies to bring up to this court and quash something which is a determination or a decision. In the passage my Lord has already quoted ([1924] 1 K.B. 205) from R. v. Electricity Comrs. Ex p. London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920), Ltd. (1), it is plain that ATKIN, L.J., was dealing with a determination of questions affecting the rights of subjects; and in R. v. London County Council. Ex p. Entertainments Protection Assn., Ltd. (4), SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1931] 2 K.B. 233):

"The writ of certiorari is a very old and high prerogative writ drawn up for the purpose of enabling the court of [Queen's] Bench to control the action of inferior courts and to make it certain that they shall not exceed their jurisdiction; and therefore the writ of certiorari is intended to bring into the High Court the decision of the inferior tribunal, in order that the High Court may be certified whether the decision is within the jurisdiction of the inferior court."

There has been a great deal of discussion and a large number of cases extending the meaning of the word "court". A number of such cases was referred to in R. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee. Ex p. R. A. Brand & Co., Ltd. (5), but nothing in that case was intended to or did in any way enlarge the scope of the remedy by way of certiorari so far as it affects this point. There must be a decision or determination. The sole question in debate in that case was the scope of the court or tribunal or body of persons, and nothing to do with whether it was or was not necessary to have a determination or decision.

A In the present case, as the notice of motion itself states, the court is being asked to quash the report of the opinion reached by the statutory visitors. Parliament itself has pointed, it seems to me, the contrast between the duties of the visitors under s. 11 (2) of the Act, which is the case here, and under s. 11 (3). Section 11 (3) is clearly dealing only with the case of re-consideration when a patient comes of age and enables the visitors to arrive at a decision. B Parliament uses the word "decision", and the visitors can order the discharge or the continued detention of the patient, and in the event of the latter decision there is a right of appeal to the board. When they are acting under s. 11 (3) the visitors are clearly coming to a decision, whereas under s. 11 (2) all they have to do is to report to the Board of Control whether in their opinion the defective is still a proper person to be detained in his own interests in an institution. C Having made that report, it is then for the board alone to come to a decision on the matter and to direct, if the board so decides, a continuation of the detention order.

Counsel for the infant has pointed to the use of the word "decision" in the Mental Deficiency Regulations, 1948, and, in particular, in regs. 99 and 102. So far as reg. 102 is concerned, where it says that the visitors shall communicate their decision on the case to the board, it is perfectly plain that that regulation D is dealing only with the case of re-consideration under s. 11 (3). By reg. 99 (2), however, it is provided that before making any decision the visitors shall consider a report as to a number of different matters. By the marginal note to reg. 99, it appears that it is an omnibus provision dealing with the way in which the visitors are to carry out their duties both under s. 11 (2) and (3). So far as s. 11 (3) is concerned, "decision" is the word used by the Act itself.

E Counsel also relied on R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Keasley (3). So far as that case is concerned, I would say two things. First, as my Lord has said, it was there conceded, rightly or wrongly, that the certificate in question was a document with regard to which certiorari would lie, but, quite apart from that, the case arose under different sections of the Act, and, in particular, under s. 31 which F empowered, and, indeed, made it the duty of, the local education authority to ascertain what children within its area were incapable of receiving further benefit at school. It was further provided, by invoking the Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Act, 1899, that in arriving at that decision they were required to have a certificate to the effect that the child was a defective by a duly qualified practitioner approved by the education G department, and it was that certificate which was quashed in Boycott's case (3). By the Mental Deficiency (Notification of Children) Regulations, 1914, made under the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 2 (2), it was further provided that the local education authority, having got that certificate, had to consider the matter. If they thought it was a question of doubt, they had under, s. 31 (1) and reg. 2 (2), to refer the matter for the determination of the Board of Education. H On the other hand, if they were satisfied that there was no doubt, they had, under reg. 2 (1), to send on the certificate with a covering letter to the proper department of the local authority, the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913 committee, and in Boycott's case (3) it is to be observed that the procedure was followed out and on Oct. 10, 1938, the education committee wrote to the mental deficiency committee saying ([1939] 2 All E.R. 630):

"I am directed to forward herewith copy of the report of Dr. Norman Boycott on Form 306 M with regard to this boy and am to request that the committee under the Mental Deficiency Act will be so good as to consider the advisability of arranging for the boy to be medically examined with a view of his certification . . .”

So it may be that—I am not deciding it—the matter was conceded before the court, but it may be that the decision there could be justified on the basis that that letter coupled with the report was the decision of the local education authority under s. 31, that there was no doubt which would require the matter to be referred to the Board of Education, and that they had ascertained that the child was incapable of deriving any further benefit. A Reference was also made to R. v. Postmaster-General. Ex p. Carmichael (6), where the certificate of the Post Office medical officer certifying that a workman was suffering from telegraphist's cramp was quashed on the ground that the medical officer in question was not the person laid down by the Act. That case was also relied on as being one of a certificate being quashed, but it is to be observed that, although that certificate did not completely conclude the matter, in that the workman who had got the certificate still had to show that his condition resulted from his employment, nevertheless it was final and conclusive on the point that the workman was suffering from cramp, which was the first condition of his obtaining compensation. B C

In my view, this motion fails on the ground that there is no decision or determination to be quashed, and, accordingly, it is unnecessary for me to consider whether the visiting justices could be said to be under any duty in a case such as this to hear the mother or any representation on her behalf. I agree that this motion fails. D

DONOVAN, J.: I agree. In particular I agree with the views expressed by the other members of the court for distinguishing this case from R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Keasley (3).

BROWNING v. J. W. H. WATSON (ROCHESTER), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 28, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Express carriage—Special occasion—Conveyance of private party—Conveyance of members of club to football matches on six separate occasions—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 61 (2)—Conveyance of persons not members of club—No knowledge by owners of carriage—Vicarious liability—Road Traffic Act, 1934 (c. 50), s. 25 (1).

The respondents were charged under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 72 (1), with unlawfully permitting a motor coach to be used as an express carriage without a road service licence. On six Saturdays during the period August to November, 1952, they hired a motor coach, which was not being used under such a licence, to a club to take members of the club to a nearby town to watch league football matches. On one occasion, unknown to the respondents, two persons who were not members of the club travelled on the coach, so that the party conveyed was not a "private party" within the proviso to s. 61 (2) of the Act.

HELD: (i) the words "special occasion" in the proviso to s. 61 (2) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, must be construed to include occasions ejusdem generis with the race meetings and public gatherings mentioned in the proviso to s. 61 (1); the football matches in question were special to the locality in which they were played; and, accordingly, each of the occasions was a "special occasion" within the exception in the proviso to s. 61 (2).

(ii) the mere fact that the respondents did not know that on one occasion there were persons in the coach who were not members of the club did not absolve them from liability; they should have taken precautions to see that only members of the club were on the coach; and, therefore, they were guilty of an offence on that occasion.

CASE STATED by city of Rochester justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Rochester on Mar. 27, 1953, the appellant, Ernest Clifford Browning, on behalf of the licensing authority for public service vehicles for the South Eastern Traffic Area, preferred six informations against the respondents, J. W. H. Watson (Rochester), Ltd., charging that on six Saturdays during the period August to November, 1952, they unlawfully permitted a motor vehicle to be used as an express carriage within the meaning of the Road Traffic Acts, 1930 to 1937, on the road between Rainham and Gillingham in Kent, otherwise than under a road service licence granted by the licensing authority, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 72 (1).

It was proved or admitted that the respondents were coach proprietors and owners of a double-decked motor coach. On Aug. 30, Sept. 13 and 27, Oct. 18, and Nov. 1 and 15, 1952, the motor coach was hired from the respondents by the secretary of the United Services Club, Rainham, to take members of the club to Gillingham football ground, where, on each occasion, the first team of the Gillingham football club was playing in a Third Division (Southern) League match. On each occasion the hiring was arranged a few days beforehand. On Nov. 15, 1952, the appellant and one Lander, a traffic examiner in the service of the licensing authority, boarded the motor coach when it was standing outside the club premises at Rainham and travelled to Gillingham football ground as passengers, returning by the motor coach after the match. Fares were collected from them and from a few other passengers by a member of the committee of the club. Neither the respondents' servants nor anyone else, save the appellant and Lander, were aware that the motor coach was carrying as passengers anyone who was not a member of the club. Had this fact been known, the coach would have been stopped immediately and the appellant and Lander compelled to leave it. Except on this one occasion, all persons who travelled in the motor coach on those dates were members of the United Services Club. According to the work tickets relating to the journeys, and in fact, each of the journeys was from the United Services Club, Rainham, to Gillingham football ground. On each occasion the respondents complied with the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 25 (1) (b) to (g). Section 25 (1) (a) was complied with on all occasions except Nov. 15, 1952, when the appellant and Lander were present in the motor coach. The respondents had no road service licence to use the motor coach as an express carriage on any of the material dates.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the journeys were not made on special occasions within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 61 (2), and that, as the appellant and Lander had been able to travel as passengers on the motor coach on Nov. 15, 1952, it was not used on that date for the conveyance of a private party. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that a separate hiring of the motor coach was made in respect of each journey to Gillingham, and, accordingly, each occasion should be considered separately. As on each occasion a football match was taking place at Gillingham, each occasion was a special occasion. As the presence of the appellant and Lander in the motor coach on Nov. 15, 1952, was unknown to the respondents, their servants or agents, the respondents had not permitted the motor coach to be used otherwise than for the conveyance of a private party.

The justices dismissed the informations and the appellant appealed.

Skelhorn for the appellant.

Van Oss for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the city of Rochester before whom the respondent company was charged on six informations with allowing a vehicle, alleged to be in the category of "express carriage", to be used without the appropriate licence for the conveyance of persons, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 72 (1). The answer made by the respondents was that the persons in the vehicle were being conveyed as private parties on special occasions. This raises the sometimes difficult questions which come before this court, both on the meaning of "special occasion" and on the meaning of "private party". [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The appeal is brought to test whether the justices were right in holding that the occasions were special occasions, and it is sought to say that, because there were six football matches, they could not be special occasions.

The proviso to s. 61 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, provides:

" . . . a motor vehicle adapted to carry less than eight passengers shall not be deemed to be a stage carriage or an express carriage by reason only that on occasions of race meetings, public gatherings and other like special occasions it is used to carry passengers at separate fares."

By s. 61 (2):

"It is hereby declared that where persons are carried in a motor vehicle for any journey in consideration of separate payments made by them, whether to the owner of the vehicle or to any other person, the vehicle in which they are carried shall be deemed to be a vehicle carrying passengers for hire or reward at separate fares, whether the payments are solely in respect of the journey or not. Provided that a vehicle used on a special occasion for the conveyance of a private party shall not be deemed to be a vehicle carrying passengers for hire or reward at separate fares by reason only that the members of the party have made separate payments which cover their conveyance by that vehicle on that occasion."

Obviously the proviso to sub-s. (1) does not, in terms, apply to this case, because the vehicle in question was adapted to carry more than eight passengers. The cases which have dealt with this matter start with Nelson v. Blackford (1), where this court, in giving judgment, said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 110):

"A special occasion must be a particular and individual occasion analogous to a race meeting."

That was a case under s. 61 (1) and in the proviso to that sub-section "special occasions" is part of the phrase "race meetings, public gatherings and other like special occasions". If the expression "special occasions" is used twice in the same section it bears the same meaning. Therefore, the court has said, practically in so many words, that, in construing the proviso to sub-s. (2), one must apply the ejusdem generis rule and consider whether the occasion is something in the nature of a race meeting or public gathering—an occasion for which it is contemplated that extra transport will be required to satisfy the public who want to go to these places. The justices have found that these football matches were special occasions, and the question is whether they were right in view of the fact that there were six matches all taking place within a comparatively short space of time. It should be observed that there were no more than two in one month. We are not, therefore, dealing with a case like Nelson v. Blackford (1), where illuminations went on for seven weeks at Blackpool and this court said that there cannot be a special occasion where things go on for such a period. Here you have football matches of a special nature, in the sense that they are not just ordinary club matches, but are league matches, and occurring not more than twice a month. Could the justices on those facts, properly find that they were special occasions? In my opinion, clearly they could.

Reliance is placed on Miller v. Pill, Pill v. Furse, Pill v. J. Mutton & Son (2), which had to be considered by this court in Wurzal v. Dowker (3) because of a dictum of my own in Victoria Motors (Scarborough), Ltd. v. Wurzal (4), for which, I hope, in Wurzal v. Dowker (3) I stood sufficiently in a white sheet and with a candle in my hand because the attention of the court had not been called, in the Victoria Motors case (4), to Miller v. Pill (2). I still think the view we held was preferable to the view held in Miller v. Pill (2), but we are bound by the latter case. In Miller v. Pill (2) HUMPHREYS, J., said, rather summarising what the other members of the court had said ([1933] 2 K.B. 318):

"... I should come to the conclusion that the expression 'special occasion' refers to something more than the views and intentions of the members of the party and points to something which can be described as a special occasion in the locality and was the object of the journey being undertaken."

A football match is frequently a special occasion in the locality. I cannot see, for this purpose, the difference between a football match and a race meeting. The Act has not provided, in enacting that race meetings are special occasions, that they must be meetings which only take place two or three times a year or at certain specified intervals. Therefore, I think, when there is a football match and a club is playing a different club each time—and there is no pretence here of saying that this was being used simply to provide what I may call an unauthorised omnibus service; it was a trip provided for the members of a particular club to attend the particular occasion which the justices were, in my opinion, justified in holding was special to the locality—that the requirements of the decision of Miller v. Pill (2) and all the doubts which may have existed since then are amply satisfied by the facts of this case. Therefore, I think that, with regard to five of these informations, there was evidence on which the justices could find, and were justified in finding, that the occasions of the journeys were special.

With regard to the next point, on one of these occasions two persons in the employ of the Minister of Transport insinuated themselves among the members of the club and got into the coach, and, therefore, as they were not members of the club for whom the coach had been hired, but were outsiders, they prevented the party from being a private party. The justices thought that the respondents could not be convicted because they did not know of the presence of these two people among the members of the party in the coach. Reliance has been placed on Reynolds v. G. H. Austin & Sons, Ltd. (5), in which this court, in a reserved judgment, went very fully into the question of vicarious liability in these cases, but it should be observed that the facts in that case were of a somewhat special nature. A women's institute had engaged a coach to take them on an outing, and, as they had not sold enough tickets in the township where the institute was, they put an advertisement in the window of a shop some miles away, and, therefore, there had been a previous advertisement to the public of the arrangements for the party. We pointed out that the advertisement was an advertisement by the promoter and the trip was advertised a long distance away. There were no practical means by which the proprietors of the coach could know of the advertisement, and they had no reason to suppose that the trip had been advertised. Accordingly, reviewing the cases over a long period, we came to the conclusion that the proprietors were not vicariously liable by reason of the fact that the persons who engaged them had committed a breach of the Act. But I think it is implicit throughout the judgments that we were excluding a case where a man or a company might incur vicarious liability because of the conduct of their servants. Here, the coach was in charge of the respondents' servant, and, although he did not know that persons who were not members of the club got in the coach, that was because he did not inquire or take any precaution to see that only members were admitted, and we cannot absolve the respondents on that ground. The prohibitions in the Act are absolute, and, while it is true that in Reynolds v. G. H. Austin & Sons, Ltd. (5) we refused to impose vicarious liability and a good deal of discussion took place about the doctrine of mens rea, in cases of absolute prohibition mens rea can be supplied by the simple doing of the forbidden act. We cannot say here that, if a coach proprietor lets a coach to a club for the conveyance of the members of the club and allows people who are not members of the club to get into the coach, he is not liable. Of course, this was not a wilful violation, but it is clear that the respondents should have taken some precaution. They should have told the football club: "We will only do this if either you issue tickets to the members so that we can see that the people who get on the coach are members, or one of your servants, or the secretary of the club, or some other person, stands at the starting place to see that only members of the party get on to the coach." But I think that it would be going too far to say that, if the members of the public, other than members of the party, get on to the coach and are conveyed, it is an answer to say: "We did not know that that had happened". At the same time, the justices are entitled to take all the facts into consideration. No court in England has ever liked action by what are generally called agents provocateurs resulting in imposing criminal liability. We must, therefore, hold that, in the case of the sixth information—i.e., the information relating to Nov. 15, 1952—there was an offence, but we remind the magistrates that it is possible for them to grant an absolute discharge and it is not necessary for them when they do grant an absolute discharge to order payment of costs. The case must go back to the magistrates with a direction that this offence is proved, and they can deal with it as they like.

PARKER, J.: I agree. I would only add that, on the facts found by the magistrates, it is impossible to say that they were wrong in holding that the six occasions in question were not special occasions. Speaking for myself, I should like to reserve the question whether, if in any particular case the facts showed that the occasions in question were more frequent, the time might come when those occasions ceased to be special occasions by reason of their frequency.

DONOVAN, J.: I agree, and I also agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J., that in determining what is a special occasion one must return in the end to the words in the proviso to s. 61 (1), namely: "race meetings, public gatherings and other like special occasions". These last words are to be construed to include "occasions" ejusdem generis with race meetings and public gatherings. I find it difficult to conceive of a genus which will include race meetings and public gatherings and yet exclude a football match, such as the present, an English league match probably attracting thousands of spectators. On the other aspect of the case I have no further observations to make.

G The applicants were owners of mechanically-propelled lime-spreading vehicles, which were loaded with lime at lime quarries and driven by road to farms on which they operated as lime-spreaders. H HELD: although the vehicles were used for agricultural purposes, they were also constructed and used for the conveyance of lime, and, therefore, they were being used for carriage, and so were goods vehicles, and fell to be taxed as such under s. 5 of the Act.

MOTION for an order of mandamus directing the Berkshire County Council to hear and determine an application made on Jan. 21, 1953, that three of the applicants' mechanically-propelled lime-spreading vehicles, registration

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. The following judgments were read.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicants moves for an order of mandamus directed to the Berkshire County Council commanding them to hear and determine according to law an application that three of the applicants' mechanically-propelled lime-spreading vehicles be granted road vehicle excise licences as agricultural engines in accordance with s. 4 (2) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, as amended by s. 13 of the Finance Act, 1950. The point which has to be determined is this: Are these vehicles to be regarded as agricultural engines as the applicants contend or as goods vehicles as the county council contends? The difference in the duty payable is very considerable, according to whether they fall into one class or the other. The vehicles in question are of a composite nature, consisting of an internal combustion engine and driver's cab mounted on a chassis on which is also imposed a large receptacle for the purpose of holding lime. The receptacle is fitted with a device for enabling the lime to be spread on the agricultural land over which the vehicle is driven, and the applicants' business is to carry lime to the fields of the farmers who may employ them and then spread it. B

Section 4 of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, prescribes the duty chargeable in respect of the mechanically-propelled vehicles to which the section applies, and sub-s. (2), as amended by s. 13 of the Finance Act, 1950, is in these terms: C

"This section applies to the following mechanically-propelled vehicles, that is to say—(a) locomotive ploughing engines, tractors, agricultural tractors and other agricultural engines, which are not used on public roads for hauling any objects, except as follows . . ."

and then in the following five sub-paragraphs are set out the articles which, and the circumstances in which, they may be hauled by these agricultural tractors and engines. The sub-section goes on to deal with a variety of other vehicles, such as those designed and constructed for trench digging and excavations and as mobile cranes which may be used under certain conditions on public roads, mowing machines, and certain other vehicles which it is unnecessary to mention. Section 5 of the Act provides for the duties payable in respect of a goods vehicle, and by s. 27 (1) D

"'goods vehicle' means a mechanically propelled vehicle . . . constructed or adapted for use and used for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description, whether in the course of trade or otherwise."

In considering into which category these lime-spreaders, which are, undoubtedly, used for agricultural purposes, but also are constructed and used for the conveyance of lime, fall, it is necessary to refer to s. 1 of the Act. That reads: E

"Subject to the provisions of this Act—(a) there shall be charged in respect of mechanically-propelled vehicles used on public roads in Great Britain the duties of excise provided by the next five following sections of this Act . . ."

It is clear, therefore, that the main purpose of the Act is to tax vehicles used on public roads. So long as a vehicle is not used on a road it escapes tax altogether. Once it comes on a road it becomes liable to tax unless it can be brought within an exemption. Section 4 (2) is dealing with mechanically-propelled agricultural vehicles which may, from time to time, come on to the public roads. They will remain taxable at the lower rate so long as they only are used on the roads for the purpose of hauling, but, if they are on the roads and are used for carrying goods, I can find no ground for saying that they are not taxable as goods-carrying vehicles. They must not be used on public roads for hauling any objects except those set out specifically in s. 4 (2), and that sub-section, so far as it relates to agricultural vehicles, is dealing with haulage and nothing but haulage. The Act clearly distinguishes between haulage and carriage. An agricultural vehicle is entitled to haul under certain conditions, but it is not entitled to be used for carriage, and that seems to me to dispose of the case and to show that the county council are right in the view that they have taken. In my opinion, the motion fails and must be dismissed.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

DONOVAN, J.: I agree. I add a few observations in order to deal with specific arguments of counsel for the applicants. There is no definition in the Act of "an agricultural engine." Counsel for the applicants suggests as a definition: "A machine by which power is applied to the doing of farming work, e.g., ploughing, sowing, manuring, etc." It is unnecessary for the purposes of the present case either to adopt or reject this definition, though, for my own part, I would not quarrel with it. "Goods vehicles" are defined by s. 27 (1) of the Act in terms which LORD GODDARD, C.J., has already quoted.

In my opinion, it is not possible to say that "agricultural engines" and "goods vehicles" are, within the meaning of the Act, mutually exclusive terms. The Act itself contemplates the contrary, for s. 4 (3) provides that some, only, of the vehicles charged under s. 4 (2) shall not be chargeable under s. 5. These excepted vehicles are mobile cranes. It follows that an "agricultural engine" may also be a "goods vehicle". In my opinion, that is true of the vehicles here in question, for they plainly carry goods, namely, the lime, which is going to be supplied to the farmer together with the service of spreading it. The lime which is to be so supplied and so spread cannot be regarded as akin to the petrol carried by a lorry for its own propulsion as counsel for the applicants suggests.

In these circumstances, why is the lime-spreader not chargeable under s. 5? The answer suggested is that s. 5, unlike s. 4, begins with the words: "Subject to the provisions of this Act", and this makes s. 4 paramount. If the words quoted were otherwise empty of content, there might be something to be said for this construction, but they are not. They refer, inter alia, to the numerous exemptions from duty contained in s. 7. There are, in addition, clear indications in the statute that, if a vehicle comes within s. 5 as a goods vehicle, it is to be taxed as such. The first is that contained in s. 4 (3), exempting, out of the whole category of s. 4 (2) vehicles, only mobile cranes from chargeability under s. 5. Another is s. 2 (3) which specifically exempts vehicles chargeable under s. 2 from chargeability under s. 3 or s. 5. It would be unnecessary to provide this specific exemption from s. 5 if the opening words of that section were enough. Here it is material to observe that the words: "Subject to the provisions of this Act" do not appear in s. 2 any more than they do in s. 4. Another indication is s. 13 (1), providing that, if a vehicle has been taxed under one category and is used for a purpose which brings it within another, taxed at a higher rate, the higher rate is to become chargeable.

These considerations make it clear, in my view, that, if a vehicle is a goods vehicle, it is to be taxed under s. 5, whether it is also an agricultural engine or not. For the reasons already stated I think the lime-spreader is a goods vehicle within the statutory definition. In this connection it is not uninteresting to observe that local authorities' water carts which spread water on the streets are specifically named in sched. IV to the Act as goods vehicles. For these reasons I agree that the motion should be dismissed.

Application refused.

Court of Appeal—Fresh evidence—Evidence obtainable at time of trial—Adminis- C inquiries—Reasonableness.

During the subsistence of the testator's marriage to B., A. bore him three children, two sons and a daughter, born in 1920, 1928 and 1933 respectively. On June 8, 1943, B., who had had no issue, died, and the testator married A. one week later. No child was born during the subsistence of the testator's second marriage. By his will dated Mar. 7, 1949, the testator, who died in September, 1950, gave his residuary estate on trust to pay an annuity to A. and subject thereto on trust "for such of them my children or child (if only one) living at my death who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter have attained or shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common." The testator's personal representatives issued an originating summons to determine whether the gift to the testator's children operated as a gift to his illegitimate children, and asked, if necessary, for administration of the testator's estate and the usual accounts, inquiries and directions. On the construction of the will, it was held, at first instance, that the illegitimate children could not take. They appealed, and applied for leave to adduce evidence to show that at the date of the will the testator was, to his own knowledge, sexually impotent, a fact of which they were not aware until after the decision of the court. D

HELD: having regard to the facts that the proceedings were in the nature of an administration action in which the persons interested were entitled to assume that all the material facts would be put before the court, that one of the persons concerned to establish the evidence was an infant, and that the matters with which the evidence dealt were of a personal, delicate nature on which the children would not ordinarily feel qualified to question their mother, it could not be said that reasonable diligence on the part of the children would have enabled them to adduce the evidence at first instance; and, as the evidence was such that, if it established the fact towards which it was directed, it would be conclusive in favour of the children, the evidence ought to be admitted. APPEAL by the first three defendants from a decision of VAISEY, J., dated Jan. 22, 1953.

By his will, the testator devised his residuary estate subject to an annuity to his wife for life "for such of them my children or child (if only one) living at my death who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter have attained or shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common." The testator left no legitimate children, but had three illegitimate children. The administrators took out an originating summons for the determination of the questions and for the relief following: (i) whether on the true construction of the said will and a codicil thereto the devise and bequest to the children operated as an effective devise or bequest to the first three defendants or who otherwise was entitled to the said residuary estate under the said devise or bequest, (ii) for an order that one of the defendants should represent the whole class of next of kin, (iii) for administration of the real and personal estate of the testator, and (iv) for all usual necessary accounts, inquiries and directions. The only evidence before VAISEY, J., was an affidavit of one of the administrators which did not deal with the issue of the testator's sexual capacity. After the decision of VAISEY, J., the first three defendants obtained evidence that at the date of his will the testator was to his knowledge permanently incompetent. They applied for leave to adduce fresh evidence on the issue of incompetence.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The late Mr. William Rufus Herwin, who died in September, 1950, made a will on Mar. 7, 1949, which was plainly a professionally drawn will, and in it he disposed of his residue as follows:

"The bank [Lloyds Bank, Ltd., whom he had appointed executor and trustee] shall stand possessed of [the trust fund] upon trust to pay out of the income thereof an annuity of £250 to my wife Annie Dorothea Herwin during her life and subject thereto upon trust (as to both capital and income thereof) for such of them my children or child (if only one) living at my death who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter have attained or shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common."

By a codicil dated Aug. 18, 1950, the testator bequeathed certain additional legacies, including (a) a legacy "to my wife Annie Dorothea Herwin" of £100, and (b) "to my daughter Sheila the sum of £500 upon her attaining twenty-one years."

The testator was twice married. The date of his birth seems a little uncertain. We have before us what is called an agreed statement as to dates, which gives the date of birth as being Oct. 21, 1873, but counsel for the next of kin has stated that that date is not in fact agreed, and it may not be accurate. On Apr. 6, 1896, he was married to his first wife, and it is clear that he must have been, then, at any rate, an adult. The marriage between the testator and his first wife appears to have been childless, and she, the first wife, died on June 8, 1943. The testator married his second wife, the wife referred to in his will, Annie Dorothea Herwin, a week after the death of his first wife, on June 15, 1943, and that fact alone would indicate that the testator and the present Mrs. Herwin had been closely associated for some time before their marriage. Indeed, the testator had had three children by the present Mrs. Herwin, all born during the period of the subsistence of his first marriage. Those three children are the appellants in this court, two sons and one daughter. The sons are William Sidney Rufus Herwin, who was born in September, 1920, and, therefore, is now nearly thirty-three, and Frank Stuart Herwin, born in November, 1928, and, therefore, now about twenty-four; the daughter is Sheila Patricia Mary Herwin, who has since been married, and who was the daughter Sheila referred to in the codicil, born on Aug. 8, 1933, and, therefore, now a young woman not quite twenty. No children were born to Mrs. Herwin after the date of her marriage to the testator in June, 1943.

The question arose whether the disposition of the testator's residue in favour of "my children or child" took effect in the absence of any legitimate children. In order to resolve that doubt the widow and Alec John Herwin, who had together taken out letters of administration cum testamento annexo, issued a summons in the ordinary form in the Chancery Division, to which they joined as defendants the three children of the testator who were born, as I say, to Mrs. Herwin before her marriage, and also four other persons as being next of kin of the testator. These latter would take (alone or with others) the residue if the gift to the children should be found ineffective.

The form of the summons in the ordinary way would not, perhaps, be worthy of note, but having regard to the argument I will draw attention to the fact that by it the two plaintiffs, as administrators, ask for "the determination of the questions and for the relief respectively following, that is to say :—1. whether upon the true construction of the said will and codicil thereto . . . the devise and bequest to his children . . . contained in cl. 6 of his said will operates as an effective devise or bequest to the above-named [the first three defendants, the three illegitimate children] or who otherwise is entitled to the said residuary estate under the said devise or bequest."

Secondly, the plaintiffs ask for an order that one of the defendants should represent the whole class of next of kin who would take in default of the testamentary provision taking effect, and, thirdly, if necessary, for administration of the real (if any) and personal estate of the said testator and for such purpose all usual and necessary accounts, inquiries, and directions.

The evidence which supported that summons consisted solely of an affidavit of Alec John Herwin, the second plaintiff and one of the administrators, in which, following the normal practice, he set out the relevant parts of the will, and then proceeded to state as follows:

"During the lifetime of the said Clara Clayton [the testator's first wife] and during the subsistence of the marriage referred to in para. 6 hereof [the marriage with Clara Clayton] there were born to the said Annie Dorothea Herwin by the testator three children . . ."

and then the three first defendants are named. That was the whole of the evidence which was before the court as to the relationship of the children to the testator, or of the relevant circumstances of the testator from and after the date of his second marriage.

At first sight it might appear that the reference in the codicil to "my daughter Sheila" could be regarded as an indication that when the testator spoke in his will (which by codicil he confirmed) of "my children" he was at least intending to include the children who had been born to his then wife, although they were not born in wedlock. Indeed, the impression which the will conveys is clearly such as to raise the plainest possible suspicion in one's mind that the testator, by his reference to "children" in cl. 6 of the will, meant to include those three children. I do not propose to take time, in the circumstances, by reading other parts of the will, but, perhaps, I might add, by way of enforcing what I have said, that he appointed his then wife, Mrs. Herwin, the guardian of those children or such of them as were infants, and Sheila was, and is still,

A an infant. So, indeed, the will struck the mind of VAISEY, J., whose duty it was to construe it, but, having regard to the long-established (though, it is sometimes thought, somewhat harsh) line of authorities, he felt, on the material before him (and the admissible surrounding circumstances were very limited, as I have already said) that he was unable to conclude as a matter of construction that the intention to comprehend illegitimate children, though likely, was
B certain. He, therefore, came, and as I say, he came reluctantly, to the conclusion that the residue of the estate was undisposed of.

The first three defendants, the three children, thereupon appealed to this court, but on May 1, 1953, while the appeal was pending, they served a notice of motion on the other defendants and the plaintiffs, asking, in accordance with the procedure normally adopted, that this court should give leave to the
C appellants on the hearing of the appeal to call fresh evidence, that evidence being directed to establishing the very important matter of fact that at the time when the testator made his will and his codicil, and, indeed, at all times that are relevant, not only was he in fact impotent and, therefore, incapable of having any further children at all, but also that he was well aware of that fact. I shall come in a moment to refer briefly to the evidence in support
D of those assertions, but first I must deal as a matter of principle with the question whether it is right that in this court the plaintiffs should be allowed to tender that further evidence.

The rule which has been laid down—and it is one which rests on the firm basis that it is in the public interest that there should be an end of litigation—has many times been stated, and recently so in this court in Braddock v. Tillotson's Newspapers, Ltd. (1). That was a somewhat unusual case in that
E the application was not to call some new witness, but to have a witness for the other side re-called in order that he might be cross-examined. The appellants in the case that I am citing stated that they had no knowledge at the time of the trial, and had no reasonable means of finding out, that the particular witness was a person of light character, who might have been most effectively
F cross-examined as to credit had the facts been known to the appellants, and they further contended that the destruction of the credibility of this witness would, at the very least, have had a very strong influence on the conclusion reached at the trial. I have referred to those facts to indicate that it was a peculiar case, and, of course, it is not, on the facts, in the least like the present matter which is of a more usual character, viz., an application to lead fresh
G evidence in chief in support of the appellants' claim.

The decision of this court in Braddock v. Tillotson (1) was adverse to the appellants seeking to have the witness re-called, on the ground that it was not in accordance with the principle which this court adopts to allow a witness to be re-called merely in order that he or she may be cross-examined as to credit. TUCKER, L.J., in giving the leading judgment, referred to the general
H rule on which this court acts, in language which I respectfully adopt and which it is convenient to cite. He said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 309):

"It has been the invariable practice of this court to confine the admission of fresh evidence in circumstances such as this to evidence which could not reasonably have been discovered before the trial and to evidence which, if believed, either would be conclusive or, as has been said by some judges, would lead to the reasonable probability that the verdict would have been different. But the practice has hitherto been confined to evidence relating to an issue in the case, or, at any rate, to an issue which could and might yet be raised if there were a new trial in the action. No case has been cited in which this court has ever admitted, or has been asked to admit, evidence going to credit only. That, of course, is not conclusive, and it is certainly not conclusive in regard to the jurisdiction of this court, and for myself, I think that this court clearly has jurisdiction to take any course which it thinks fit with regard to a matter of this kind. The invariable practice is, however, clear, and, furthermore, when one comes to apply the first test, viz., whether the evidence could have been discovered by reasonable diligence before the trial, that language is hardly applicable to evidence of this kind, because in the ordinary normal event a solicitor or a client would not be expected to inquire into the past record of any witness whom he expected to be called. Generally speaking, he would not know who were the witnesses who were going to be called . . . But I do not think that it is reasonable that any inquiries should have been made with regard to a man in this position. I am only saying that what has always been regarded as the essential test, viz., that the evidence could not have been obtained by reasonable diligence, is hardly applicable to a case of this kind."

Later, the learned lord justice quotes a passage from the speech of LORD LOREBURN, L.C., in Brown v. Dean (2) ([1910] A.C. 374):

"My Lords, the chief effect of the argument which your Lordships have heard is to confirm in my mind the extreme value of the old doctrine 'Interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium', remembering as we should that people who have means at their command are easily able to exhaust the resources of a poor antagonist."

Those citations will, I think, suffice to lay the necessary foundation of law for the reasoning which now follows. As will have been appreciated, there is a double obligation on an applicant in this court for further evidence to be called. I will state the two conditions which have to be satisfied, in the order in which counsel for the children dealt with them. First, it must be shown that the new evidence, if given, and if true, would be at least likely to have a strong influence on the conclusion in the court below, and, secondly, it must be established not only that the evidence which is sought to be called is evidence in fact unknown at the date of the trial to the party applying, but it must be shown also that its existence could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered.

On the first point there has been in this court no argument. I have already stated what the evidence, if admitted, is said to establish, and, if it is established, as the evidence tends to show, that the late Mr. Herwin not only was, from a date anterior to his will and ever afterwards for all his life impotent, but also that he was well aware of that fact, then it seems to follow that he must be taken (the court, as is sometimes said, placing itself in the testator's arm-chair) to have used the words "children or child" so as to mean his then existing children. In saying that, I am re-stating the conclusion at which JENKINS, J., when sitting as a judge of first instance, arrived in Re Wohlgermuth (3), a case which was, in principle, on all fours with the present case. In that case, the testator at all relevant dates was impotent and knew it, the facts of his impotence and knowledge having been brought about as the result of a violent physical accident. In the present case the result has been brought about by illness and an operation, but those are merely incidental matters, and the facts in both cases, this case and Re Wohlgermuth (3), are, in principle, the same.

It follows, therefore, that, if the evidence is admitted and found to establish the essential fact, it satisfies one condition. But, have the appellants satisfied the other condition ? Have they shown that this was evidence which reasonable diligence on their part could not and would not have brought to light and enabled them to bring to the attention of VAISEY, J. ? It is in its relevance to this matter that I have thought fit to refer, as I have, in a little detail to the nature of the proceedings, for they are, in my judgment, essential to the conclusion. If this had been an action, by which I mean an action started by writ of the ordinary kind, what is sometimes called hostile litigation, in which the appellants had sued the executors claiming payment to them of the residue which (they alleged) belonged to them, then it might well be (although I do not so decide because it is unnecessary) that failure on their part at the trial to bring to the attention of the court all the relevant circumstances which might help their case would be fatal thereafter, and they could not be allowed, in the circumstances, to have the privilege of a second attempt to prove their case. But this action was not an action of that kind at all. It was, as I have already said, a proceeding taken out under the rules applicable in the Chancery Division, whereby the plaintiffs, in their capacity as administrators, sought the directions of the court, and it is quite plain, I should have thought, that acting in that capacity it was their duty, not only to the court but to all persons interested in the estate, to lay before the court all the facts which they had in their knowledge or possession which might assist the just determination of the questions which they raised. If, in such a proceeding—and I repeat that this is in form an administration action—it appears, or comes to the knowledge of plaintiff, executors or trustees after the hearing in the first court, that other facts should have been brought to the attention of the court, it is by no means clear to me that it is not their duty to bring those matters, even at so late a stage, before the court, either this court, or on some further application in the administration proceedings.

The matter is in this case further complicated by the circumstance, as frequently happens in these cases, that at the time when the matter was brought before VAISEY, J., the same solicitors were acting for the plaintiffs as were acting for the children, the present appellants. It is, therefore, said, and said with force, by counsel for the next of kin, that the present appellants and their advisers, if they had been properly alert, should have realised that matters of fact relating to the capacity to have children of either the testator or Mrs. Herwin, were vitally important. Indeed, counsel for the next of kin observed that in the court below an attempt was made (albeit that it was obviously foredoomed to failure) to establish that Mrs. Herwin was at all material times incapable because of her age of having further children, and that the testator knew it. From the fact that that argument was raised counsel for the next of kin, naturally enough, argued that the question of capacity as a matter of fact must have been, or should have been, well in the mind of the plaintiffs and the appellants and their advisers.

It must not be thought from observations which have fallen from me during the argument that I have been casting reflections on the care or competence of the advisers. I have no desire whatever to make any such suggestion. It is one of the best-known facts in life that it is easy to be wise after the event, and unless some clue arose it would occur, I imagine, in proceedings of this kind, no more to solicitors or counsel than it would to the children, to raise with the mother the question whether in fact she or her late husband had been impotent at the material date. The matter is obviously one of delicacy, and relates to the most intimate details of married life. Applying TUCKER, L.J.'s test, which he indicated in the Braddock case (1), I think that, in the absence of unusual circumstances which raise the question precisely, it is not reasonable in proceedings of this character to suppose that children (particularly if one of them happens, as in this case, to be an infant daughter) will interrogate their mother about the most intimate details of her married life, and the capacity of their father.

As I have said earlier, it was the duty of the plaintiffs, making this application to the court, to lay before the court all facts that might assist the court to a just conclusion, but I am not surprised, in all the circumstances, that it did not occur to Mrs. Herwin to tell her solicitors intimate details of this kind and that it did not occur to the solicitors to ask her.

The will itself was a professionally drawn document, though the solicitor concerned was not the same as the solicitors acting for Mrs. Herwin and her children when the proceedings started, and again, it is not, perhaps, surprising that they did not draw the will otherwise than as they did, or ask the searching questions I have indicated. If a mistake occurred in the use of the word "children", it was a mistake into which people may, perhaps, easily fall, although I have no doubt that it is true to say, as counsel for the next of kin suggested, that anyone particularly experienced in cases of this kind, or particularly astute, might, perhaps, have thought it desirable to ask questions, and might, had the question been asked, have fallen on the essential facts. A B

However, in my judgment, when the following circumstances are together considered, viz., first, the nature of the proceedings, which I do not repeat, secondly, the fact that the defendants, being defendants in proceedings of this kind, were prima facie entitled to assume that all the material facts would be put before the court and had been put before the court, and thirdly, that one of the defendants was an infant—when all these matters are considered in the light of the general nature of the evidence on this delicate subject-matter, I am for my part satisfied that we shall not be departing from the strict and proper application of the well-established rule if we say that the children have made good their application and have fulfilled both conditions which it is incumbent on them to fulfil in order to have the further evidence brought to our attention. C D

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence of the widow and a surgeon, and continued:] Mr. Adlington, the surgeon, in the witness box, in answer to the questions put to him by counsel for the next of kin and by members of the court, made it, to my mind, as clear as possible that the testator was not only incapable in fact, but was perfectly well aware of it at all relevant dates. E

If that is the fact, it seems to me that the conclusion is clear, for the testator made a will referring to "my children" at a time when he had three natural children and when he could not have, and knew that he could not have, any legitimate children. In other words, the case is brought fairly and squarely within the decision of JENKINS, J., in Re Wohlgemuth (3). F

The conclusion, therefore, necessarily is, as a matter of construction, that the word "children" means, and meant, the three appellants in this court, and it is unnecessary for us to consider the matter of construction which VAISEY, J., decided without the immense advantage which this further matter of fact has given to us. I repeat that the learned judge made plain that he arrived at his conclusion with reluctance, and I fully understand that reluctance, but without hearing argument it would not be right for me to suggest that his decision was otherwise than in accordance with the authorities. We have heard no argument, and I express no view, therefore, on how the matter would stand apart from the evidence that we have heard, but in the light of that evidence, as, indeed, is made plain by something which fell from the learned judge himself, it is clear beyond doubt, to my mind, that the conclusion ought to be in favour of the children. G H

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. The matter of construction of the will is not a matter now to be discussed in this court, but there are two passages from the judgment of VAISEY, J., which I want to cite. He begins his judgment by saying:

"Well-settled principles of law and of construction compel me to decide this case contrary to my inclination, and contrary, I believe, to the true intention of the testator."

Then VAISEY, J., cited a passage from the judgment of COTTON, L.J., in Megson v. Hindle (4) (15 Ch.D. 205):

A "To take a case out of the common rule that only legitimate children can take under a gift to 'children', there must be on the face of the will such a strong probability of the testator's intending to include illegitimate children, that a contrary intention cannot be imputed to him."

Later in his judgment, VAISEY, J., referred again to COTTON, L.J., and he said:

B "COTTON, L.J., says that to take the case out of the common rule that only legitimate children can take under a gift to children I must find on the face of the will something which really makes it certain, not merely very probable or very likely, but certain, that he must have been referring to his illegitimate children or had intended the word 'children' to include his illegitimate children."

When he came to deal with the construction of the will in the light of the surrounding circumstances, he said:

C "I cannot say that the testator must have believed or must have thought that no further child could be born of the marriage which he had then contracted. Although, as I have said, I should like to construe this will on what I regard as the probabilities of the case, I am warned by so many authorities that this rule is one which must be observed unless disregarding it is the only way to give sense to the documents which fall to be construed. Here I think that the testator might have hoped that his wife was going to have a legitimate child at an age at which women do have children, when approaching the time when such an event is not a possibility. He may have thought that his wife was going to have another child or might have another child for whom he made provision, and, of course, it was just possible."

E It was because of those observations that the application was made in this court to adduce further evidence, because Mr. William Sidney Rufus Herwin in his affidavit said:

F "The facts as to my father's capacity referred to in para. 10 of my mother's said statement and in para. 3 and para. 4 of the said Basil Adlington's statement were unknown to me until after the hearing of this matter in the court below. Shortly after the hearing my mother expressed surprise to me at the reasons given by the learned judge, and stated that it was impossible that my father could have had the birth of other children in mind at the time he made his will, as he then knew that he was incapable of having further children."

G So, of course, the issue in this court really resolves itself into this: Was the further evidence which was sought to be adduced properly admissible on this appeal? The two matters to which learned counsel directed his attention were the two matters which stood out prominently in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., in Braddock v. Tillotson's Newspapers, Ltd. (1), that it must be shown that the evidence sought to be adduced would be conclusive, or might tend to that end, and, further, that the evidence sought to be adduced could not reasonably have been discovered before the trial.

H I do not desire now, in view of what my Lord has said, to add very many words about that. It is perfectly plain, I should have thought, in view of the decision of JENKINS, J., in Re Wohlgenuth (3), that, if this evidence had been before the learned judge, it is probable, or almost certain, that there would have been a different decision. In my view, the evidence, if it is admitted, is conclusive.

On the second point, whether it could reasonably have been discovered before the trial, my Lord has dealt with that in some detail, and I do not desire to add anything.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree, and have very little to add. It is plain to me that if the evidence which has been adduced before this court had been before VAISEY, J., he would have decided this case in the way that we are deciding it today, because, having regard to the decision in Re Wohlgemuth (3), the evidence was not only admissible, but was conclusive of the question what the testator in his will meant by the use of the word "children". The evidence was not before VAISEY, J., and he decided the matter purely as one of construction, and the only question is whether the evidence could properly be admitted in this court.

It has to be borne in mind that these proceedings are by way of originating summons by the personal representatives of a deceased person, asking for the directions of the court in the administration of the estate, and it is the clear and traditional duty of executors or trustees, when applying to a judge in the Chancery Division for administrative directions, to lay before the court all relevant facts which are within their knowledge. I am not for one moment casting blame on anybody for the fact that a highly relevant matter was not introduced into the evidence in the court below, but, nevertheless, as I see it, the beneficiaries who were made respondents to this summons were entitled to assume that all the relevant facts, that is to say, all the facts material for the consideration of the judge on the question which was being brought before him, would be presented to the court by the plaintiffs. Nothing could be more plain than that the question on which Mr. Adlington has informed the court, both by affidavit and orally, was material, and the one person above all others who was in a position to know what the doctor had said was the widow, who was one of the plaintiffs on the summons. It seems to me, therefore, that having regard to the general procedural rule to which I have referred, which has long been accepted in the Chancery Division, the children here, the appellants, were entitled to assume that, if any evidentiary matter of that kind existed and was known to this lady, she would have informed the court about it.

That consideration, I think, is relevant because of the way in which TUCKER, L.J., approached one aspect of this question of the admissibility of evidence on appeal in Braddock v. Tillotson's Newspapers, Ltd. (1), to which my Lord has referred. He said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 309):

" . . . in the ordinary normal event a solicitor or a client would not be expected to inquire into the past record of any witness whom he expected to be called."

So here, having regard to the fact that this was an application on which it was the duty of the plaintiffs to lay all the material and available information before the court, I do not think that the children, more especially this young girl of nineteen, could reasonably be expected to inquire into the question of their deceased father's sexual capacity by interrogating their mother on the subject, and I do not think it was unreasonable of the children, in all the circumstances of the case, not to have made inquiries of their own on that subject. It seems to me, accordingly, that we are not departing in any way from the rules which have been laid down frequently with regard to the admission of new evidence in this court by admitting the evidence of the doctor, supplemented by the further affidavit which Mrs. Herwin herself swore. Indeed, it would be deplorable, to my mind, to exclude it in a case where the court is being asked to give directions in the administration of the estate of a deceased person, and for the court to shut its eyes to the facts which are decisive of the testator's intention, and, by so shutting them, to cause his estate to be administered in a way which the court now knows would be wholly contrary to his intention. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal must be allowed, and I desire to say nothing on the question of construction which was the only matter with which VAISEY, J., dealt, and which was not argued before us.

Appeal allowed.

SHARKEY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. WERNHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 21, 22, 23, 24, 1953.]

Income Tax—Profits—Transfer of horses from stud farm to racing stable in same ownership—Credit figure in farm accounts—Cost of breeding or market value.

The taxpayer's wife conducted a stud farm in respect of the profits of which he was assessable to income tax under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Case I. As a recreation, the wife trained horses and ran them at race meetings, and this activity gave rise to no liability for tax. In the relevant tax year, having transferred five horses from the stud farm to her racing stables, she showed in the farm accounts as a debit the cost of breeding those horses, and claimed that the figure to be brought in as credit should be the same amount.

HELD: the farm accounts should be credited with the higher figure of the market value of the horses on an assumed sale.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax under the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 64.

H

The taxpayer was assessed to income tax in respect of profits of his wife, Lady Zia Wernher, arising from her stud farm. In the year ended Dec. 31, 1948, Lady Wernher transferred five horses from her stud farm to her racing stables, which she carried on as a recreation and not as a trade. The cost of breeding the horses was debited in the stud farm accounts, and it was common ground between the parties that, consequent on the transfer of the horses, for income tax purposes some figure ought to be brought into the stud farm accounts as a receipt. The market value of the horses was considerably in excess of their cost, and the sole ground of the taxpayer's appeal to the Special Commissioners was that the figure proper to be brought into the accounts was the cost of the transferred horses and not (as contended by the Crown) their market value on an assumed sale.

The Special Commissioners allowed the taxpayer's appeal and the Crown appealed to the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 24. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Special Commissioners discharging an assessment to income tax in the estimated sum of £5,000 for 1949-50 on the taxpayer, Sir Harold Wernher. The assessment was made in respect of the profits of the respondent's wife, Lady Zia Wernher, arising from a stud farm.

Lady Zia carries on the activities of a stud farm on premises at Newmarket, and those activities, that is to say, the whole of such activities, are admitted, for the purposes of the present appeal, to be "farming" activities, which, by virtue of the Finance Act, 1941, s. 10, and the Finance Act, 1948, s. 31 (1) (a), are to be treated as the carrying on of a trade of which the profits are charged to tax under Case I of sched. D. She also carries on separately other activities, namely, those of racing and training horses; such activities are neither farming nor any other kind of trading, but are purely "recreation" in character, not giving rise to any liability to tax. Lady Zia breeds horses at her stud farm for her racing stables, and from time to time transfers, or moves, horses from the farm to the stables. In the relevant year, five horses were so transferred or moved by her. In the stud farm accounts, the cost of breeding these horses had been debited, and the question is what sum in respect of the five horses ought, consequent on such transfer or move, to be brought into such accounts as a receipt or credit. The taxpayer says that the proper figure to be so brought into the accounts was the cost of breeding the transferred horses, the same figure appearing on both sides of the accounts, or, alternatively, omitted altogether. The Crown, on the other hand, contends that it should be the market value of the animals, viz., the price which they would have fetched on an assumed or notional sale, such value being considerably more than the costs of breeding them.

My decision in this case is based on the fact that it is, in my judgment, indistinguishable in principle from an earlier decision, that of MACNAGHTEN, J., in Watson Bros. v. Hornby (1). Counsel for the taxpayer now admits this, but contends that that case ought not to be followed on the grounds (i) that it was plainly wrong, and (ii) that it was irreconcilable with the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Laycock v. Freeman, Hardy & Willis, Ltd. (2) and Briton Ferry Steel Co., Ltd. v. Barry (3). I am not altogether satisfied on either point, but taking the second one first it seems to me that the statements in the two latter cases on which counsel relies (to which I will refer in a moment) ought not necessarily to be treated as axiomatic, but rather as being of general though not universal application. Those two cases both dealt with the question of succession to discontinued businesses, and there is no doubt that the judgments in each case were based on the general principle that it is not legitimate to charge a man with the notional profits of a notional sale made or assumed to be made by himself to himself. In the Briton Ferry case (3), SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said ([1939] 4 All E.R. 546):

"It is not legitimate, in my view, to apply [r. 11 (2) of sched. D, Cases I and II] in such a way as to introduce some element of notional profit, with the result of charging the taxpayer in respect of a profit which he has never realised.”

A I turn at once to Watson Bros. v. Hornby (1), which, in my view, governs the present case. The facts were as follows. The appellants carried on the business of poultry breeders and dealers. In addition to keeping birds on their farm for laying purposes, they had a hatchery which produced chicks primarily for sale as “day-old chicks”, although some were transferred to brooder houses and became part of the stock on the farm. In accordance with the decision in Long v. Belfield Poultry Products, Ltd. Thornber Bros., Ltd. v. Macinnes (4), the appellants were assessed to income tax for the years 1931-32 to 1934-35 under sched. D in respect of the profits of the hatchery part of their business, and under sched. B in respect of the profits of the farm. On appeal against the assessment under sched. D, the appellants contended that, in computing B the profits of the hatchery, the day-old chicks transferred to the farm should be credited as stock at the average price at which they were sold, and could have been bought, in the open market, viz., 4d. per chick, and that the difference between that price and the admitted cost of production of each saleable day-old chick, 7d., was an allowable loss. The Crown contended that the hatchery and the farm were two activities of the same person who could not make a loss C by transferring from one department to the other, that no allowance could be given for an unrealised loss, and that the chicks should be credited to the hatchery account at production cost. The general commissioners accepted the Crown’s contention. It was held that in the notional sale between the hatchery and the farm, which should be treated for the purpose as separate entities, the price to be credited was the “reasonable price” laid down by s. 8 of the D Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and that on the admitted evidence the reasonable price must be the market price of 4d. per chick. Note that the decision was (i) that a notional sale must be assumed between the two businesses of Messrs. Watson Brothers and (ii) that the two businesses must be treated for the purpose of the notional sale as separate entities.

E Obviously that decision could not be reconciled with the two cases in the Court of Appeal if the proposition on which those cases were based is universally and in all circumstances valid. The commissioners thought that the decision was distinguishable on the following ground:

F “That in that case there were for income tax purposes two businesses, namely, a farm (then assessed under sched. B) and a hatchery (assessed under sched. D) and stock was transferred from the hatchery to the farm and became stock in trade of the latter . . . In the present case, the horses were simply taken out of the stock of Lady Zia’s stud farm and did not become stock in trade of any other business.”

G With respect, I cannot see that this is a true distinction. The justification for departing in Watson Bros. v. Hornby (1) from the general principle that a man cannot trade with himself, buy from himself, sell to himself, and make notional profits out of himself, was obviously that the Income Tax Act, 1918, itself had, by splitting the personality of the taxpayer, and putting the two parts of him into different schedules, made such a notional dichotomy inevitable. If that is the explanation, I cannot see why a similar consequence should not follow from the splitting of Lady Zia’s activities between farming, which is H taxable, and racing, which is not. I am by no means convinced that Watson Bros. v. Hornby (1) was wrongly decided, and I think that it is my duty to follow it.

I was very much impressed by the arguments of counsel for the taxpayer, and apart from authority I might well have accepted them, though the point is, on any view of the matter, a doubtful and difficult one.

It is not necessary for me to refer in detail to the other cases to which my attention was directed. The Crown’s contentions are supported by the authority of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Wm. Ransom & Son, Ltd. (5). On the general principle that the notion of a man trading with himself is not an admissible conception, see Dublin Corpn. v. M'Adam (Surveyor of Taxes) (6). From the judgment in that case I may quote what PALLES, C.B., said (2 Tax Cas. 397):

"No man, in my opinion, can trade with himself; he cannot, in my opinion, make, in what is its true sense or meaning, taxable profit by dealing with himself . . ."

This principle is unexceptionable in itself, but the legislature itself has, in my view, made inevitable some invasion of it. I must allow this appeal.

Case remitted to commissioners.

TRAVERS v. HOLLEY AND HOLLEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 17, 18, 19, July 14, 1953.]

Divorce—Foreign decree—Decree granted to wife in New South Wales on ground of husband's desertion—Acquirement by husband of foreign domicile after commencement of desertion—Recognition of decree by English court—New South Wales Matrimonial Causes Act, 1899, No. 14, s. 16 (a)—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 13.

By the New South Wales Matrimonial Causes Act, 1899, No. 14, s. 16: "Any wife who at the time of the institution of the suit has been domiciled in New South Wales for three years and upwards . . . may present a petition to the court praying that her marriage may be dissolved on one or more of the grounds following—(a) that her husband has without just cause or excuse wilfully deserted the petitioner and without any such cause or excuse left her continuously so deserted during three years and upwards and no wife who was domiciled in New South Wales when the desertion commenced shall be deemed to have lost her domicile by reason only of her husband having thereafter acquired a foreign domicile."

In 1937 the parties left England and went to New South Wales. In 1940 the husband left the wife at Sydney and went to Armidaile in New South Wales. Subsequently, he joined the Australian armed forces and in 1943 or 1944 he obtained a transfer to the British forces. By a decree nisi pronounced on May 1, 1944, and made absolute on Nov. 13, 1944, the Supreme Court of New South Wales, in proceedings under s. 16 (a) of the New South Wales statute of 1899, instituted by the wife in 1943, which the husband did not defend, granted the wife a decree of divorce on the ground that the husband had deserted her in 1940. On May 5, 1945, the wife married the co-respondent. In 1952 the husband petitioned for a decree of divorce from the wife on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent. In her answer the wife pleaded that her marriage with the husband had been dissolved by the court in New South Wales in 1944. The husband contended that that court had never had jurisdiction to deal with the marriage since he, and, consequently, his wife, had never acquired a domicile in New South Wales.

HELD: (i) (JENKINS, L.J., dissentiente) on the evidence, in 1940, when the desertion commenced, the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales, and, therefore, the court in New South Wales had jurisdiction to entertain the wife's suit for dissolution of the marriage.

- (ii) the principle laid down in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier ([1895] A.C. 528), that the domicile of both spouses at the date of the institution of proceedings was the sole test of jurisdiction in divorce must be applied in the light of the provisions of s. 13 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, which corresponded substantially with s. 16 (a) of the New South Wales Matrimonial Causes Act, 1899, in that it gave the courts of this country jurisdiction in divorce in cases where a wife had been deserted by her husband who was immediately before the desertion domiciled in England or Wales, notwithstanding that the husband had changed his domicile since the desertion; the provisions of s. 16 (a) of the New South Wales Act could not, therefore, be said to be peculiar to the forum of that country, and where a rule of municipal law was not peculiar to the forum of one country, but corresponded with the law of another country, that municipal law could not be said to trench on the interests of the other country; where, as in this case, there was in substance reciprocity it would be contrary to principle and inconsistent with comity if the courts of this country were to refuse to recognise a jurisdiction which mutatis mutandis they themselves claimed; and, therefore, assuming that the husband had abandoned his domicile of choice in New South Wales on a date after the desertion and before the institution by the wife of the proceedings in 1943, the court would recognise the decree granted to the wife by the court of New South Wales.

Principle in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier ([1895] A.C. 528), considered.

APPEAL by the respondent from an order of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, Q.C., dated Dec. 9, 1952.

- H By a decree nisi pronounced on May 1, 1944, and made absolute on Nov. 13, 1944, the Supreme Court of New South Wales, on the petition of Cynthia Marjorie Travers (the wife), dissolved the marriage between her and Eaton Hugh Brereton Travers (the husband) on the ground that the husband had deserted the wife for a continuous period of three years and upwards. The husband did not defend the petition. On May 5, 1945, the wife married in the State of Michigan, U.S.A., George Holley, a citizen of the United States of America, and on Mar. 15, 1949, the husband married Thelma Taylor in Bombay, India. In 1952 the husband presented a petition in the Divorce Division of the High Court for a decree nisi dissolving the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with George Holley, who was cited as co-respondent, and he asked for the discretion of the court in respect of his adultery with Thelma Taylor. On the hearing of the petition by Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK he challenged the validity of the decree which had been granted to the wife in New South Wales, contending that neither he nor his wife had ever acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales, and that, therefore, A the court of New South Wales had no jurisdiction.

The learned commissioner held that the New South Wales decree was invalid on the ground that the evidence before the court did not suffice to prove that the husband had ever acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales in substitution for his English domicile of origin. He also rejected a contention by the wife that the husband was estopped from denying the validity of the B New South Wales decree, and he pronounced a decree nisi in the husband's favour. The wife appealed against that decree, and she contended that she and the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales and that, therefore, the New South Wales decree pronounced in her favour was valid.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J. [after stating the facts and holding on the evidence that the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales]: D Section 16 of the New South Wales Matrimonial Causes Act, 1899, No. 14, provides as follows:

"Any wife who at the time of the institution of the suit has been domiciled in New South Wales for three years and upwards (provided she did not resort to New South Wales for the purpose of such institution) may present a petition to the court praying that her marriage may be dissolved on one or more of the grounds following—(a) that her husband has without just cause or excuse wilfully deserted the petitioner and without any such cause or excuse left her continuously so deserted during three years and upwards and no wife who was domiciled in New South Wales when the desertion commenced shall be deemed to have lost her domicile by reason E only of her husband having thereafter acquired a foreign domicile."

The relative date, therefore, for the purpose of that court was the date when the desertion commenced, and that, as alleged by the wife and found by the court, was in August, 1940. Apart, of course, from a special provision of this kind the relevant date under our law to consider the domicile is the date of the commencement of the proceedings. That would be in the present case Aug. 23, 1943. Since 1937 our law has provided that in the case of a deserted wife the date of the desertion is the relevant date. Section 13 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, reads as follows: G

"Where a wife has been deserted by her husband, or where her husband has been deported from the United Kingdom under any law for the time being in force relating to the deportation of aliens, and the husband was immediately before the desertion or deportation domiciled in England and Wales, the court shall have jurisdiction for the purpose of any proceedings under Part VIII of the [Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925], notwithstanding that the husband has changed his domicile since the desertion or deportation." H

Although the wording is different, the result for present purposes is the same as the provisions of the New South Wales Act.

On principle it seems to me plain that our courts in this matter should recognise a jurisdiction which they themselves claim. I did not myself really understand on what grounds it was submitted that the result should be otherwise. If it is necessary to refer to authority, there is a sentence in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (1) ([1895] A.C. 528) which is material. It is there said:

A “ . . . a decree of divorce a vinculo, pronounced by a court whose jurisdiction is solely derived from some rule of municipal law peculiar to its forum, cannot, when it trenches upon the interests of any other country to whose tribunals the spouses were amenable, claim extra-territorial authority.”

B Applying this principle, the provisions of the New South Wales Act of 1899, are since 1937 no longer, so far as our courts are concerned, peculiar to its forum, but are common to its forum and our own. As I have come to this conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider the difficult matters which, to my mind, would have arisen if the decree in New South Wales was invalid. It is on the face of it very difficult to see how the husband can claim relief as for a matrimonial offence in respect of the intercourse with Mr. George Holley. Apart from any question of estoppel, the position is obviously very unusual. I desire to express C no opinion, but merely to indicate that, speaking for myself, I think it might well have been argued that there was conduct conducing or that the discretion of the court should not be exercised in his favour. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

D JENKINS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: It is not in dispute that the New South Wales decree was made without jurisdiction, and was, therefore, invalid, if the husband never acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales, and that it was, further, not in dispute that the onus of proving the abandonment of a domicile of origin in favour of a domicile of choice was on the person alleging the change of domicile, and that to discharge that onus it must be clearly shown that the individual whose domicile was in question removed from the country in which he had his domicile of origin to the country alleged to E have become his chosen place of domicile with a definite and fixed intention (what LORD WESTBURY called “a fixed and settled purpose” in Bell v. Kennedy (2) (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 321), and the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., “a fixed and determined purpose” in Winans v. A.-G. (3) ([1904] A.C. 288), then or subsequently formed of making the latter his permanent home in substitution for and to the exclusion of the former.

F I find it, for my part, impossible to hold consistently with the authorities that the evidence here suffices to establish that the husband had at any time before the presentation of the wife’s petition in the New South Wales court acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales in substitution for his English domicile of origin. Change of domicile, particularly where the change is from the domicile of origin to a domicile of choice (as distinct from a change from G one domicile of choice to another), has always been regarded as a serious step which is only to be imputed to a person on clear and unequivocal evidence. For this proposition I need only refer to LORD MACNAGHTEN’S speech in Winans v. A.-G. (3) ([1904] A.C. 291), where, referring with approval to LORD WESTBURY’S speech in Bell v. Kennedy (2) (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 321), he said:

H “Such an intention, I think, is not to be inferred from an attitude of indifference or a disinclination to move increasing with increasing years, least of all from the absence of any manifestation of intention one way or the other. It must be, to quote LORD WESTBURY again, a ‘fixed and settled purpose’. ‘And’, says his Lordship, ‘unless you are able to show that with perfect clearness and satisfaction to yourselves, it follows that a domicile of origin continues’. So heavy is the burden cast upon those who seek to show that the domicile of origin has been superseded by a domicil of choice! And rightly, I think. A change of domicil is a serious matter—serious enough when the competition is between two domicils both within the ambit of one and the same kingdom or country—more serious still when one of the two is altogether foreign. The change may involve far-reaching consequences in regard to succession and distribution and other things which depend on domicil ”, and to LORD BUCKMASTER'S speech in Bowie or Ramsay v. Liverpool Royal Infirmary (4) ([1930] A.C. 590), where he said:

“ The law upon the matter is settled. A domicil of origin can be changed and in its place a domicil of choice acquired, but the alteration is a serious matter not to be lightly assumed, for it results in a complete change of law in relation to two of the most important facts of life, marriage and devolution of property. This is admirably expressed by LORD CURRIEHILL in Donaldson v. M'Clure (5), in words unnecessary to repeat, which were expressly approved by LORD HALSBURY in Marchioness of Huntly v. Gaskell (6). To acquire a new domicil it is essential, in the words of LORD WENSLEYDALE in Aikman v. Aikman (7), to show that the person who is said to have changed his domicil ‘has abandoned his former domicil animo et facto ’.”

In the present case the evidence from which we are invited to infer the alleged change of domicil seems to me to be wholly inconclusive, even if the essential requirement of intention to settle permanently could be held to be satisfied by proof of a decision by the husband to settle permanently in some part or other unspecified of Australia, as distinct from a decision on his part to settle permanently in the particular State (that is, New South Wales) in which the disputed jurisdiction was exercised on the footing that he was domiciled there. If it is necessary (as I take it to be) to prove an intention on the part of the husband to settle permanently in New South Wales as distinct from any other part of Australia, there is, so far as I can see, no evidence at all of such intention, beyond the bare fact of his actual residence in that State, in the succession of temporary abodes above described, from January, 1938, to February, 1941, which, in my view, clearly cannot suffice.

The learned commissioner in the course of his judgment discussed the question whether what had to be proved in order to give the courts in New South Wales jurisdiction based on domicil was a domicil of choice in Australia generally or a domicil of choice in the particular State of New South Wales, and held it to be the latter, citing F. A. Gatty & P. V. Gatty v. A.-G. (8) (as to the jurisdiction of the courts of particular States of the U.S.A.) and A.-G. for Alberta v. Cook (9) (as to the jurisdiction of the courts of particular provinces of Canada) and expressing the view that the same principles should be applied with respect to New South Wales. As at present advised, I see no reason to differ from him in this, but, as he not only found it impossible to hold in the present case that there was ever a domicil of choice in New South Wales, but also said that he was not satisfied that a domicil of choice in Australia (that is, in Australia generally as distinct from the particular State) had been established, and as I agree with him on both points, it is unnecessary to pursue the question further. It follows that, in my opinion, the learned commissioner was right in his conclusion that the decree of the New South Wales court was made without jurisdiction, and was, therefore, invalid.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that, in his opinion, the decree granted to the husband, which was under appeal, ought to be allowed to stand. The husband's conduct in permitting the New South Wales decree to be made in default of defence and in acting on the footing that it was a valid decree by himself re-marrying did not amount to conduct conducing to the wife's adultery. He continued:] For these reasons I would, for my part, dismiss the appeal. My brethren take a different view as they have found it possible to hold on the evidence that the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales before the presentation of the wife's petition. Beyond expressing my regret that I have found myself unable to follow them in so holding, I need only add that I would not dissent from their conclusion to the effect that, on the footing that the husband had acquired a New South Wales domicile, the fact, if it was the fact, that, while in desertion from her and before the presentation of her petition, he abandoned his New South Wales domicile, and reverted to his English domicile of origin, should not be held to have deprived the New South Wales court of jurisdiction, having regard to the terms of s. 16 (a) of the New South Wales Matrimonial Causes Act, 1899, and s. 13 of our own Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937.

HODSON, L.J., stated the facts, held that the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in New South Wales, and continued: The husband has contended that, even on a finding of fact that he had previously settled in Australia with the intention of remaining there permanently, he is entitled to succeed because the New South Wales court would have no jurisdiction in the eyes of the courts of this country to dissolve the marriage unless at the date of the institution of the proceedings in New South Wales both parties were there domiciled. It is not, I think, necessary to form any conclusion as to when the husband abandoned his domicile of choice in Australia since I think that, even if he had done so at some time before the date of the institution of the New South Wales proceedings and after the date of the desertion, the husband's contention fails.

The argument is that domicile of both spouses at the time of the proceedings is the sole test of jurisdiction in divorce: see Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (1), which unequivocally established this test. Since the decision in this case the English courts have not recognised a decree of a foreign court unless the parties were at the time of the proceedings domiciled in the jurisdiction of the foreign court, or, if domiciled elsewhere, such decree would be recognised by the law of the domicile: Armitage v. A.-G., Gillig v. Gillig (10). For this purpose New South Wales is a foreign court. It is contended that, the husband not being domiciled in New South Wales in August, 1943, the courts of this country will not recognise the decree of the court of that State. I think that this argument is not valid at the present day. For many years after the decision in Le Mesurier's case (1) the position was that the courts of this country only exercised jurisdiction in cases where both parties were domiciled here. Following certain dicta of SIR GORELL BARNES, P., in Ogden v. Ogden (11) ([1908] P. 82), there was thought to be an exception to this rule in the case of wives deserted by husbands who at the time of the desertion were domiciled in England. It was thought that they might obtain a decree in this country although this country was not the true domicile of the husband. In undefended cases these courts did not inquire what had happened to husbands after desertion in such circumstances either because it was thought they were estopped from denying an English domicile or because the burden was on them to show an abandonment and they had done nothing to discharge the burden. When the question was raised in a defended case, however, the decision was against the view that there was any exception to the rule: H. v. H. (12). Indeed, the supposed exception had been adversely criticised in A.-G. for Alberta v. Cook (9).

The position has, however, been radically altered by statute. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 13, it was provided that

"Where a wife has been deserted by her husband . . . and the husband was immediately before the desertion . . . domiciled in England and Wales, the court shall have jurisdiction for the purpose of any proceedings" concerned with divorce. Since 1937 this exception has been largely extended, first, by the Matrimonial Causes (War Marriages) Act, 1944 (a temporary war measure), and later by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18. It is unnecessary to consider the effect of these later statutory provisions since, at the material time when the New South Wales proceedings were instituted, the Act of 1937 was in force and s. 13 of this Act corresponds in substance with the provision under which the New South Wales court claimed jurisdiction between the parties to this appeal. It seems to me, therefore, that Parliament has cut the ground from under the argument put forward on behalf of the husband. If English courts will only recognise foreign decrees of divorce where the parties are domiciled in the territory of the foreign court at the time of the institution of proceedings because that is the jurisdiction which they themselves claim, what is the situation when the courts of this country arrogate to themselves jurisdiction in the case of persons not domiciled here at the material date? It must surely be that what entitles an English court to assume jurisdiction must be equally effective in the case of a foreign court.

LORD WATSON in the Le Mesurier case (1) used the following language [1895] A.C. 528):

" . . . a decree of divorce a vinculo, pronounced by a court whose jurisdiction is solely derived from some rule of municipal law peculiar to its forum, cannot, when it trenches upon the interests of any other country to whose tribunals the spouses were amenable, claim extra-territorial authority."

Conversely, it seems that where it is found that the municipal law is not peculiar to the forum of one country, but corresponds with a law of a second country, such municipal law cannot be said to trench on the interests of that other country. I would say that where, as here, there is in substance reciprocity, it would be contrary to principle and inconsistent with comity if the courts of this country were to refuse to recognise a jurisdiction which mutatis mutandis they claim for themselves. The principle laid down and followed since the Le Mesurier case (1) must, I think, be interpreted in the light of the legislation which has extended the power of the courts of this country in the case of persons not domiciled here.

LOMAX (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. NEWTON.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 17, 21, 1953.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—“Expenses incurred wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of . . . duties”—Territorial Army officer—Mess subscription and expenses, camp expenses, cost of necessary attendance at dances—Excess cost over allowance for hotel expenses at conferences and exercises—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), Rules Applicable to sched. E, r. 9.

The following expenses of a Territorial Army officer were held not incurred “wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of his duties” as an officer within the meaning of r. 9 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and, therefore, not to be deductible in arriving at the emoluments of his office for income tax purposes under the schedule:—An annual mess subscription, which all officers were required to pay and which was used to provide a mess, but excluded the cost of wine and food, and the officer’s share of the cost of entertaining official regimental guests out of the mess funds, both being referable to personal and social obligations rather than to the performance of official duties; payments to a batman at week-end and annual camps and the cost of hire of camp furniture, the evidence submitted being insufficient to establish the claim; and the cost of tickets at sergeants’ and other ranks’ dances, sergeants’ annual dinner club, etc., these expenses being incurred from tradition and custom and accepted voluntarily and containing elements of personal choice and benefit.

The cost of hotel accommodation in excess of detention and ration allowances incurred by such an officer at conferences and exercises compulsorily attended was so incurred, and was, therefore, deductible, but only charges for “necessaries” should be included, and any “extras” involving a measure of extravagance and personal indulgence should be excluded.

CASE STATED by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the division of Upper Strathforth and Tickhill, Yorkshire.

The taxpayer appealed against an assessment made on him for 1950-51 under sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the sum of £54, being the amount of his pay as an officer in the Territorial Army. He held the rank of major, being second in command of the Hallamshire battalion of the York and Lancaster Regiment stationed in Sheffield. He claimed that he was obliged to spend sums on an annual mess subscription, mess expenses, camp expenses, hotel expenses, and certain dance tickets wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duties as an officer and that such sums should be deducted from his emoluments as an officer for tax purposes. The Crown contended that the only expenses which the taxpayer would have incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of his duties were those which were in fact provided by the government free of charge, viz., travel to and from camp or other places of training, rations and sleeping quarters, or allowances in lieu thereof; that the additional expenses claimed were incurred mainly from tradition and custom and were accepted by the officers of the unit; and that the expenses claimed contained an element of personal choice and private benefit and were not incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the duties. The commissioners held that the expenses were incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the taxpayer's duties as an officer, but that certain other expenses which it was also claimed were deductible were not so incurred. The Crown appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The respondent to this appeal on the part of the Crown is a Major Newton, who was a Territorial officer, second in command of the Territorial battalion of the York and Lancaster Regiment stationed at Sheffield. He was represented at a hearing before the General Commissioners for Income Tax by his commanding officer, a Lieut.-Colonel Webster. The claim of the taxpayer was that certain items of expenditure had been incurred by him, in the words of the statute as an officer of the said battalion, so as to bring him in regard to that expenditure within the provisions of r. 9 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918. Before coming to the particular items, I would observe that the provisions of that rule are notoriously rigid, narrow and restricted in their operation. In order to satisfy the terms of the rule it must be shown that the expenditure incurred was not only necessarily, but wholly and exclusively, incurred in the performance of the relevant official duties. And it is certainly not enough merely to assert that a particular payment satisfies the requirements of the rule, without specifying the detailed facts on which the finding is based. An expenditure may be "necessary" for the holder of an office without being necessary to him in the performance of the duties of that office. It may be necessary in the performance of those duties without being exclusively referable to those duties. It may, perhaps, be both necessarily and exclusively, but still not wholly, so referable. The words are, indeed, stringent and exacting. Compliance with each and every one of them is obligatory if the benefit of the rule is to be claimed successfully. They are, to my mind, deceptive words in the sense that, when examined, they are found to come to nearly nothing at all.

"wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of [his] duties"

The items of expenditure in this case were originally eleven in number. Of these, one was withdrawn and four were disallowed by the commissioners. I have to deal with the remaining six, which were found by the commissioners to have been incurred by the taxpayer wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of his duties as a major in the Hallamshire battalion, and the question is whether there was evidence before the commissioners on which they could properly have come to that decision. The contention of the Crown in this appeal is that there was no such evidence, and that all these items should have been disallowed.

The first item, "Annual mess subscription, £8", was a payment which all officers in this battalion were required to make. The proceeds of the subscriptions were used to "provide a mess". The taxpayer's contribution was said not to include any part of the cost of the wine or food supplied to the officers

No mention, however, is made of other amenities, such as arm-chairs, cigarettes and stationery. On those facts—and there were no others—I can find no evidence on which it was possible for the commissioners to find that this £8 was expended wholly, or, indeed, at all, in the performance of the taxpayer's duties as an officer.

Secondly, we have: "Share of mess guests' expenditure for the year, £9 16s." which is explained by the statement that the cost of entertaining official regimental guests was shared by the officers in amounts fixed by reference to their ranks. No doubt, the taxpayer was under an obligation to make his proper contribution to this as well as to the mess funds. But both payments must, in my judgment, be referable more to his personal and social obligations than to the performance of his official duties. It is, to my mind, irrelevant to say that he would have been asked to resign his commission if he had refused to incur this expenditure. The same consequence would presumably have ensued if he had omitted to procure and wear decent civilian clothing when not in uniform, but that consideration would not have justified an allowance under the rule in respect of his ordinary tailor's bill.

On the third item, "Payments to batman at week-end and annual camps, £3 10s.", and the fourth item, "Hire of camp furniture, £1 5s.", I have felt a good deal of hesitation because (unlike the first and second items) I think that evidence to justify these allowances might well have been forthcoming. But the difficulty in the taxpayer's way is the insufficiency of the evidence on these matters, and, as the onus of proof was on him, I cannot see that the commissioners could properly have allowed these items. It was not enough for him merely to say that the expenditure was essential to the performance of his duties. The test is whether it was made in the performance of those duties. The taxpayer did state in evidence that it was so made, and his evidence was corroborated in general terms by Lieut.-Colonel Webster, but I have only my own imperfect knowledge on such points as: (a) what the duties of a batman are, (b) for what services he receives pay from the officer employing him, (c) what is the appropriate amount of such payment, (d) whether the payments were really in the nature of a gratuity or "tip", (e) what camp furniture has to be hired, and (f) what is the proper cost of hiring it. I must disallow these two items, though I do rather regret having to do so.

The fifth item is: "Amounts paid for hotel accommodation at conferences and exercises in excess of detention and ration allowances—Harrogate, four days, £3; Buxton, three days, £3". This is explained as being the actual cost to the taxpayer over and above the ration and detention allowance granted. No doubt, his attendance at these conferences and exercises was compulsory, and he had no choice, I am told, of the hotels at which he had to put up, and, no doubt, the supplementing of the prescribed allowances is a serious burden on a Territorial officer. Nolder v. Walters (1) comes rather near to this point. I will read the headnote (15 Tax Cas. 380):

"An aeroplane pilot employed by a limited company claimed deductions in the assessment of his remuneration to income tax under sched. E in respect of various items of expenditure. Held, that no deduction could be allowed in respect of (a) the upkeep of a motor car to convey the pilot between the aerodrome and his home, or (b) a telephone at his home: but that a decision of the general commissioners allowing a deduction for an excess of actual subsistence expenses when away from home on duty over subsistence allowance granted by the company could not be disturbed as being erroneous in law."

My chief difficulty as regards this item is the paucity of the evidence. The commissioners have, however, found as a fact that this was expenditure wholly, exclusively, and necessarily incurred in the performance of the taxpayer's duties, and I cannot say that they were wrong in bringing this fifth item within the rule. Bolam v. Barlow (2) and Ricketts v. Colquhoun (3) may be rather difficult to reconcile with Nolder v. Walters (1), but I decide this matter on the ground that I must not disturb a finding of fact which was a possible finding both as to quantum and otherwise. I am by no means sure that I should myself have decided this point as the commissioners did. While I feel bound to regard this item of £6 as having been admitted on a finding of fact which I cannot disturb, I venture to recommend that, as a precedent in other cases, it should be applied with very great caution. A hotel bill is certain to include charges for "extras" involving some measure of extravagance and personal indulgence as well as charges for necessities, and it is really only the latter which should have been taken into consideration by the commissioners in the present case. In view of their finding, however, I suppose that I must assume that that is what they did. A

The sixth and last item is: "Cost of tickets at sergeants' and other ranks' dances, sergeants' annual dinner club, etc., £2 15s." I agree that participation in the social life of the battalion was part of the social duties of the taxpayer, but was it any part of his official duties? Was he at the sergeants' dance in the proper sense of the expression "on duty"? I think not. I am quite unable to see how this item can be brought within the rule. I apply to it a description from the contentions of the Crown as set out in the Case, and say that these sums are expenses incurred from tradition and custom, accepted voluntarily by the officers of the unit and containing elements of personal choice and benefit, and, therefore, not within the rule. B C

In addition to the cases which I have already mentioned, other decisions were cited to me, but none of them, in my judgment, assists the taxpayer or me. Charlton v. Corke (4), was a case of a minister in the Scottish church whose position was not, perhaps, very closely analogous to that of a Territorial officer. All I would say about that decision is that I find it difficult to reconcile with either Ricketts v. Colquhoun (3) or Bolam v. Barlow (2). Another case to which similar considerations apply is Jardine v. Gillespie (Surveyor of Taxes) (5). I must allow this appeal, except as to £6 (item No. 5), calling attention, not for the first time, to the extreme and possibly unintentional narrowness of the rule, and also, if I may venture to do so, to the question whether the allowances to Territorial officers in such matters as those to which the present case relates do not require to be somewhat increased. I am told that the Crown has undertaken to pay the taxpayer's costs in this appeal, and I will direct that such costs be taxed, as between solicitor and client, if that be the arrangement. D E F

CASE STATED by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the division of Leyland, Lancashire.

E The taxpayer appealed against an assessment to income tax made on him for 1950-51 under sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918, on the ground that a mess subscription of £11 7s. payable by him ought to have been deducted under r. 9 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E, as money expended wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of his duties as an army officer. The Crown contended that the payment was not an expense so incurred and that it provided to the taxpayer an element of private benefit and its deduction was, therefore, prohibited by r. 3 (b) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, as applied to this case by the invocation of s. 208 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The commissioners held that the sum was money expended wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of the taxpayer's duty as an officer. The Crown appealed.

G The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.) and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

The taxpayer did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

H July 21. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The respondent to this appeal was a major in the Royal Army Pay Corps. The appropriate general commissioners have found and held that the amount of his annual mess subscription in the year of assessment 1950-51 was money expended wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of his duty as an officer within the meaning of r. 9 of the Rules Applicable to sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918. The sum in question is £11 7s.

It appears that under the King's Regulations in force at the relevant time every officer must be a member of his regimental mess, subscriptions to which were: (a) annual subscriptions to defray the ordinary expenses of the mess and (b) monthly subscriptions to meet incidental expenses. The subscription under (a) is a compulsory charge against every officer, and the proper amount in the case of the taxpayer was the sum which I have mentioned. The Crown appeals against the finding of the commissioners, which was based merely on the facts which I have stated, with the further fact that refusal to pay the annual subscription would have resulted in disciplinary action being taken against the taxpayer. They accepted his contention that the expense in question (namely, the payment of the £11 7s.) was incurred "wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of [his] duties".

The words of the statute which I have just quoted are notoriously narrow in their application. They require that the expenditure must not only be necessary but must also relate to the performance of the taxpayer's duties "exclusively". To that aspect of the matter the commissioners do not appear to have directed their attention, or at any rate not to have given any, or sufficient, weight. The Crown pointed out at the hearing that the payment provided an element of private benefit to the taxpayer, a fact which was, indeed, obvious and incontrovertible. I would venture to make this observation respecting cases such as the present—that it is not enough for the commissioners to be able to find that a particular expense is incurred wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of the official duty, that is to say, merely setting out the statutory expression. They should surely find the exact facts on which their conclusion is based. The onus is on the taxpayer to bring himself within the statutory words, and it is the duty of the commissioners to state with sufficient particularity the facts on which they find, if they do find, that he has succeeded in his attempt. It is not the function of this court to disturb a finding of fact unless such finding is a mere asseveration, unsupported by properly reasoned considerations. But in the present case the finding is no more than a verbal affirmation of the taxpayer's submissions and contentions. On the authority of the cases to which the commissioners were referred, and of the case which I have just decided (Lomax (Inspector of Taxes) v. Newton (1)) I must allow this appeal and reverse the finding of the commissioners.

The Crown do not ask for costs, and, indeed, would be willing to defray any that the taxpayer has incurred. If there are any, I will order a taxation on a solicitor and client basis if that is agreed.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. WELSHPOOL JUSTICES. Ex parte HOLLEY.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 28, 30, 1953.]

Justices—Procedure—Retirement—Shorthand writer sent for by justices—Part of shorthand note read to justices—No statement in court as regards purpose for which her presence required—Presence of clerk and shorthand writer in retiring room.

A Justices—Clerk—Shorthand writer—Presence in retiring room while justices consider decision.

When justices retired to consider their decision on an information preferred before them by a police officer, their deputy clerk retired with them at their request to give his advice on certain points of law, and he remained in their room for substantially the whole of the retirement. Later, the justices requested a shorthand writer, who was in court, to come to their room and to bring her notebook with her, as they wished to have their impressions of part of the evidence confirmed by the shorthand note. Nothing was said in open court as to what point in the evidence required elucidation, or what part of the note was read to the justices. On their return into court, the justices announced that they convicted the defendant.

C On a motion for certiorari to quash the conviction,

HELD: (i) the justices were justified in taking the clerk to their room as they required his advice on law, and the mere fact that he remained while they were discussing the facts was not a sufficient objection to invalidate their decision.

D Per curiam: It is clear that the justices did nothing wrong in taking the clerk with them to their room as they required his advice on law, and in these circumstances we are not prepared to say, merely because he remained in the room while they were discussing the facts, that that in itself was sufficient to invalidate their decision. It is often difficult to disentangle what is purely a question of law from a question of fact, and a discussion on law must have regard to the particular facts of the case to which it is desired to apply the law.

R. v. East Kerrier JJ. Ex p. Mundy ([1952] 2 All E.R. 144), distinguished.

(ii) while it would have been better if the justices had come into open court and asked the shorthand writer to read her note on the particular point in question, in the circumstances there was nothing improper in their sending for her to come to their room, and, therefore, the conviction must stand.

G EDITORIAL NOTE. MOTION for an order of certiorari.

On Apr. 14, 1953, the applicant, Edward John Holley, was convicted by a petty sessional court sitting at Welshpool, Montgomery, of having, on Mar. 7, 1953, sold intoxicating liquor outside permitted hours, contrary to the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4, and was fined £5. He applied for an order of certiorari to quash the conviction on the ground that (i) the deputy clerk retired with the justices when they retired to consider their decision and remained with them for substantially the whole of their retirement, (ii) a shorthand writer employed in the deputy clerk's office, who had been present in court during the hearing, was required to retire to the justices' room while they were considering their verdict, (iii) in sending for the shorthand writer and considering or checking extracts of the evidence as recorded in her notebook in the retiring room and not in open court the justices deprived the applicant of knowing what part of the evidence they were considering or checking, of checking against the note taken by the applicant's solicitor whether the evidence in question taken down by the shorthand writer was accurate, and of drawing attention to any other evidence which might have been relevant to the passages the justices were considering or checking. Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. The following judgment of the court was read by LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant moves for an order of certiorari directed to the justices for the borough of Welshpool to bring up and quash a conviction of the applicant of selling intoxicating liquor out of permitted hours. The grounds on which the order is sought are irregularities at the hearing of the information in that the deputy clerk to the justices retired with them and remained in their room while they were considering the facts and that a shorthand writer was sent for by the justices and went to their room with her notebook while they were deliberating, though the applicant was not made aware of the precise purpose for which her presence was required or what the purport was of the information which she gave to the justices. From the affidavits it appears that at the hearing a question arose as to the admissibility of a letter which the applicant had written to the prosecutor. What possible objection there could have been to its admission we cannot conceive. The justices admitted it, and, so far as they were concerned, it would seem to have put an end to the matter as, if it was desired to contest its admissibility further, the remedy would have been by appeal. However, as the justices wished to have advice from the clerk on this matter, they required him to retire with them. Indeed, they say that several legal points had been raised by the defending solicitor requiring elucidation, but their affidavit does not state what they were beyond the relevancy of this letter. After an interval, it matters not for how long, the clerk came back into court and asked a young woman in his employment, who had been taking a shorthand note of the evidence, to go into the justices' room and take her notebook. In their affidavit the justices say that, after the legal points had been disposed of, they considered the evidence. They had formed certain impressions on the police evidence, but, before coming to a decision, they thought it advisable to have their impressions confirmed by the contents of the shorthand note, and the shorthand writer read to them a small portion of her notes, which confirmed their former impression. This affidavit, which is commendably frank, makes it quite clear that the clerk remained in the room while the justices were considering the facts and after he had given his advice on such matters of law as they required. It is also clear that nothing was said in open court as to what point in the police evidence required elucidation or what part of the note was read to the justices. C D E F G H

I do not think that anyone can misunderstand what the court meant by their judgment in R. v. East Kerrier JJ. Ex p. Mundy (1). It was that the clerk's presence in the room when the justices were deliberating should be only for

- the purpose of advising them on the law. In saying that, if they required his advice, they should send for him we did not mean, nor should I have thought there could be any misunderstanding on the matter, that, if a point of law had been raised during the hearing, the justices could not ask their clerk to come into the room with them when they retired so that they could at once consult him and then could consider the evidence in the light of his advice. Here the clerk went out with the justices, and, no doubt, stayed out with them while they were considering the facts and was present when some question arose on the evidence for which they thought it necessary to send for the shorthand writer. The latter fact shows that the justices needed to refresh their memories as to the evidence on some point on which, one may assume, there was discussion, and all this time the clerk remained in the room, and he still remained when his amanuensis was sent for. But it is clear that the justices did nothing wrong in taking the clerk with them to their room as they required his advice on law, and in these circumstances we are not prepared to say, merely because he remained in the room while they were discussing the facts, that that in itself was sufficient to invalidate their decision. It is often difficult to disentangle what is purely a question of law from a question of fact, and a discussion on law must have regard to the particular facts of the case to which it is desired to apply the law. We think it would be putting too high a burden on justices who had legitimately required the presence of their clerk for the purpose of taking his advice to say at a particular moment: "Now you must leave the room while we deliberate further". At any rate, we are not prepared to say that what happened in this case, so far as the clerk's presence was concerned, should invalidate the conviction.
- With regard to the presence of the shorthand writer, she was taking a note of the evidence to which the justices were entitled to refer. Had the clerk himself taken the note, even if he remained in court while the justices had retired, we cannot conceive that there would be any objection to their sending for his note to refresh their memory. Nor do we think that, in these circumstances, we can say that sending for the shorthand writer was improper. No one could have supposed that she had gone into the room for any purpose other than to read to the justices the evidence, or some of the evidence, which she had taken down. At the same time, it would be better, should this state of affairs arise again, if the justices came into open court and asked the shorthand writer to read his or her note on any particular point which they might require. Shorthand writers do occasionally make mistakes, though it is remarkable how few errors are made, but it would, we think, be better that this should be done in court where, if any question were to arise with regard to the accuracy of the shorthand note, it could be corrected. Justices will, I feel sure, recognise that it is their duty to obey a direction of this court not only in the letter but in the spirit, and that they are not to get round the direction which was given in the East Kerrier case (1) merely by pretending that they require the presence of their clerk to advise them when there is nothing but fact to be considered. In this case, as we have said, we think the justices were entitled to have their clerk in the room with them, and, as we do not think there could be any reasonable misunderstanding as to the reason why they sent for the shorthand writer, the court will not in its discretion order a certiorari to issue and this motion, accordingly, fails.

Application refused.

PILKINGTON v. WOOD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), July 2, 3, 6, 21, 1953.]

Solicitor—Negligence—Damages—Purchase of freehold property by client—Defect in title—Damages recoverable by client—Duty to minimise loss.

In 1950 the plaintiff, having obtained employment in Surrey, entered into a contract to purchase a house in Hampshire so as to be within easy reach of his work. The vendor had been one of the trustees of the property under the will of his father and the abstract of title showed that, in 1937 and 1938, he had purchased the property, in two parcels, through intermediaries, from himself and the other trustees. The class of persons claiming under the will was not closed and might embrace infants or persons unborn, and it could not be said with certainty that no claim could arise to upset the transaction. The solicitor employed by the plaintiff in connection with the purchase failed to inform him of the defect in title, and, by a conveyance dated Apr. 27, 1950, the vendor, conveying as "beneficial owner", assured the property to the plaintiff in fee simple for the sum of £6,000. The plaintiff borrowed part of the purchase money from his bank by way of an overdraft, but his solicitor was not aware of this fact. In December, 1951, the plaintiff relinquished his appointment in Surrey and entered into a contract to sell the property so as to be free to seek work elsewhere. On finding the defect in title, the purchaser refused to complete. In consequence, the plaintiff did not have the money to purchase another property near his new place of employment, which was in Lancashire, and, therefore, he found temporary accommodation in Lancashire during the week and returned at week-ends to the house in Hampshire where his wife continued to reside. In an action against the solicitor for damages for negligence, in addition to general damages the plaintiff claimed, inter alia, (a) certain expenses in connection with his new employment, including hotel expenses in Lancashire and the running expenses of his car between Hampshire and Lancashire, and (b) interest on his overdraft. The solicitor contended that it was the duty of the plaintiff, before suing him, to recover damages against the vendor under the covenant for title implied, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 76 (1) (A), and sched. II, Part I, by reason of the conveyance as "beneficial owner."

HELD: (i) the plaintiff's duty to mitigate the damages did not go so far as to oblige him, even if he were given by the defendant an adequate indemnity against the costs, to embark on a difficult piece of litigation, and, therefore, he was not under a duty to bring an action against the vendor for breach of covenant.

(ii) the plaintiff was not under a duty to re-sell in order to quantify the damages, and the measure of the solicitor's liability was the difference, at the time of the conveyance in 1950, between the value of the property with a good title and its value with the defect.

(iii) when the solicitor assumed the duty of advising the plaintiff, the change of place of the plaintiff's employment was not a chance which could have been known to him, and the items claimed by the plaintiff in connection with his new employment were not such as might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, at that time, as liable to result from the solicitor's negligence, and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover those items.

Hadley v. Baxendale (1854) (9 Exch. 341), applied.

(iv) the solicitor was not liable to the plaintiff for a fee paid by the plaintiff to a valuer for a valuation of the property in 1950, nor for the interest on the overdraft.

D ACTION for damages for the negligence of the defendant while acting as solicitor for the plaintiff in connection with the purchase by the plaintiff of certain freehold premises.

The defendant failed to advise the plaintiff that there was a defect in the vendor's title in that the premises had been part of the trust property under a will of which the vendor was a trustee and the abstract of title showed that the vendor had purchased it, through intermediaries, from himself and the other trustees. Later, the plaintiff entered into a contract to sell the premises, but, on finding the defect in the title, the purchaser refused to complete. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action for damages against the defendant. After the pleadings were closed, the defendant admitted negligence, and the issue before the court was the quantum of damages.

Cur. adv. vult.

G July 21. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. This is an action for damages by a client against his solicitor, whom he charges with negligence in advising him on the purchase of a property known as Ewshott Corner in Hampshire. The only issue now remaining for decision is the quantum of damages for the negligence alleged, the fact of negligence having been admitted last month after the close of pleadings in the action.

H In 1950 the plaintiff, a civil engineer who had hitherto earned his living in Lancashire, obtained employment in Surrey. To live within reach of his work, he contracted to purchase the property in question and employed the defendant to act as his solicitor on the purchase. This was completed on Apr. 27, 1950, by a conveyance by which the vendor, one Colonel Wilks, conveying as beneficial owner, assured the property to the plaintiff in fee simple for a sum of £6,000. This sum of money the plaintiff raised by an overdraft at his bank on which interest was payable. He paid the defendant his scale fee of £63 for acting as purchaser's solicitor. The plaintiff in due course went into occupation of the property. He spent £400 to £500 on improvements and repairs and purchased for a further £334 certain land surrounding his first purchase, the possession of which considerably added to the amenities and the value of the original plot. In December, 1951, the plaintiff relinquished his Surrey appointment, and, being desirous of freeing himself to take employment elsewhere, he put the property into the hands of local estate agents who found a purchaser who was willing to pay £7,500 for it with the additional plot, and who entered into a contract, accordingly, in that month. The plaintiff again employed the defendant as his solicitor. The purchaser's solicitors, on being supplied with an abstract of the plaintiff's title, pointed out that there was a defect in it and declined, as they were entitled to do, to go on with the purchase, with the result that the deposit had to be returned and a claim arose, which has not yet been resolved, for costs thrown away. The defect was that it appeared on the face of the abstract of title that Colonel Wilks, the vendor to the plaintiff, had purchased part of the property in 1937 and the remainder of it in 1938 from the trustees of his father's will, of whom he was himself one, thus transgressing the well-known rule that a trustee cannot validly purchase the trust property, whether directly or through an intermediary as was done here to give some colour of validity to the transactions.

It was admitted before me that the class of persons claiming under the will in question was not closed and might embrace infants or persons unborn, and that for a number of years it would be impossible to say with certainty that no claim could arise to upset the transaction, although hitherto no claim has been made. This is clearly a serious blot on the title, and not one that can be described with any propriety as a technical defect. There is a real danger that anyone acquiring this property with notice may be dispossessed of it hereafter. A beneficiary claiming to have the property restored to the trust must agree that the original purchase money and, in addition, money spent in improvements shall be repaid. That sum was assumed here to amount to £2,500. The defect in title does not extend to the further plot purchased by the plaintiff in 1951, but that plot by itself is of no greater value than the plaintiff paid for it.

It would appear then, at first sight, that the measure of the defendant's liability is the diminution in value of the property, i.e., the difference between the value, at the date of the 1950 purchase, of the property with a good title and its value with the title which, in fact, it had. The defendant, however, argues that it is the duty of the plaintiff before suing him in damages to seek to recover damages against his vendor, Colonel Wilks, under the covenant for title implied by reason of the conveyance as beneficial owner: see the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 76 (1) (A), and sched. II, Part I. It is said that this duty arises because of the obligation which rests on a person injured by a breach of contract to mitigate the damages. This suggestion seems to me to carry the doctrine of mitigation a stage further than it has been carried in any case to which I have been referred. The classic statement of the doctrine is that of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in British Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. Underground Electric Rys. Co. of London, Ltd. (1), where he said ([1912] A.C. 688):

"The quantum of damage is a question of fact, and the only guidance the law can give is to lay down general principles which afford at times but scanty assistance in dealing with particular cases. The judges who give guidance to juries in these cases have necessarily to look at their special character, and to mould, for the purposes of different kinds of claim, the expression of the general principles which apply to them, and this is apt to give rise to an appearance of ambiguity. Subject to these observations I think that there are certain broad principles which are quite well settled. The first is that, as far as possible, he who has proved a breach of a bargain to supply what he contracted to get is to be placed, as far as money can do it, in as good a situation as if the contract had been performed. The fundamental basis is thus compensation for pecuniary loss naturally flowing from the breach; but this first principle is qualified by a second, which imposes on a plaintiff the duty of taking all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss consequent on the breach, and debars him from claiming any part of the damage which is due to his neglect to take such steps. In the words of JAMES, L.J., in Dunkirk Colliery Co. v. Lever (2) (9 Ch.D. 25),

A ‘The person who has broken the contract is not to be exposed to additional cost by reason of the plaintiffs not doing what they ought to have done as reasonable men, and the plaintiffs not being under any obligation to do anything otherwise than in the ordinary course of business’.”

For the present purpose, however, it seems to me that it is apposite to state the plaintiff's rights in the words of SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1919] 2 K.B. 589) in Payzu, Ltd. v. Saunders (3):

B “ . . . he can recover no more than he would have suffered if he had acted reasonably, because any further damages do not reasonably follow from the defendant's breach . . . ”

Ought the plaintiff as a reasonable man to enter on the litigation suggested ?

C It was agreed that the defendant must offer him an indemnity against the costs, and it was suggested on the defendant's behalf that (i) if an adequate indemnity were offered, (ii) if the proposed defendant appeared to be solvent, and (iii) if there were a good prima facie right of action against that person, it was the duty of the injured party to embark on litigation to mitigate the damage suffered. This is a proposition which, in such general terms, I am

D not prepared to accept, nor do I think I ought to entertain it here, because I am by no means certain that the foundations for it exist. It may be conceded that the indemnity offered would be adequate and that Colonel Wilks is a man of substance. It was clear, however, that he would resist any claim and would, in his turn, claim over against his solicitors. About the third condition much more doubt exists. I listened to a considerable argument based on the

E extremely difficult words in which is couched the contract to be implied under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 76 (1) (A), and sched. II, Part I. I do not propose to decide whether any liability would arise in this case under those words. Nor need I decide whether Colonel Wilks, having regard to his position, was the “beneficial owner” of the property so as to bring the covenant into operation, it being a sine qua non that the covenantor must be in fact, as well

F as being expressed to be, the beneficial owner. Compare the observations of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R. ([1941] 2 All E.R. 23), in Fay v. Miller, Wilkins & Co. (4), where he was discussing the covenant implied in an assurance by a vendor as “personal representative”. It appears to be the law that a breach of the covenant can be sued on at once and that there is no need to wait till

G a claim is made against the covenantee: see Turner v. Moon (5).

I do not propose to attempt to decide whether an action against Colonel Wilks would lie or be fruitful. I can see that it would be one attended with no little difficulty. I am of opinion that the so-called duty to mitigate does not go so far as to oblige the injured party, even under an indemnity, to embark on a complicated and difficult piece of litigation against a third party. The

H damage to the plaintiff was done once and for all directly the voidable conveyance to him was executed. This was the direct result of the negligent advice tendered by his solicitor, the defendant, that a good title had been shown, and, in my judgment, it is no part of the plaintiff's duty to embark on the proposed litigation to protect the defendant from the consequences of his own carelessness. Next the defendant suggested that the injury might be lightened by a policy of insurance designed to cover the consequences of the defect. As to this, it is enough to say that no satisfactory evidence was adduced that any such policy could be obtained. Policies to cover defects of title are, it appears, common enough when supported by cross covenants on the part of the author of the defect, here Colonel Wilks. It is clear that he would have been entirely unwilling to enter into such a covenant, and in the absence of that there was no evidence that a policy could be obtained nor what its cost would be. In any event, though a policy might mitigate the pecuniary damage, it would not mend the title or make the purchase more attractive to a person buying the property for a home, as this property would be bought.

It remains, then, to consider what is a proper amount of damages. This is, necessarily, highly speculative. The plaintiff was not bound, in my judgment, to re-sell in order to quantify the damages, particularly having regard to the fact that until quite recently the defendant denied that he was guilty of negligence. It is clear enough from the plaintiff's experience with the purchaser whom he found that an ordinary purchaser, finding the title defective in this respect, will merely throw up the purchase, and that it would be necessary to explain in advance, by way of condition of sale, the existence of the defect. The result would be, I think, to bring forward a different class of purchaser, namely, the speculator willing to chance the future, but only because the property could be had cheap. The several elements to be brought into account are, on the one side, (i) the sum which would have to be paid before the property were returned to the trust, (ii) the chance that no claim will ever be made and that the title will eventually ripen into security, and (iii) the chance of recovering something against Colonel Wilks on his covenant for title. The sum involved under head (i) may, having regard to the evidence, be put at £2,500. The chance referred to under head (ii) is not negligible after the lapse of fifteen years without a claim, and that under head (iii) cannot be put very high, as it would involve litigation with its attendant expense and delay and the uncertainty as to its result. On the other side of the account must be put the insecurity of the purchaser's tenure and the difficulties which he would encounter should he wish to raise money by mortgage or to re-sell. On the evidence, £6,000 may be taken as the true value of the property with a good title at the date of the breach in 1950. Balancing one factor against the other as best I can after listening to the evidence, I think that a fair estimate of the diminution in value of the property from its market price, at the date of the breach in 1950, of £6,000 with a good title ought to be sent at £2,000.

Beyond this, which may be styled the general damages, the plaintiff claimed damages under a number of special heads. These were: (i) the defendant's scale fee of £63; (ii) the cost of improvements done by the plaintiff and of the extra purchase; (iii) the plaintiff's expenses in connection with his new employment; (iv) the cost of a valuation of the property; (v) interest on an overdraft; and (vi) costs thrown away. I will deal with these in order. The first is the scale fee. It was conceded that this could not be recovered in this action. The second was cost of improvements and of the extra purchase. This claim was abandoned at the hearing. The third was the plaintiff's expenses in connection with his new employment. To understand this some further facts must be stated.

The plaintiff's contract for re-sale of the property at £7,500 was made in December, 1951, and it appears that it was not until this event that he felt free to look for further employment. This he found in Lancashire where he had formerly been employed, and he entered on his new job on Feb. 1, 1952. On Feb. 18 he was obliged to return the deposit of £750 made on the contract of December, 1951, the defect in his title having by then been discovered. As a result, being unable to complete the sale of the Hampshire property, he had not the financial means to purchase another property within reach of his new work, and he has ever since found himself temporary accommodation in Lancashire during the week and returned at week-ends to his Hampshire home, where his wife has continued to reside. His claim under this head is (i) £175, for hotel expenses, (ii) £250 for the running expenses of his car between Hampshire and Lancashire, and (iii) £50 for the expense of telephone calls to his wife every evening during his periods of separation from her. In my judgment, none of these sums is recoverable against the defendant. They do not fall within the second rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (6) (9 Exch. 354), as to the damages recoverable. This rule was recently canvassed by ASQUITH, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (7). ASQUITH, L.J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1002):

- “What propositions applicable to the present case emerge from the authorities as a whole, including those analysed above? We think they include the following: (1) It is well settled that the governing purpose of damages is to put the party whose rights have been violated in the same position, so far as money can do so, as if his rights had been observed: Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co. (8). This purpose, if relentlessly pursued, would provide him with a complete indemnity for all loss de facto resulting from a particular breach, however improbable, however unpredictable. This, in contract at least, is recognised as too harsh a rule. Hence, (2): In cases of breach of contract the aggrieved party is only entitled to recover such part of the loss actually resulting as was at the time of the contract reasonably foreseeable as liable to result from the breach. (3) What was at that time reasonably foreseeable depends on the knowledge then possessed by the parties, or, at all events, by the party who later commits the breach.”
- These items were not, in my judgment, within the reasonable contemplation of the parties when the defendant assumed the duty of advising the plaintiff. The change of place of the plaintiff's employment was not one of the chances that could have been known to either of them. It was the voluntary act of the plaintiff, not a result of any contract existing when the bargain was made. The defendant cannot be responsible for the expense. The plaintiff might have bought or rented accommodation suitable to his new employment, and there is no evidence that the defendant knew that his financial position might render this impracticable. Still less can the defendant be called on to pay for the telephone calls.
- The fourth head is a sum of twenty-five guineas paid by the plaintiff to a valuer who, in 1950, was employed by him to value the property to quiet the doubts of the plaintiff's bankers as to his financial position. He complains that he would never have incurred this expense had he known that his title was defective. No doubt, this is true, but the defendant cannot be supposed to know that any such step was required by the plaintiff's position or contemplated by him. This claim I reject. The fifth claim represents the sum paid by the plaintiff to his bank on an overdraft which, he says, would not have existed had he been able to sell the property as he contracted to do. Here, again, it is objected that the defendant is being asked to pay for the plaintiff's impecuniosity, and it is pointed out that there is no evidence that the defendant knew that the purchase money had been borrowed by the plaintiff, and, moreover, that, if the plaintiff had been able to sell, he would have incurred a new liability similar to the old. In this connection I was referred to The Edison (9) and to Trans Trust S.P.R.L. v. Danubian Trading Co., Ltd. (10). On the whole, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff does not make out his case on this point. His evidence was that it was his intention to purchase another house with the proceeds of sale of his present one and to finance the new purchase in the same way as before, namely, by an overdraft secured on the new property. It appears to me, however, that, to put the plaintiff as far as possible in the position in which he would have been if there had been no breach, I must treat him as having sold the property at the date when the cause of action arose for what it would then fetch. This price I have assumed to be £4,000. He would then have been £2,000 out of pocket. The defendant, therefore, should recoup that sum with interest on it. Under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1), the court has jurisdiction to award interest on damages from the date when the cause of action arose, and, accordingly, the sum of £2,000 will carry interest at 4 per cent. per annum from Apr. 27, 1950, till the date of this judgment. The sixth head of damages for costs thrown away was a matter of agreement at the hearing, and that agreement will be embodied in the judgment. A

Re PILKINGTON BROTHERS, LIMITED WORKMEN'S PENSION FUND.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), July 9, 23, 1953.] C

Friendly Society—Trustee—Appointment of body corporate—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (c. 25), s. 25 (1), (3).

In 1925 a pension fund was registered as a society under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. In 1952 a new trust deed and new rules were adopted by the society and the rules were registered by the Registrar of Friendly Societies. A proposal was adopted by the society that a rule providing that there should be four trustees of the fund should be amended by providing that a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1948, or any former enactment relating to companies might be appointed to be sole trustee of the fund. The registrar refused to register the amendment on the ground that it was contrary to the Act of 1896. D

HELD: the provisions of the Act of 1896 (which did not expressly prohibit the appointment of a corporate trustee) were not inconsistent with the appointment of a corporation as a trustee, and, in particular, it was possible for a corporate trustee to comply with s. 25 (3) (which relates to the signature of a resolution by the trustee), and, therefore, a "contrary intention" within the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 19, not having been proved, the word "person" in s. 25 (4) and elsewhere in the Act of 1896 included a body corporate, and the registrar would be directed to register the amendment. ORIGINATING MOTION.

- A The applicants, the present trustees of the Pilkington Bros., Ltd. Workmen's Pension Fund, appealed against the decision of the Registrar of Friendly Societies refusing to register an amendment to r. 53 of the rules of the fund, designed to permit the appointment of a body corporate to be sole trustee of the fund. The grounds of the appeal were: (a) that the refusal of the registrar was founded solely on the assumption that the provisions of the Friendly Societies Acts did not permit the appointment of a body corporate to be sole trustee of a friendly society; (b) that such assumption was incorrect in law; and (c) that the proposed amendment was one proper to be registered in accordance with the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 13.

Pennycuik, Q.C., and E. W. Griffith for the applicants.

Denys B. Buckley for the respondent, the Registrar of Friendly Societies.

- C Cur. adv. vult.

- D July 23. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a decision of the Registrar of Friendly Societies, refusing to register an amendment of the rules of the Pilkington Bros., Ltd. Workmen's Pension Fund. As I understand the position, the registrar's functions in regard to the registration of rules or of amendments of rules do not extend to a consideration of the prudence of a proposed rule or amendment, and the ground of the registrar's decision is simply that the proposed amendment is not authorised by the terms of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896.

- E The fund was registered in 1925 as a society under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and it operates the pension fund of Pilkington Bros., Ltd., well-known glass manufacturers of St. Helens in the county of Lancaster. On May 1, 1952, a new trust deed and new rules were adopted by the society (the trust deed being expressed to be supplemental to the original trust deed of Apr. 28, 1925) and these rules were duly registered by the registrar under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. Now, a so-called "partial amendment" of r. 53 has been duly adopted by the society in accordance with r. 44 of these rules, but the Registrar of Friendly Societies has refused to register this amendment on the ground that it is contrary to the provisions of the Acts under which the society is registered. The proposed amendment would add at the end of r. 53—which provides that

- G "there shall be four trustees of the fund of whom two shall be nominated by the representatives of the firm on the committee and two shall be nominated by the representatives of the members on the committee"

—a proviso in the following terms:

- H "Provided always that a company incorporated under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1948, or any former enactment relating to companies (as in such Act defined) may be appointed to be sole trustee of the fund in the place of all existing trustees; such appointment shall be made at a general meeting by a resolution of a majority of the members present and entitled to vote thereat; and a copy of such resolution signed on behalf of such company by some person acting under its authority and by the secretary shall be sent within fourteen days by the secretary to the registrar."

It is considered by the committee of management of the society that the appointment of a company to be the sole trustee will avoid the trouble and expense of transfers of investments, and, by enabling the committee of management to control the company as the directors thereof, will vest the administration of the society in one body of persons instead of two. On the other hand, it is apparently not contemplated that the trustee company will provide the security of a "trust corporation" (as defined for the purposes of the Trustee Act, 1925).

At the date when the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, was passed, corporate trustees were not in common use, and difficulties in regard to corporate bodies with reference to joint tenancies existed then and until the passing of the Bodies Corporate (Joint Tenancy) Act, 1899, which enabled a body corporate to be a joint tenant with an individual or another corporation.

The Friendly Societies Act, 1896, s. 25 (1), requires every registered society to have "one or more trustees", and sub-s. (4) provides:

"The same person shall not be secretary or treasurer of a registered society or branch, and a trustee of that society or branch."

There is no express prohibition in the Act of the appointment of a corporation to be a trustee or a sole trustee. By the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 19, in every Act passed after the commencement of that Act (that is Jan. 1, 1890) the expression "person" shall, unless the contrary intention appears, include any body of persons corporate or incorporate. Accordingly, the burden is on those who contend that a body corporate cannot be appointed a trustee of a society registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. It is contended that a contrary intention appears in that Act and that the provisions of that Act are inconsistent with the appointment of a corporate body to be such a trustee. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the provisions of the Act to see what are the difficulties or indications in regard to this point. Section 25 (3) requires the society or branch to send to the registrar a copy of every resolution appointing a trustee, signed by the trustee so appointed and the secretary of the society or branch. Section 34 provides for transfers of stock where a trustee becomes bankrupt, lunatic or dead, but does not provide for the case of liquidation or dissolution of a corporation. Section 35 provides for priority of claims of a society in the case of death or bankruptcy of an officer of a registered society and does not refer to liquidation or winding-up. By s. 106 (unless a contrary intention appears) the expression "officer" includes any trustee, treasurer, secretary, or member of the committee of management of a society or branch or person appointed by the society or branch to sue and be sued on its behalf. Section 50 deals with the vesting of property in "the succeeding trustees" on the death, resignation or removal of a trustee. Section 58, which deals with the estate of a member dying intestate, empowers distribution according to the decision of a majority of the trustees. Section 76 (5) provides for the examination of officers on oath. Section 90 provides for imprisonment of an officer for certain offences. Section 94, dealing with legal proceedings against officers and other persons, does not provide for service in the case of a corporation. It is also to be observed that s. 8 of the War Loan (Supplemental Provisions) Act, 1915, contains provisions allowing the transfer of any part of the funds of a registered friendly society to the Public Trustee, which, it is argued, would be unnecessary if a corporation could, under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, be a trustee.

It is contended that all these provisions are inconsistent with a company or other corporation being a trustee under the Act. There is very little in the way of authority to assist a conclusion on these matters. In Re Thompson's Settlement Trusts (1) it was held that under the common form power of appointing new trustees contained in a marriage settlement of 1866 a corporation could be appointed to be a new trustee jointly with a surviving individual trustee since the Bodies Corporate (Joint Tenancy) Act, 1899, had enabled corporate bodies to hold property in joint tenancy with individuals. In Re West of

A England & South Wales District Bank. Ex p. Swansea Friendly Society (2), it was held by FRY, J., that an incorporated banking company could not be the treasurer of a friendly society within the meaning of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875. The Act of 1875 contained, in s. 15 (7), provisions dealing with priorities on the death, bankruptcy, etc., of an officer, which, except for the addition of the word "insolvency" (in the Act of 1875), are the same as those of s. 35 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and the definition of "officer" is substantially the same in each of the two Acts. FRY, J. (after reading s. 15 (7) of the Act of 1875), says (11 Ch.D. 771):

B "Now the whole scope of that clause appears to me to refer to a private individual who takes on himself an office, and it gives certain rights in the event of his death, his bankruptcy or insolvency, for execution, attachment, or process against his property or himself, and it is very remarkable that if it were in the mind of the legislature that an incorporated company could be the officer, and that priority should be given in the case of a winding-up, this Act, which was passed long subsequently to any of the winding-up Acts, is entirely silent with respect to the liquidation of the company, or the winding-up and distribution of the assets of the company. It appears to me that I am bound to read this clause somewhat strictly, and for the reason pointed out by LORD ELDON, in Ex p. Ross (3), and by KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., when Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, in Ex p. Harris. Re Clarke (4), the right given is one against the common rights of Her Majesty's subjects, and therefore those who claim that right must bring themselves within the express provisions of the statute. The only words which can be relied on here are those which mention process against the property of the debtor. It is said that those words include liquidation. It appears to me to be a very doubtful proposition; but I decide against the applicant, because I think that the legislature has considered the officer against whom and against whose estate the benefit is given, as a private person and not as a corporation."

E These observations must carry great weight in construing the similar section in the Act of 1896. FRY, J., was dealing with the case of the treasurer of a society, as an officer for the purposes of the section, and not the case of a trustee. But the relevance of his observations is that the definition sections of the two Acts (unless a contrary intention appears) treat a trustee and a treasurer equally as officers of a society. In truth, however, the question of priorities is not of the same importance in the case of a trustee in the event of the trustee's insolvency (except where personal claims against a trustee are involved) as in the case of an officer such as the treasurer or secretary of a society. In the case of the bankruptcy or liquidation of a trustee, the trust property vested in the trustee is distinguished and does not form part of the property distributable among the insolvent person's creditors. Such officers as a treasurer or secretary are more likely to be indebted to the society for moneys received by them in the course of their duties. It may be, therefore, that the conclusions of FRY, J., should not be applied to the case of a trustee of a registered society. There is also, as it seems to me, an indication in s. 35 that the expression "officer" in the section is not intended to include a trustee. The section provides that the "heirs, executors, or administrators, or trustee in bankruptcy" of the officer, or the sheriff, are, on demand in writing of the trustees of the society or branch or of any two of them, to pay the money, and deliver over the property to the trustees of the society or branch in preference to any other debt or claim against the estate of the officer. So, here is an apparent contrast between the expressions "trustees" and "officer". It is curious that the section refers to the demand of the trustees or "of any two of them". The draftsman seems to have forgotten that s. 25 allows a society to have a single trustee. In the circumstances, in my view, the West of England case (2) is not a compelling authority against the validity of the appointment of a corporation to be a trustee.

As regards the other sections in the Act of 1896 dealing with "officers", the mere absence of provisions appropriate to a corporate trustee is not necessarily inconsistent with the appointment of a corporate trustee. Section 25 (3) of the Act (requiring signature of the resolution) is, however, specifically directed to the case of a trustee, and if it is not possible to comply with the provisions of that sub-section in the case of a corporation, then it would appear that a corporation cannot be appointed to be a trustee. Now, of course, a corporation cannot sign in person, and any signature of a corporation must be made by an officer or other agent of the corporation. Contracts, letters and other documents are, in practice, effectual so signed. The question is whether signature in this manner will satisfy the requirements of s. 25 (3), as, indeed, the proposed amendment anticipates.

There are a number of authorities touching on this question. In cases where the personal element required exclusive operation by an agent, it has been held that a corporation could not comply with the terms of the relevant statute: Wills v. Tozer (5) (the Commissioners' Clauses Act, 1847); Hirst v. West Riding Union Banking Co. (6) (Lord Tenterden's Act). But in Re British Games, Ltd. (7), in which the point turned on the provisions of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 6 (1) requiring a note or memorandum in writing of the contract signed personally by the borrower, SIMONDS, J., held that it was a sufficient compliance with the Act if the contract was signed by a person acting under the authority of the company, express or implied. SIMONDS, J., reached this result through the provisions of the Companies Act, 1929, s. 29, dealing with the signing of contracts which, if made between private persons, would be by law required to be in writing, signed by the parties to be charged therewith. An acceptance by a trustee of his appointment to that position may not be, technically, a contract, but it seems to me that the same principle applies. In my view, therefore, it is possible for a corporation to comply in this manner with the requirements of s. 25 (3) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. If this is so, it seems to me that there is nothing in this provision to exclude the appointment of a corporation as the sole trustee of a registered society.

There remains to be considered the argument that in 1875 and in 1896 corporate trustees were practically unknown and were unlikely, in view of the difficulties then existing in regard to joint tenancies, and, therefore, it is quite reasonable that the Acts of 1875 and 1896 should not have contemplated the appointment of corporate trustees. This argument would apply with at least as much force to the settlement of 1866, which was the subject of the decision in Re Thompson's Settlement Trusts (1). None the less, it was held in that case that once the difficulties in regard to joint tenancies had been removed by the Bodies Corporate (Joint Tenancy) Act, 1899, the form of the power of appointing new trustees in the settlement of 1866 was capable of including the case of a corporate trustee. This argument, therefore, must, I think, fail.

The conclusion which I reach is that there is nothing in the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, to exclude the rule that a "person" includes a corporate body, and, accordingly, a corporate body may be appointed a trustee of a registered society, and the proposed amendment is not contrary to the Act.

Order accordingly.

BEWLAY & CO., LTD. v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 29, 1953.]

Public Health—Dangerous structure—Metropolis—Notice to take down, repair, or otherwise secure—Discretion of magistrate to order one of the three courses to be pursued—London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939 (c. xcvii), s. 64.

A A complaint was preferred under the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939, s. 64, against the appellants as owners of certain premises that they had failed to comply with a dangerous structure notice served on them requiring them to "take down repair or otherwise secure" certain portions of the premises. The magistrate took the view that he was bound to make
B an order in the terms of the complaint.

HELD: section 64 gave the magistrate a discretion to order the appellants either to take down the building, or to repair it, or otherwise to secure it, and the case must be remitted to him to deal with it on that basis.

FOR THE LONDON BUILDING ACTS (AMENDMENT) ACT, 1939, s. 62 and s. 64,
C see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 1238 and 1239.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Clerkenwell a complaint was preferred by the respondent council against the appellants as owners of a structure known as 27 Store Street, Holborn, that on May 19, 1952, a notice was served on them in pursuance of the London Building Acts (Amendment)
D Act, 1939, Part VII (Dangerous and Neglected Structures), requiring them forthwith to take down, repair, or otherwise secure such portions of the main front wall and the balconies on the main rear wall of the structure as were fractured, sagged out of the perpendicular, loose, insecurely supported, or otherwise insecure, and do any further work rendered necessary by the foregoing, and that the appellants failed to comply wholly with such notice as speedily as E the nature of the case permitted.

At the hearing it was proved or admitted that the premises consisted of a shop occupied by a tenant on the ground floor and living accommodation on the three floors above occupied by three other tenants, the first floor rooms being let furnished and the other two tenants being protected under the Rent Restrictions Acts as statutory tenants. After the notice of May 19, 1952, had
F been served the appellants shored up the premises by means of external supports and buttresses and they had remained so shored. Attempts were made to get the tenants on the second and third floors to vacate the premises and to find them alternative accommodation, but without success. It was found that the premises were a dangerous structure and would be dangerous to the inmates if not shored up, that the district surveyor had refused to give a certificate
G under s. 67 of the Act (to the effect that the structure was dangerous to the inmates and enabling a court of summary jurisdiction to remove the inmates), and that the premises were not such as economically would warrant the expenditure required to put them in a safe condition and a reasonable state of repair and would in normal times have been demolished.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that they had not failed to H comply with the notice as speedily as the nature of the case permitted; that under s. 64 of the Act the learned magistrate had a discretion whether or not to make the order "to take down repair or otherwise secure" the premises and that this discretion should be exercised in the appellants' favour as the building was only fit to be pulled down, the expense involved in restoring it would be out of all proportion to its value, and that it would be highly dangerous to carry out the work with the tenants in occupation. On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the appellants had failed to comply with the notice; that under s. 64 (1) the powers vested in the court had to be exercised if the conditions specified in the sub-section had been satisfied and that the only order which the court had jurisdiction to make was "to take down repair or otherwise secure to the satisfaction of the district surveyor". The learned magistrate found that the appellants had failed to comply with the order and that he had no discretion but to make the order asked for.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case which the court directed a metropolitan magistrate to state, arising out of proceedings taken by the London County Council against Messrs. Bewlay & Co., Ltd., as owners of a structure known as 27 Store Street in Holborn. A notice was served on them on May 19, 1952, as owners of the premises requiring them to "take down repair or otherwise secure such portions of the main front wall and the balconies on the main rear wall as are fractured sagged out of perpendicular loose insecurely supported or otherwise insecure and do any further work rendered necessary by the foregoing."

The complaint alleged that the appellants had failed to comply with that notice as speedily as the nature of the case permitted.

The proceedings were taken under s. 62 and s. 64 of the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939. Section 62 provides:

"(1) The district surveyor upon completing any survey of a structure required to be made under s. 61 (2) . . . of this Act shall certify to the council his opinion of the state of the structure. (2) If the certificate is to the effect that the structure is not in a dangerous state no further proceedings shall be taken with respect thereto but if it is to the effect that the structure is in a dangerous state the council may shore up or otherwise secure the structure and may erect a proper hoard or fence for the protection of passengers and shall cause notice in writing to be served on the owner or occupier of the structure requiring him forthwith to take down repair or otherwise secure it as the case requires."

By s. 64 (1):

"If the owner or occupier on whom notice is served under s. 62 . . . of this Act fails to comply with the notice or the notice as amended or confirmed in accordance with the decision of the two surveyors or the award of the arbitrator as the case may be as speedily as the nature of the case permits a court of summary jurisdiction on complaint by the council may order the owner within a time to be fixed by the order to take down repair or otherwise secure to the satisfaction of the district surveyor the structure or such part thereof as appears to the court to be in a dangerous state."

On receipt of the dangerous structure notice, the appellants, as the owners of these premises, at once shored them up to prevent any immediate danger. They were then summoned before the magistrate who made an order directing them to take down, repair, or otherwise secure the building. Their case was that they were willing to take down, but they were not willing to repair because to do repairs to this dilapidated old structure would cost far more than it was worth and to repair the house was an uneconomic proposition, the expenditure on which they could not justify.

The difficulty arises because there are some statutory tenants in the house, and the district surveyor refuses to exercise the power he has under s. 67, of certifying that it is necessary to remove them. The order that has been made on the appellants is to take down, repair, or otherwise secure. They are ordered to do one of three things. If they were ordered merely to take down the premises, they would be protected because the Rent Restrictions Acts have made provisions with regard to the tenants. But they were ordered to take down or repair, and it might hereafter be said against them: "You ought to have exercised the option given you by the order in a way which would not work to the detriment of the tenants who are in possession of part of the house". The magistrate has found that the premises are not such as economically would warrant the expenditure required to put them in a safe condition and a reasonable state of repair, and that in normal times the building would doubtless have been demolished as it is not worth repairing from an economical point of view, but he held that he was bound to make an order in the exact terms of the section, that is to say, to take down, repair, or otherwise secure. In my opinion, the magistrate was wrong in holding that he had no discretion. I think he had a discretion to say whether the appellants should take down, or whether they should repair, or whether they should otherwise secure. I am not saying that in a proper case the magistrate may not confirm the order in the words "take down repair or otherwise secure", but in the present case he held that he could only make an order in those terms, whereas it is quite clear as a matter of English that on the complaint he could order the owner to take down, or to repair, or otherwise to secure. Therefore, the case must go back to the magistrate with an intimation that he was wrong in holding that he had not a discretion as to which of these three courses he should order, and that, as he has found that the premises were not such as economically would warrant the expenditure required to put them in safe condition and a reasonable state of repair, it is open to him to order that the premises should be taken down. If such an order is made, the appellants will know where they stand and will, no doubt, at once obey. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed and the case must go back to the magistrate with that expression of opinion.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Hallett, J.), July 17, 1953.]

Agent—Commission—Payments on account of commission—Repayment at termination of agency of excess of payments over commission earned.

The plaintiffs agreed to employ the defendant as a selling agent on the terms that he was to receive ten per cent. commission on all goods sold by him and delivered and paid for, after deduction of any discount allowed, and that a monthly sum be paid to him on account of the commission which would accrue due to him. When the defendant terminated the agreement he had been paid £1,005 in respect of the monthly sum, but the amount of the commission earned by him was less than that sum. On a claim by the plaintiffs for the difference between the two sums,

HELD: a term that the defendant should repay any overpayment on the termination of the agency was to be implied in the agreement, and, alternatively, the money paid to him monthly by the plaintiffs was a loan, and, therefore, the defendant must repay the balance to the plaintiffs.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract, and, alternatively, claim for money lent.

By an agreement evidenced in writing by a letter dated June 20, 1952, and signed by the defendant's solicitors on his behalf, the defendant agreed to act as a selling agent of the plaintiffs. The relevant terms of the agreement were that (i) the defendant should be the plaintiffs' agent and conform to all the accepted principles of agents during his employment as such; (ii) he was to receive ten per cent. commission on all goods sold by him and delivered and paid for, after deduction of any discount allowed; (iii) the plaintiffs were to pay him £125 a month on account of the commission which would accrue due to him. On Oct. 19, 1952, this sum was reduced to £95 per month. On Feb. 22, 1953, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs terminating the agency. At that date he had received £1,005 from the plaintiffs on account of commission, but he had earned only £613 5s. 4d. commission. The plaintiffs claimed the balance of £391 14s. 8d. as damages for a breach of an implied term in the agreement that the defendant would repay any overpayment of the monthly sum at the termination of the agency. The amount claimed, due to some further commission which had accrued due to the defendant, was reduced to £383 19s. 8d. The defendant, relying on Clayton Newbury, Ltd. v. Findlay (1) (post, p. 826), contended that, on the true construction of the agreement, the £1,005 had been paid as remuneration for his agency and that no part of it was repayable either expressly or by implication, whether at the termination of the agency or otherwise.

Stable for the plaintiffs.

A. L. J. Lincoln for the defendant.

HALLETT, J.: I should have thought the point to be decided was very clear, and, indeed, despite the very careful argument of counsel for the defendant, beyond argument, if it were not for one circumstance which troubles me to some extent. I am told that the resistance to what appears on the face of it to be an unquestionably good claim has been prompted or encouraged by the fact that, in a publication called CURRENT LAW, which appears monthly for the purpose of helping the legal profession to keep up to date in their knowledge of the law, there is a note of a case (Clayton Newbury, Ltd. v. Findlay (1)) decided by McNAIR, J., which appears to bear a very strong resemblance to the present case. In the days when I was at the Bar one was only allowed to cite to courts certain recognised series of reports in which the cases had been reported by barristers, and one could sometimes submit as part of one's own argument a passage from a text-book which afterwards met with approval, and I think that this case is an instance of the awkward result of regarding other publications which have not the status of recognised series of reports. I say that because I know nothing of this case at all beyond what this note says. It may very well be that there is some distinction between the case with which McNAIR, J., was dealing and the one with which I am dealing here, and I hope there is, because, if there is none, I am afraid that, with the greatest respect, I do not agree with the view which McNAIR, J., took.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It is obvious that, when a man is being remunerated only by commission and is not even paid something extra for expenses, which was the case here, there may be a practical difficulty as to how he is to carry on in between the payments which he may earn, and, of course, there is also the further difficulty that the earnings of a commission agent may fluctuate. It is because this case does not differ from a great many others that it has some slight importance. It is an extremely common thing for what is called a drawing account to be arranged, whereby the agent is allowed to draw on the principal up to a certain amount, irrespective of what he has earned, on account of what he is going to earn. Clause 4 of the letter of June 20, 1952, reads as follows:

“ A sum of £125 per month shall be paid on account of the commission which will accrue due to [the defendant].”

A There is not the slightest ground that I can see for the strenuous argument of counsel for the defendant that he is paid that sum in respect of services that he is rendering by being the plaintiffs' agent. It is plain that he is being paid it “ on account of the commission which will accrue due to him ”. It is referred to in a later letter as an advance of commission, and, to my mind, that is a correct description of it.

B In my judgment, it is clear on principle that, if an anticipatory payment is made and that which is anticipated does not occur in the future, and, accordingly, that in respect of which the payment made would have been earned never takes place, but the money has been paid over, it cannot be retained by the recipient. I agree with counsel for the defendant that analogies dealing with a different subject-matter may be very misleading, but, none the less, I think it may help to clear one's mind to consider that, whatever type of
C transaction one looks at, unless the payment on account can be regarded as a deposit (in which case there is ancient law according to which a deposit can be forfeited in the event of a breach of his obligation by the depositor) with the special incidents attaching to a deposit, in the absence of some provision entitling the recipient to retain the payment, if a payment is made in anticipation of something being supplied therefor and that something is not supplied, the D payment becomes recoverable. That seems to be the law on the various reported cases, and it seems to me to be in accordance with common sense. I think I am doing justice to the argument of counsel for the defendant if I say that it depends on the assumption that the payments which were to be made on account of the commission which would accrue due to him in the future were not payments on account of that, as the words of the letter say, but were pay-
E ments on account of something which he was doing in præsenti. But the defendants were not to pay for what he was doing in præsenti. He was to be paid purely on results. I cannot see any possibility on which he can be entitled to retain the sum claimed.

There is only one more aspect of the matter with which I should deal. It is said that a difficulty arises in connection with the form of action. Counsel
F for the plaintiffs has claimed the sum in dispute as being due under an implied term that the defendant should repay any overpayment on the termination of his agency. Alternatively, he has claimed to recover the sum in question as money lent to the defendant at his request by the plaintiffs. He has not claimed it as money had and received. Counsel for the defendant submits that no such term ought to be implied, and he says that McNAIR, J., refused
G to imply such a term in Clayton Newbury, Ltd. v. Findlay (1). It is also said by counsel for the defendant that, on the true view of the facts, this money was not money lent, and he points out that a claim for money had and received is not made. If it had been made, he says, having regard to what has been said in Sinclair v. Brougham (2) and later cases as to the limits of an action for money had and received, such a claim could not succeed. On the other
H hand, I have ventured to point out that in Dies v. British & International Mining & Finance Corp., Ltd. (3), STABLE, J., refused to be deterred by difficulties as to the form of the claim, saying that once one was satisfied that the claim was right in principle, one ought not to be unduly deterred by difficulties as regards its form. In the present case I would be prepared to hold, if necessary, that the term is to be implied. I would also be prepared to hold, if necessary, that this money was, in truth, money lent. If you anticipate that a man is going to earn something in the future, and, to help him to carry on in the meantime, you pay him that which is not yet due in the expectation that it will become due, I think that that money may be treated as a loan. For these reasons the sum which is now agreed as the amount of the claim, ought to be repaid, and the claim ought to succeed. There will be judgment accordingly.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Agent—Commission—Payments for expenses—Repayment at termination of agency of excess of payments over commission earned.

In October, 1949, the plaintiffs, wholesale gown manufacturers, agreed orally to employ the defendant as their sales representative to cover their territory north of London and up to the Scottish border. This agreement was confirmed by letters. The defendant was to be paid a commission of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on all orders executed and paid for by customers in his territory, whether those orders came as a result of his own initiative, or were old orders, or were repeat orders, and he was to be able to draw £25 a week, for expenses while travelling, to be placed against his commission account. The defendant resigned his appointment in January, 1950. During the period of his employment as agent the plaintiffs had paid him £237 9s. expenses, but his commission earnings were only £85 6s. 6d. The plaintiffs claimed the balance of £152 2s. 6d. D

McNAIR, J., held that the sum claimed was only recoverable if some implied term, oral or written, could be found in the agreement under which the repayment could be enforced. The court would only imply a term which was not expressly mentioned if it was satisfied that it was necessary to give business efficacy to the contract and was what both parties must have intended. The parties had not expressed in words what was to happen if the expenses exceeded the commission and he was left in complete doubt as to what the parties had intended. Therefore, he was unable to imply any term into the agreement as to the repayment of any sum paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant in excess of the commission earned by him, and the plaintiffs could not recover the sum claimed. WAKEFORD v. WAKEFORD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), June 25, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Amount of—Amount based on desire of justices to force husband to grant wife a tenancy of the matrimonial home.

A In September, 1951, the husband left the wife, but he continued to pay the rent and the rates and for the lighting of the flat occupied by the wife which formed part of a building of which he was the leaseholder. In addition he paid her £3 a week for her maintenance. The wife offered to pay the husband £1 a week in return for a tenancy of the flat, but the husband refused to grant her a tenancy. The wife issued a summons B under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, charging the husband with desertion, which he admitted. The justices adjourned the case to give the husband an opportunity of granting the wife a tenancy of the flat, and when he refused to do so they awarded the wife £4 a week maintenance, intimating to the husband that, if he granted the wife a tenancy, they would consider an application by him for C a variation of the amount.

HELD: the justices had no right to increase the amount of the award in order to force the husband to grant the wife a tenancy, and, as, in doing so, they had erred on a matter of principle, the sum awarded would be reduced to £3 a week.

D AS TO AWARDS OF MAINTENANCE FOR THE WIFE IN COURTS OF SUMMARY JURISDICTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 840, para. 1342; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 705-708, Nos. 6729-6755.

APPEAL by the husband against a maintenance order made by Mortlake (Surrey) justices on Dec. 2, 1952.

The parties had lived together in a flat in a building of which the husband E was the leaseholder. In September, 1951, the husband left the wife, but he continued to pay the rent and rates of the flat and for the electricity, and, in addition, he paid the wife £3 a week for her maintenance. The wife offered to pay the husband £1 a week for a tenancy of the flat, but this was refused by the husband. In 1952 the wife issued a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, charging the husband with desertion. On Nov. 11, 1952, before the justices the husband F admitted desertion, and in cross-examination he said he did not want to allow the wife £3 a week and take back £1 a week for rent. The justices adjourned the hearing in the hope that the husband would grant the wife a tenancy of the flat. At the adjourned hearing on Nov. 25, 1952, the husband offered to grant the wife a licence to occupy, but not a tenancy of, the flat, and the case G was again adjourned. On Dec. 2, 1952, the husband not having changed his mind, the justices made an order that he should pay £4 a week to the wife for her maintenance. Against that award the husband appealed.

Stinson for the husband.

Miss C. Colwill for the wife.

H LORD MERRIMAN, P.: It is said that in the circumstances of this case the amount of £4 was excessive, and that on the figures, which in substance are uncontroversial, so far as the particular point in question is concerned, the amount should be £3. Let me say at once that where, on the respective means of the parties, a particular figure appears to be sustainable, even though this court may think that it is a shade high or a shade low, as the case may be, we are very reluctant to interfere unless it appears that some question of principle is involved. Though I express no concluded opinion about it, the sum of £4, regarded merely in the light of the test of the husband's earnings and the fact that the wife was not earning substantial money, might be a difficult figure to attack, but, in my opinion, it is clear that a serious question of principle arises. The husband, in partnership with another man, owns two shops, one in Tooting, and the other in Barnes. He has a lease of the premises at Barnes on the ground floor of which is the shop, and he sub-lets that floor to the partnership. The wife lives rent free in a flat on the first floor. The evidence, about which there is no dispute, is that the husband pays the rates on the whole building and pays for the lighting of the flat. The value of the flat—rent, rates and light free—is £1 a week. That figure is common ground. The husband put that figure on it; the wife, who is paying nothing, offered to pay that precise sum if she could get a tenancy of the flat instead of being allowed indefinitely to go on living there. That is where the question of principle arises.

After the figures had been gone into, the justices adjourned the case for a week, expressing the hope that an agreement as to the wife's tenancy might be made because they felt that she should have some security of tenure. The husband had just said in cross-examination by counsel for the wife:

"I do not want to allow my wife £3 and take £1 back for rent [being the figure the wife had offered] because she has said she would see me in the gutter."

The justices evidently thought (this is a matter about which there can be no doubt) that they were entitled to put some pressure on the husband to give his wife the tenancy which she sought and he refused. In passing, I may say that, apart from any question whether the wife would take undue advantage of becoming the husband's tenant, there are obvious circumstances in which, from a business point of view, it might be inconvenient to tie this flat up with a tenancy of any substantial duration. After all, a situation might easily arise in which, for some business reason, it might be desired to get rid of the ground floor premises, which would be facilitated if the whole of the premises were free. There was a further argument after the week's adjournment. At the end of it the justices decided to make an order of £4 a week, it being clear that the wife was not going to obtain the security of tenure which they thought she ought to have.

In due course, for the purposes of this appeal, the justices' clerk was asked to set out the reasons, and he says that, as the husband had admitted desertion, he assumed that what was meant was the reasons for the amount of the order. This, he says, was based on the respective earnings of the parties. If the matter stood there, it might be difficult, if not impossible, for this court to intervene, but the statement of the reasons goes on:

"As to the security of the wife's living accommodation [the justices] felt that the wife's position would be safer if protected by an agreement for the sub-letting of the premises than by a licence, but intimated that should any offer as to an agreement of tenancy be made by the husband they would consider a variation of the financial part of the order on application by your client."

It is not difficult, I think, to penetrate the thin veneer by which the decision of the justices is covered. On the present basis the wife is in occupation of a flat provided by the husband which is worth £1 a week to her, and in actual cash her maintenance should be £3. If for any reason her occupation of the flat is terminated by the husband, the loss of the accommodation has to be made up to her, as could, and, I think, should be done, by an order increasing the amount of the cash benefit by whatever sum is necessary to produce alternative accommodation on a comparable basis. Instead of that, the justices have ordered a payment of £4 in order to force the husband to give a tenancy of unknown duration, with the suggestion that, if he does give such a tenancy, the cash part of the order will be reduced on application by him.

In my opinion, they had no right whatever to make an order on that basis, and in doing so have clearly gone wrong on a matter of principle. They have increased the cash amount of the order by £1 more than it ought to be, having regard to the fact that the husband has supplied the wife with this residence rent, rates and lighting free, in order to force him to change that permissive occupation into a formal tenancy, the hypothesis being that the wife would have to pay £1 a week for the tenancy. The facts have only to be stated, in my opinion, to make it apparent that the justices have done something which they had no right to do. This appeal should be allowed, and, as there is no dispute about the figures, we can safely take it on ourselves to reduce the amount of the order from £4 to £3.

PEARCE, J.: I agree. From the cross-examination it would appear that it seemed to the wife's counsel—and I do not think she now repudiates it—that the right figure for maintenance was £3, plus the use of the flat, but she was trying to get the husband to give her the security of a tenancy instead of merely allowing her to be there at his will. As he was obdurate the justices adjourned the matter. On the adjourned hearing the husband's counsel declined to give a tenancy, but offered a licence. Again the justices adjourned the matter in order that the husband might become willing to grant a tenancy. The case was finally heard on Dec. 2, 1952. The husband being still obdurate, the justices made an order for £4. Counsel for the wife suggests that the justices had in mind the fact that the wife might be turned out of the flat, and that then her living expenses would be greater. The justices had no reason to believe that the husband was about to turn her out. If they were providing for that contingency (which has not yet occurred) the order is in the present circumstances too high. In my view, they were attempting to force the husband to grant a tenancy that he did not wish to give by fixing the maintenance at £1 higher than it ought to be, with the allurements of a possible reduction if he would grant a tenancy. However worthy may be the motives which led them to seek that the wife should have security of tenure, that is no justification for using an excessive order as a means of making the husband take the course which they thought was the right one. For these and the reasons my Lord has given, I agree that the appeal should be allowed, and that the amount of £4 should be reduced to £3.

Appeal allowed.

Re T. (an infant).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), July 30, 1953.]

Infant—Maintenance—Custody granted to mother—Means of mother taken into consideration in assessing sum payable by father—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 3 (2).

Where the custody of an infant has been given to the mother under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, s. 5, it is proper, when the court is considering the amount of the father's contribution to the infant's maintenance to be ordered under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 3 (2), to take into account, not only the means of the father, but also the means of the mother.

AS TO RIGHTS OF MOTHER TO CUSTODY OF INFANTS AND LIABILITY OF FATHER AS TO MAINTENANCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, p. 663, para. 1381; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 28, pp. 261, 262, 267, Nos. 1151-1157, 1199, 1200.

APPEAL from an order made by a metropolitan magistrate by which a father was ordered, under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 3 (2), to pay £1 per week towards the maintenance of each of his two infant children, the custody of whom had been given to the mother under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, s. 5. The grounds of appeal were (i) that the amount ordered was inadequate; (ii) that the magistrate was wrong in law in that he took into consideration the means of the mother in assessing the amount of maintenance; (iii) that the magistrate was wrong in law in that he failed to consider what was reasonable maintenance for the infant having regard to the means of the father only; and (iv) that, in deciding the amount of maintenance, the magistrate failed to act in accordance with s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925.

Coode for the mother.

Seuffert for the father.

ROXBURGH, J.: The stipendiary magistrate gave the custody of two children to the mother, and the mother asked for an order for maintenance. The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 3, provides:

“(1) The power of the court under s. 5 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, to make an order as to the custody of an infant and the right of access thereto may be exercised notwithstanding that the mother of the infant is then residing with the father of the infant. (2) Where the court under the said section as so amended makes an order giving the custody of the infant to the mother, then, whether or not the mother is then residing with the father, the court may further order that the father shall pay to the mother towards the maintenance of the infant such weekly or other periodical sum as the court, having regard to the means of the father, may think reasonable.”

Counsel for the mother deliberately abstained from calling evidence as to the mother's means and he submitted that, for the purposes of s. 3 (2), the means of the mother were wholly irrelevant. The magistrate took a different view, called the mother into the witness box, and took evidence from her as to her means. He made an order on that footing, expressly stating that he had taken the mother's means into account, so as to enable counsel for the mother to raise this point of law on an appeal. The result, therefore, is that, if he was right in taking the means of the mother into account, his order stands, but, if he was wrong, the matter would have to be remitted to him for re-consideration. Therefore, the question is one wholly of law.

Counsel for the mother relied on s. 5 (4) of the Act of 1925, though, in my judgment, it is strongly against him. Section 5 provides:

"(1) The father of an infant may by deed or will appoint any person to be guardian of the infant after his death. (2) The mother of an infant may by deed or will appoint any person to be guardian of the infant after her death. (3) Any guardian so appointed shall act jointly with the mother or father, as the case may be, of the infant so long as the mother or father remains alive unless the mother or father objects to his so acting. (4) If the mother or father so objects, or if the guardian so appointed as aforesaid considers that the mother or father is unfit to have the custody of the infant, the guardian may apply to the court, and the court may either refuse to make any order (in which case the mother or father shall remain sole guardian) or make an order that the guardian so appointed shall act jointly with the mother or father, or that he shall be sole guardian of the infant, and in the latter case may make such order regarding the custody of the infant and the right of access thereto of its mother or father as, having regard to the welfare of the infant, the court may think fit, and may further order that the mother or father shall pay to the guardian towards the maintenance of the infant such weekly or other periodical sum as, having regard to the means of the mother or father, the court may consider reasonable."

The difference between s. 3 (2) and s. 5 (4) is manifest. There is no power under s. 3, if custody is awarded to the father, to order the mother to make any contribution towards the maintenance of the child, but under s. 5 there is a power to order not only the father but also the mother to make a contribution towards that maintenance by payment to a guardian. The difference between the two sections seems to me to indicate clearly that those words "having regard to the means of the mother or father" are linked up with the word pay—"pay . . . having regard to the means of the mother or father"—in s. 5 (4), and may well be similarly linked in s. 3 (2), where the mother is omitted because she never has to pay under s. 3 (2).

The point that is taken is that, by reason of the phraseology of s. 3 (2), the court is not entitled to take into account the means of the mother in assessing the quantum of maintenance. I am unable to adopt that view. The object of the section seems to me quite clear. It will be noticed that the section is permissive—the court may make such an order—and the court, in considering whether to exercise its discretion, has first of all to address itself to the needs of the infant as regards its maintenance. The phrase employed is "towards the maintenance of the infant", not "in satisfaction of" or "in discharge of", or anything of that sort. It is "towards the maintenance". The first thing that the court has to consider is: What does the infant need? For that purpose, the court has to consider, for instance, the age of the infant, whether it is at school or in a perambulator or at a university, and its standard of life hitherto is by no means immaterial. It would quite plainly be permissible to consider whether it had funds provided for its maintenance by some deceased parent or aunt. Why not consider how far its mother is able to maintain it? I can see no reason for excluding that one circumstance, which seems to me to be very relevant, from all the other relevant circumstances which have to be considered.

Counsel, quite properly, says: "Why, then, is there this reference to the means of the father?" To my mind, the reason is quite plain. The first thing one has to consider is what is reasonably required for the maintenance of the infant, but it may well happen that what is reasonably required for the infant is more than it is just to order the father to contribute, having regard to his financial position. He is the person who has to pay, and this is a safeguarding provision, and the reason why the mother is not mentioned there is because she never has to pay under s. 3 (2). The reason why the mother is mentioned in s. 5 (4) is because under that section she does sometimes have to pay.

Incredible results would follow if the court could consider, in exercising its discretion under s. 3 (2), only the means of the father—so incredible that counsel did not suggest that that was the interpretation. He says that it should be read as follows: "The court may further order that the father shall pay to the mother towards the maintenance of the infant such sum as the court may think reasonable, having regard to all relevant circumstances, including means, but, as to means, having regard to those of the father only". Section 3 (2) does not provide anything at all resembling that, and, as I do not find it difficult to construe the section without inserting any words, I am not prepared to insert words such as would be required to enable me to construe the section in the manner which counsel has suggested. It is, of course, no answer in law to say that counsel has for the first time raised this point on a section which has been applied without question on innumerable occasions, but it is comforting to me to feel that it is possible to give to this section a construction which has, I think, been adopted without question for nearly thirty years. Accordingly, in my judgment, this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CHALLAND v. BARTLETT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 21, 1953.]

Food and Drugs—Milk—"Possession for sale"—Possession by producer—Milk at place on farm agreed as collecting point with retailer—Food and Drugs (Milk, Dairies and Artificial Cream) Act, 1950 (c. 35), s. 9 (1) (c). Food and Drugs—Proceedings against third party—Form of information—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 83 (3).

The respondent was a dairy farmer who sold his milk to the Milk Marketing Board, and was directed by the board to deliver the milk to W., a retailer. The respondent and W. agreed that the delivery point should be the dairy on the respondent's premises, where the respondent placed the milk churns to be collected by W. Samples were taken (i) from milk which was being retailed by W. about a mile away from the farm and which had come from the respondent's dairy, and (ii) from churns of milk standing at the respondent's dairy awaiting collection by W. The samples showed that water had been added to the milk. Three informations were preferred against the respondent. The first stated that he "by virtue of s. 83 (3) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, did have in his possession for the purpose of sale for human consumption milk to which an addition of water had been made, contrary to s. 9 (1) (c) of the Food and Drugs (Milk, Dairies and Artificial Cream) Act, 1950", and the second and third informations alleged similar offences with the omission of the words "by virtue of s. 83 (3) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938".

HELD: (i) the first information was bad in that, as was conceded, it did not allege that the local authority "are reasonably satisfied that the offence of which complaint is made was due to an act or default of" the respondent, and the summons in respect of that offence must be dismissed.

(ii) with regard to the second and third informations the milk which was at the respondent's dairy awaiting collection by W. was still in the respondent's possession, even though the property in it had passed to the Milk Marketing Board, and, therefore, the respondent had the milk in his possession for the purpose of sale within s. 9 (1) (c) of the Act of 1950 and was guilty of the offences charged under that sub-section.

CASE STATED by Sussex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Uckfield on Mar. 5, 1953, the appellant, William Edward Challand, a chief inspector of weights and measures, preferred informations against the respondent, James Gilbert Bartlett, charging (i) under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (3), that, on Jan. 11, 1953, he did have in his possession for the purpose of sale for human consumption milk to which an addition of water had been made, contrary to the Food and Drugs (Milk, Dairies and Artificial Cream) Act, 1950, s. 9 (1) (c), and (ii) by two further informations, that on Jan. 12, 1953, he had in his possession for the purpose of sale for human consumption milk to which an addition of water had been made, contrary to s. 9 (1) (c) of the Act of 1950.

It was proved or admitted that the respondent was the owner and occupier of premises known as Lower Totease Farm, Buxted, where he carried on the business of farming and milk production; that on Sept. 1, 1950, he entered into a contract with the Milk Marketing Board to sell to the board all milk produced at his farm except what he lawfully used in his own household, etc.; that it was provided by cl. 3 of the contract that he should deliver the milk daily to such places and consignees as the board directed, and by cl. 4 (1) that the milk should be ready for collection at the farm collecting point, being, in the absence of other directions, the point at which the milk was usually put for collection; that the board directed the respondent to supply and deliver milk produced at his farm to one L. A. Wood and that the milk would be collected at the farm; that the dairy at the respondent's farm contained a milk cooler and a bottling machine; that the dairy was used by both Wood, who bottled the milk there, and the respondent; that the milking was done by the respondent in the cowstall, and that the milk was taken to the dairy and placed in the drum of the cooler and thence into churns which were placed in the centre of the floor of the dairy for collection by Wood; that this was agreed between the respondent and Wood as the place of delivery and collection of the milk, and that the respondent, having placed the churns in this position, had completed the delivery of the milk to Wood and had done all that he was required and directed to do by the board; that on Jan. 11, 1953, Wood was seen delivering milk in the village of Buxted about one mile from the respondent's farm; that samples were taken by an inspector who ascertained that the milk had been produced by the respondent; that the following morning the respondent's farm was visited and samples were taken from churns placed in the centre of the dairy floor, the agreed place of collection by Wood, who arrived shortly afterwards and commenced bottling milk from churns from which samples had been taken; that three of the samples contained added water; that samples were also taken of milk which was being produced when the inspector arrived at the dairy and these samples were found to be genuine milk.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended on the authority of Oliver v. Goodger (1) (i) that the milk of which samples were taken in the dairy, having been delivered to the agreed collecting point in accordance with the contract and direction of the board, was no longer in the respondent's possession at the time the samples were taken, and (ii) that the milk of which a sample was taken from Wood on his delivery round was also not in the respondent's possession. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that, so far as the milk sample of the delivery round was concerned, s. 83 (3) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, applied, and that the milk from which samples were taken in the dairy was in the possession of the respondent since it was still on the respondent's premises and Wood had not yet arrived to take possession of it.

The justices being of opinion (i) that the milk contained added water, (ii) that at the time when the sample was taken on the milk round the milk was not in the possession of the respondent, and (iii) that the milk of which samples were taken in the dairy had passed out of the possession of the respondent when it was placed by him at the agreed point for collection, dismissed the informations. The appellant appealed.

Paul Wrightson for the appellant.

J. H. Gower for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The first information, in my opinion, was rightly dismissed. The justices found that the respondent had sold his milk to the Milk Marketing Board, and that the board had the right under the contract to direct him where the milk was to be delivered. They directed him to deliver the milk to one Wood, a retail milkman, who, by arrangement with the respondent, used to come to the respondent's farm and collect it from a particular place. One day, after Wood had fetched the milk, he was selling it in the village street, when he was stopped by the appellant, the sampling officer, who took samples. Having ascertained that the milk came from the farm, when it was found to have water added to it the appellant decided to take proceedings under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (3), which allows the local authority, if they are satisfied that the breach of the Act is due, not to the person who actually sells, but to the person who supplies to the seller, and that the seller can put forward a defence, to proceed against the original supplier, in this case the respondent. The summons issued against the respondent charged him with being in possession of the milk that Wood was selling in the village. Of course, he was not in possession of that milk, the possession having passed to Wood who was selling it, but it was quite right, no doubt, to attempt to take proceedings under s. 83 (3). An information under that sub-section, however, should set out the facts and state that the local authority are reasonably satisfied that the offence of which complaint was made was due to the act or default of the person proceeded against under the sub-section. It may be that this is a technical point because on the merits, or, perhaps, the de-merits, of the case, there is no doubt that the respondent was responsible. But the proceedings under s. 83 (3) must be taken in proper form, and counsel for the appellant concedes, and it is the opinion of the court, that the information was not in the right form and did not give the justices jurisdiction.

With regard to the other two summonses, we think that the case must go back with a direction to convict. Those two cases related to sales of milk which was at the respondent's dairy. It seems to me that until Wood took possession of the milk, it always was and remained in the possession of the respondent. It must have been in the possession of somebody because there is no suggestion that it was abandoned. It was held by the respondent for Wood, and if a trespasser, or somebody representing himself as Wood, or a thief, had come to the farm, the respondent would not have delivered the milk to him, but would have said: "This is Wood's milk. You have to get authority from him". He was keeping possession of it for Wood although it may be that the property in the milk had passed to the Milk Marketing Board. The property was in the Milk Marketing Board till it had been delivered to Wood and it seems to me it was in the possession of the respondent till it had been delivered to Wood.

A Before I refer to the cases cited, I would say that the point was made that, as the Food and Drugs (Milk, Dairies and Artificial Cream) Act, 1950, s. 9 (1) (c), refers to "have in his possession for sale", and as the sale was complete in the sense that as soon as the milk was appropriated to the contract the property passed to the Milk Marketing Board, therefore, it was not in the respondent's possession for sale. But that is not, I think, the intention of the Act, which is to draw a distinction between an article of commerce to be sold to other people and an article to be used by the farmer for his own personal use. If he keeps B milk on his premises for his own personal use, there is no reason why he should not have milk and water if he prefers that to milk. In my opinion, this expression "possession for the purpose of sale" simply shows that s. 9 (1) (c) is dealing with milk treated as an article of commerce and not with milk kept for the farmer's own use. Oliver v. Goodger (1), which was cited to the justices and does seem at first sight to be very like this case, was a case in which a Divisional Court consisting of VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., HUMPHREYS, J., and BIRKETT, J., C decided that no offence had been committed. That case was considered by this court in Kilsby v. Horsford (2), which I remember because both OLIVER, J., and myself, and, I think, STABLE, J., the third member of the court, found D great difficulty in understanding the decision in Oliver v. Goodger (1). Certainly, Oliver v. Goodger (1) has not been followed, and I cannot help thinking that, if the effect contended for successfully before the justices should be given to that decision, it would, to use a common expression, drive a coach and four through this section of the Act. We distinguished Kilsby v. Horsford (2) from Oliver v. Goodger (1) by showing that the judgment in the latter case could be upheld on the ground that the milk had left the farm premises and had been put on the road outside the farm. Therefore, we said, to use the words of VISCOUNT E CALDECOTE, C.J. ([1944] 2 All E.R. 482), that on the evidence the justices were entitled to come to the decision which they had reached, and the decision which the justices in that case had reached was that the milk was no longer in the possession of the farmer. I say frankly, though I recognise I am bound by that case, that I feel doubt whether it was right, and I myself should not have decided that way. I said in Kilsby v. Horsford (2) (93 Sol. Jo. 601) that the milk was F as much in the possession of the respondent farmer as if it had been in the farm dairy or in a barn, because the delivery point in that case was within the curtilage of the farm. That case was not cited to the justices in the present case, and, therefore, they not unnaturally thought they were bound by Oliver v. Goodger (1). Therefore, as they did not come to a correct decision with regard to the second and third informations, the appeal must be allowed and those G informations must go back to the justices with an intimation that the offences were proved.

STYLE v. STYLE AND KEILLER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), July 15, 29, 1953.]

Divorce—Settlement of wife's property—Power of court to order deed settled by conveyancing counsel—Power to ante-date deed to date of decree absolute—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 24 (1).

On Mar. 20, 1950, the husband obtained a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent, and was awarded £5,000 damages. On May 31, 1950, the decree was made absolute. On June 20, 1950, the wife married the co-respondent. The husband applied under s. 24 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, for a settlement on him of a portion of the wife's property. The husband was in receipt of an annual income from a pension and investments of £1,550; the wife had property to the value of about £450,000 (of which that in England was worth £54,000), and was in receipt therefrom of a gross annual income of £11,000 to £12,000. There were no children of the marriage, but the wife had a son by a previous marriage, and she was paying for his education.

HELD: in the circumstances a sum of £1,500 a year was not excessive and the wife would be ordered to settle on the husband property which would provide that sum; but under s. 24 (1) the court had no power to order a deed to be drawn up by conveyancing counsel of the court: Lorrimer v. Lorrimer & Clair ([1908] P. 282), doubted; or to ante-date the settlement to the date of the decree absolute: Savary v. Savary (1898) 79 L.T. 607, applied.

APPLICATION by the husband under s. 24 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, for a settlement of a portion of the wife's property on him.

The parties were married in 1938, the husband being then thirty-seven and the wife thirty years of age. There were no children of the marriage, but the wife had a son by a previous marriage. On Mar. 20, 1950, the husband obtained a decree nisi on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent and was awarded £5,000 damages. On May 31, 1950, the decree was made absolute. On June 20, 1950, the wife married the co-respondent. On Feb. 2, 1951, the husband served on the wife notice of an application under s. 24 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, for a settlement of part of the wife's property to be made for his benefit. The husband, who, until his retirement in 1947 through ill health, had been manager of a brewery, was in receipt of a voluntary pension from his former employers of £1,000 a year, and he also had investments producing an income of £550 a year. The wife had capital of the value of about £450,000, of which £54,000 represented investments in this country, the rest of her property being in the United States of America, and her gross annual income was between £11,000 and £12,000. The wife was paying for the education of her son, now eighteen years of age, and she proposed to send him to Oxford University. In his report dated June 18, 1953, the registrar submitted that the wife should be ordered to settle on the husband as from the date of the decree absolute a fund producing a gross sum of £1,500 a year for his life and that this should be provided from securities to be agreed by the parties or in default of agreement as directed by the registrar. On July 13, 1953, the wife filed notice of motion for a variation of that report on the grounds that the registrar's finding that the husband's conduct did not break up the marriage was against the weight of evidence, that the sum proposed in the report was excessive, and that the settlement ought not to date from the decree absolute and ought not to be for the husband's life. On July 14, 1953, the husband filed notice of motion for a variation of the report by increasing the proposed amount, but it was stated in court that, but for the wife's notice of motion, the husband would probably have been content with the award.

Cur. adv. vult.

C July 29. BARNARD, J., stated the facts and continued: The wife puts forward four grounds for varying the registrar's report. First, she says that the registrar misdirected himself in holding that the husband's habits and treatment of the wife did not affront or disgust her so as to cause the break-up of the marriage and so held against the weight of evidence. I propose to say little about this. The wife filed a number of affidavits in which she sought to establish that, quite apart from her adultery with the co-respondent, the marriage was a failure and that she would have had to leave her husband because of his habits. The registrar went into this most carefully and I have no doubt that he arrived at a true conclusion. After summing-up the evidence he says:

"I disbelieve the wife's affidavits. I think some of the allegations are entirely untrue whilst the others are exaggerated."

E I think that the registrar was right and I have no doubt that what really broke up this marriage was the wife's adultery with the co-respondent, and it is both idle and futile at this stage when she is seeking to prevent a settlement of her property to put this defence forward.

F Secondly, the wife says that the sum proposed in the report to be settled by the registrar is excessive, having regard to the absence of any reasonable prospect that the husband would have obtained any financial benefit from the wife's fortune if the marriage had continued. She relies on what the registrar says in his report, namely:

"In all the circumstances I am doubtful whether the wife would have allowed her husband to enjoy her fortune to the same extent as one would expect in a more normal case and indeed she did not do so even before meeting the co-respondent."

G The registrar adds this, however:

"There can be no doubt that he would have benefited fairly substantially had the marriage continued uncomplicated by this liaison."

I think the answer is that, but for the registrar finding those to be the facts, the sum he has recommended in his report would have been far larger.

H Thirdly, the wife says that the amount is excessive having regard to the amount of her capital in stocks and shares within the jurisdiction which the report would require her to settle. Now, the wife's fortune is fully dealt with in an exhibit to her affidavit, namely, a letter from her accountants in which they deal with her property in detail and in a schedule to the letter set out a full list of her free investments in this country. The capital value of those investments is about £54,000 and the income received from them for the year ending Apr. 5, 1952, was just over £2,000 a year. I am going slightly to vary the report made by the registrar, because I do not think it would be right to tie up what might amount to three-quarters of the wife's free investments in order to produce the £1,500 a year. What complicates matters in this case is that the rest of the wife's property is situated in the United States of America, and a very large proportion of that is in joint ownership of land there. But she receives the income from it in this country and I have yet to learn that income received in this country does not constitute property. Taking that into consideration, I only propose to vary the registrar's report by giving slightly more detailed instructions as to how the property is to be settled. I think it correct to order the wife to execute a settlement of her property to produce £1,500 a year gross payable to the husband during his life, one moiety, that is to say, £750 a year, to be secured on the wife's free investments in this country and, as to the other moiety, the remaining £750 a year, by a charge on her income receivable in this country.

That does not, unfortunately, dispose of the matter. I must say that I would have liked to invoke the assistance of conveyancing counsel of the court and to have ordered any deed to be settled by conveyancing counsel of the court, but, strange to say, neither s. 24 (1) and (2) nor s. 25, which deals with variation of settlements, gives the court any jurisdiction to refer the deed to conveyancing counsel. That is distinct from s. 19 (2), s. 22 (4), s. 23 (2), or s. 26 (3), of the Act, by which the court is expressly given jurisdiction to refer the matters dealt with therein to conveyancing counsel. This distinction was commented on by the full court in Bacon v. Bacon & Bacon (1). I notice, however, that in Lorriman v. Lorriman & Clair (2), which was an application for a settlement of the guilty wife's property, the registrar followed the practice as in maintenance and submitted in his report that in default of the agreement the necessary deed should be referred to conveyancing counsel. This submission seems to have passed unnoticed when the matter came before the court.

Fourthly, the wife says that the settlement ought not to take effect as from the decree absolute, and she also objects to the sum being settled on the husband for his life. With regard to that latter objection it is well within the jurisdiction of the court to order a settlement for the life of the husband, and I think it is very right and proper in this case. As to the other matter I feel grave difficulty. I do not think myself on looking at the section that the court really has any jurisdiction either to ante-date the settlement or to ante-date the effect of the settlement. Section 24 (1) says:

"If it appears to the court in any case in which the court pronounces a decree for divorce or for judicial separation by reason of the adultery . . . of the wife that the wife is entitled to any property either in possession or reversion . . ."

That is different from the wording of s. 19 (2) which deals with maintenance, and which commences "On any decree for divorce." I cannot help feeling that the court has no jurisdiction to do anything except to order the wife to settle the property. That, I think, must mean that it only becomes effective as from the date of the settlement. I am fortified in that view by Savary v. Savary (3) where the order of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., was as follows (79 L.T. 610):

"It is ordered that the [wife] do settle and assign as beneficial owner upon the [husband] the two several annuities hereinafter mentioned during her life, to commence from the date of the settlement to be made under this order . . ."

This order of the President was reviewed by the Court of Appeal and SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., in no way criticised this part of it. I should like to think that I was wrong, because it is obviously inviting the guilty party who has been ordered to make a settlement to delay the proceedings as long as possible, and I am not at all sure that that has not been done in this case—the husband's notice being dated June 29, 1950, and the date now being July, 1953. Nevertheless, I feel I must vary the report in this respect, and, therefore, the order which I propose to make must commence from the date of the settlement to be made under this order.

As to the £1,500 a year which the wife has been ordered to settle, I think the guiding principle is laid down in Lorriman v. Lorriman & Clair (2) by BUCKNILL, J., where, in the course of his judgment, he said ([1908] P. 289):

"The underlying principle is that the court must try to ascertain the nature and extent of the pecuniary change by the wife's criminality, and in order to see that it must look at the probable pecuniary position which the husband, the wife, and the issue of the marriage would have occupied if the marriage had not been dissolved."

B

Having regard to all the facts in this case I think that, if I had dealt with it in the first instance myself, I might not have ordered her to settle so much. There are no children of this marriage, and what the registrar recommends should be settled will, in effect, double the husband's income, but I think I should have only ordered a little less. That being so, I do not think it would be right to interfere with the sum that the registrar has arrived at after he has carefully considered every material fact. I also refrain from interfering with the sum recommended by the registrar, because I do not feel able to agree with him that you can ante-date the effect of this settlement to the decree absolute and there has been three years' delay. Therefore, except for the two slight variations I have made, one which details the security a little more than the registrar has done and the other which provides that the settlement is only to be effective as from the date of its execution, I confirm the report.

[After some discussion],

Subject to the consent in writing of the wife, the deed will be settled by conveyancing counsel to the court.

E

Order accordingly.

DICKSON v. FLACK AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.J.J.), July 15, 16, 17, 1953.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Cutter of vertical spindle moulding machine—“Most efficient guard”—Protection from contact with cutters or from flying broken parts of machine—Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922 (S.R. & O., 1922, No. 1196), reg. 17—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 14 (1).

A vertical spindle moulding machine in a factory was fitted with a Shaw guard, which was found by the trial judge to be the most effective to protect the operator from coming into contact with a cutter when the machine was being operated (that being much the greatest danger), but less effective than a cage guard to protect the operator from broken pieces of the machine flying out. The danger from flying fragments on such machines was recognised in two official pamphlets (Safety Pamphlet No. 8, published by the Home Office in 1928, and Form No. 279, 1935, reprinted in 1947, issued by the Ministry of Labour and National Service), and also in the trade and in evidence for the occupier of the factory, the employer of the plaintiff, and the pamphlets illustrated various guards, besides the Shaw guard and cage guards, which minimised the risk of injury from a piece of machinery ejected. While operating the machine the plaintiff was injured by a piece of a cutter which flew out, and he claimed damages against his employer.

HELD: (i) (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente) the requirement in reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, that the cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine should be “provided with the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed” was intended to protect employees from the danger, not only of their coming in contact with the cutter, but also of a cutter, or part of a cutter or some part of the machine to which the cutter was attached, breaking away and injuring them, this being a danger which on the evidence had long been recognised; and as on the facts a guard affording this protection had not been, and could have been, provided, the employer was liable for breach of the regulation.

Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. ([1946] 1 All E.R. 243), approved.

Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 386), distinguished.

(ii) in any event, the employer was liable for a breach of the requirement in s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, that “Every dangerous part of any machinery . . . shall be securely fenced”, which covered the case of any dangerous part, including a part of the machine flying out, in so far as provision was not made in respect of it by reg. 17.

Benn v. Kamm & Co., Ltd. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 833) and dictum of LORD DU PARCQ in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 391), applied.

Dictum of LORD PORTER (ibid., 390), not applied.

Decision of HAVERS, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 236), reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff against an order of HAVERS, J., dated Dec. 19, 1952, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 236.

The plaintiff was a woodworking machinist of fifty-three years' experience and was employed by a builder, being in charge of a joiner's shop which the employer occupied for the purposes of his building contracts. In the plaintiff's charge were ten or eleven machines, including two vertical spindle moulders, of which one, a re-conditioned machine, was twenty-five to thirty years old and mechanically in a very fair condition. The motive power was electric with flat-belt transmission, the power controls being of press-button type and conforming to the regulations. The spindle head-piece unit received and carried an interchangeable square cutter block with a groove, dovetail fashion, running lengthways on four sides. The grooves received cutter bolts and were the means, with washers and nuts, of securing the cutter to the block.

On Mar. 29, 1950, the plaintiff had to set up the machine for the purpose of running a window sill in connection with a shop front, the piece of wood being a straight piece five inches wide, three inches thick and five feet, six inches long. He put two cutters on the cutter block, and, according to his evidence, tightened them up by the nut with a spanner, and he started the machine to make a test run in order to ascertain whether the cutters were properly balanced before operating the machine on the wood. While the machine was working a bolt broke, one of the cutters flew off and either a nut or a nut and a portion of the bolt struck the plaintiff in his left eye and injured him. The machine at the time was fitted with a Shaw guard (spring guard (Shaw's patent) as shown in Safety Pamphlet No. 8, Fencing and other Safety Precautions for Woodworking Machinery, 1928 ed., p. 54, fig. 69, issued by the Home Secretary).

HAVERS, J., found as a fact that a guard of the Shaw type was the most effective to protect the operator from coming into contact with a cutter when the machine was being operated on a small section of straight wood, but that a cage guard would have been more effective to protect him from broken pieces of the machine flying out. The Shaw guard was also the more effective if both dangers had to be taken into account, since the danger from contact with a cutter was by far the greater. During operation of the machine in order to test the balance of the cutters, the danger of the operator coming into contact with the cutters was still very great, but the danger of injury from a fragment of a broken part of the machine flying out was remote. He held that reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, was intended to prevent an employee from coming into contact with the cutters, that "the most efficient guard" which the regulations required to be provided was the most efficient guard for that purpose and that, therefore, no breach of the regulations had been proved. The plaintiff appealed.

The employer died before the trial of the action and the proceedings were continued against his personal representatives.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This appeal raises a question under the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, as amended by the Woodworking (Amendment of Scope) Special Regulations, 1945, and, perhaps, too, a question under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1). The plaintiff was sixty-seven years of age when hurt in an accident in the employer's factory on Mar. 29, 1950. He was an experienced woodworker, having been on that kind of work all his working life, and he was employed by the defendants as a woodcutting machinist. On the day of the accident he was operating a vertical spindle moulding machine when a cutter was thrown off and a bolt and a nut were thrown out of the machine, and something—probably part of a nut or bolt—struck his eye, which he lost.

In the plaintiff's action against his employer it was said, first, that there was a breach by the employer of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, reg. 17, and, further or alternatively, a breach of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1), and it was further said that the employer was negligent in that he had failed to perform the duty which he owed to his employees, a duty to take reasonable care that they were not subjected to unnecessary risk. We have not heard argument on the allegation of negligence at common law. I indicated to counsel for the plaintiff at an early stage of his argument that it would be very difficult for him, in view of the judge's findings of fact, to establish negligence against the employer, but he desired to keep that claim open. The main argument has developed on reg. 17. The plaintiff worked in front of a table. He had to pass a piece of wood along a fence so that it came into contact with the cutters, and a guard, known as the Shaw type of guard, was provided. The advantage of that guard is that it brings pressure to bear on the piece of wood which has to pass along the cutters from above and from the front, so that the hands of the operator do not approach the cutters. On the morning of the accident the plaintiff had not commenced to put wood through the machine. He had first to test the machine to see that the cutters were working properly and that the machine was running evenly, and he was doing the testing when he met with the accident. The suggestion was made by counsel for the plaintiff that there is a difference between testing time and working time, and that, even if it could be said that the Shaw type of guard was the best for ordinary working, which he did not admit, it was not the best for use during testing time, and that there ought to have been another guard for testing time. I do not think that there is any substance in this distinction. Testing time is very short. I do not think it could have been contemplated that there ought to be another type of guard for testing, i.e., a guard other than that used normally during the working of the machine, and I propose to approach this case on the basis that, if the most efficient guard was provided for working purposes, that, too, should be regarded as sufficient for the short period during which testing would take place.

The machine is described sufficiently by HAVERS, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 237). He described it as an old machine, but mechanically in very fair condition. The motive power is electric with flat-belt transmission, and the power controls are of the press-button type and conform to the regulations. The spindle head-piece unit dimensions are $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches and seven inches long, and on and, in a sense, below the spindle head-piece there is an interchangeable square cutter block, which revolves with a spindle unit at 4,500 revolutions a minute. Attached to the cutter block are two cutters which are fastened to the cutter block by means of bolts and nuts. As the cutter block revolves, there go with it the two cutters which do the necessary moulding of the piece of wood which is passed through the machine. The very high speed may mean that there is some loosening of bolts. That is not likely to happen in the ordinary course if the nuts have been properly tightened, but it may occur. Sometimes there occurs what is called drift, and a cutter may become loose. The danger of something being thrown from a machine of this type has been recognised for many years, and an examination of the evidence of the expert witnesses called for the employer shows that they recognised it. I refer in particular to the evidence of Mr. Bevan when he was cross-examined. He was asked:

"It is recognised throughout that document [a pamphlet], as you fairly agreed yesterday, that this sort of machine is a dangerous machine? A.—It is recognised throughout this document and throughout the trade. Q.—And also that it is liable to shoot parts of it out at great speed. We are agreed about that? A.—I do not think this document deals particularly with parts of machines coming out."

It was pointed out to him later that the small pamphlet did deal with that matter. Other witnesses spoke of the danger of parts being thrown out of the machine. Fortunately, as far as the evidence showed, they had not known of a great number of accidents from that cause, but from the books which were before the judge one sees more of the danger which arises from a machine such as this. In 1928 the Home Office published "Safety Pamphlet No. 8. Fencing and other Safety Precautions for Woodworking Machinery", and at p. 51 there is an article under the heading "Spindle Moulders" in which it is said:

"The vertical spindle moulder or shaping machine is one of the most dangerous tools in common use. It causes a large number of accidents yearly, and a considerable proportion of these result in the loss of several fingers. As with circular saws and over-hand planers the reason lies mainly in the operative's hands being constantly in close proximity to rapidly moving edge tools. The fingers come into contact with the cutters, especially when the work is violently torn from the machinist's grasp in consequence of some irregularity catching in the cutters. The fatal accidents are caused by cutters breaking off or coming loose, and being hurled away with great velocity, due to the centrifugal force developed by their exceptionally high speed, one to seven thousand revolutions per minute. It is therefore of prime importance that suitable safeguards should be chosen for each operation and that cutters should be set with scrupulous care."

Another smaller pamphlet also before the judge was "Form No. 279", issued by the factory department of the Ministry of Labour and National Service. This was published in 1935 and reprinted in 1947. That pamphlet gives diagrams of various guards which can be used for this type of work, and on p. 14 it has this passage:

"The danger to workers at neighbouring machines or benches can be minimised by the provision of guards and screens which will intercept a flying cutter."

Thus, it is clear that the danger of parts flying out of a machine has been recognised by those responsible for safety precautions for a considerable number of years.

The Woodworking Machinery Regulations, made by the Secretary of State for Home Affairs in 1922, recognise the difficulty which arises in the use of certain machines. The definition clause provides:

"'Woodworking machine' means a circular saw, plain band saw, planing machine, vertical spindle moulding machine or chain mortising machine operating on wood."

Regulation 17 provides:

"The cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine shall when practicable be provided with the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed."

The machine which was being used by the plaintiff at the time of his accident was a vertical spindle moulding machine, so that the duty of the employer, or occupier of the factory, was that that machine should, when practicable, be provided with the most efficient guard, having regard to the nature of the work which was being performed, but no specific guard is prescribed.

Regulation 18 also deals with a guard for the cutter, and it may be said to give some support for the submission made on behalf of the employer that the provision in reg. 17, as in reg. 18, is for a guard to the cutters, and thus something to prevent the hand or body of an employee coming into touch with the cutters. On the other hand, it is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the regulation is intended to provide, and does provide, that there shall be the most efficient guard, when practicable, having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed, and it is said that, when it is known that there is a risk of a part of machinery being flung out of the machine, the most efficient guard must be designed with that risk or danger in mind as one of the things against which protection must be given.

The regulations may be said to be additional, in one sense, to the provisions of s. 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, but probably the better way to look at it is that they take the place of the provisions of the Act to the extent to which they go. That question was before this court in Benn v. Kamm & Co., Ltd. (1), in which it was held that the Horizontal Milling Machines Regulations, 1928, reg. 3, did not define exhaustively the duty of the occupier of the factory to fence horizontal machines and the defendants were in breach of s. 14 of the Act, and, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. SOMERVELL, L.J., having referred to Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (2), said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 836):

"I cannot see why, if there is what I call a separate subject of danger which falls within the general words of s. 14 (1), the duty under that section should be regarded as removed by the words of this regulation. I think they are inapt to have that effect. For these reasons, in my opinion, this appeal should succeed . . . The case must depend on the construction of the regulations . . ."

It is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff in this appeal that he is entitled to succeed on a breach of reg. 17 by the employer, but that, if reg. 17 does not go so far as it is submitted it does go, the plaintiff is entitled to fall back on the provisions of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1937, and to say that there was here a dangerous part of machinery which was not fenced as it should have been, and that in the circumstances the plaintiff is entitled to succeed under that sub-section.

In Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (3), decided by HILBERY, J., in 1946, the plaintiff, who was employed as a press operator at the defendants' wood-working factory, was at work at his machine when a piece of the cutter of the machine next to his, which was a spindle moulding machine, broke away, flew out of its holder, and struck and injured him. The spindle moulding machine had a guard of the type usually provided for such machines, but it was proved that it would have been possible to provide a guard which would probably have prevented the injury to the plaintiff. It was held that the defendants' duty was to fence the machines in their factory in accordance with the Wood-working Machinery Regulations, 1922, and that they had failed to discharge that duty, that those regulations ought not to be construed as made only for the protection of workers at their particular machines, and that the plaintiff was entitled to damages. That decision was given on reg. 17, with which we are now concerned, and HILBERY, J.'s view was that an obligation was created by the regulation to provide a guard against the risk, a known risk, of pieces of the machine flying out when the machine was revolving at great speed. It was not submitted in that case that the regulation did not cover the risk of something flying out from the machine, and so, in one sense, the point which has been argued in this case was not before the learned judge.

In 1948 Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (4) was decided by the House of Lords on s. 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, by which:

“Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced . . .”

A A piece of belting, which was at a considerable height above working level, had broken, and as it fell it had caused injury to a workman. It was held that the obligation created by s. 13 (1) did not extend to cover that risk, though the belt was part of the transmission machinery. The question whether, in the case of a machine which might be expected to throw off loose or broken parts, there was an obligation to fence for the purpose of protecting workmen against that danger was left open, at least in some of the opinions which were delivered. LORD PORTER, in dealing with the Factories Act, 1937, s. 13 and s. 14 ([1948] 2 All E.R. 390), expressed the opinion that “fencing”

B “means the erection of a barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machine, not an enclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying out.”

C LORD PORTER was dealing with the Act itself, and not with the regulation which is a matter for the consideration of this court. LORD DU PARCQ, who agreed in the result in that case, said (ibid., 391):

D “I wish to add, however, that, while I agree with LORD NORMAND that the words ‘securely fenced’ must be given the same meaning in each of the three sections (s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14), I think that they may well mean ‘so fenced as to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably expected.’ If machines exist, or are hereafter invented and used, which are dangerous because fragments or loose parts of the machinery are sometimes ejected from them, then I am not prepared to say that s. 14 does not require such machines to be fenced for the purpose of protecting workmen against that danger. If the dictum of my noble and learned friend LORD SIMONDS in Nicholls v. Austin (Leyton), Ltd. (5) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 98), is to be understood as meaning that such a machine need not be fenced, I respectfully doubt its accuracy, and must reserve my opinion on it.”

Much the same was said by LORD NORMAND (ibid., 393):

F “It is possible, therefore, that, if a machine may be expected to throw off detachable or broken parts in working, these parts may fall to be treated as dangerous and subject to the requirements of secure fencing. That is, however, a question on which I express no opinion.”

LORD JOWITT, L.C., while agreeing with the general conclusion as to the result in that case, said (ibid., 387):

G “At the same time I should desire to leave open for further consideration the question which LORD DU PARCQ raises in his opinion.”

H It was held by the House of Lords, therefore, that there was no liability on the facts of Carroll's case (4), but that was a wholly different case from that which we have to consider. In the first place, there was no evidence of an accident, or a happening, such as took place in Carroll's case (4) having taken place before. It might have been said that, under the wording of the different sections, to all intents and purposes the position of the belt in that case was such that it was as secure as if it had been fenced, though it was not put in that way. In the present case it appears from pamphlet or booklet that serious accidents of the kind that happened in the present case have happened before, and the evidence of the defendants' witnesses shows that there is a risk of parts of the machinery breaking away when there is movement at the high speed that takes place inside this machine. So the circumstances are different, and it may well be that, if the facts of this case had to be considered under

s. 12, s. 13, or s. 14, the House of Lords would still be prepared to say that there was liability if it was shown that the machine is dangerous because fragments of loose parts of the machinery are sometimes ejected from it.

Regulation 17 provides that the cutter on every vertical spindle moulding machine shall, when practicable, be provided with the most efficient guard having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed. In my view, that is wide enough to cover the risk of a cutter, or part of the cutter, or some part of the machine to which the cutter is attached, breaking away so as to cause danger to the men working the machine, or to other men working in that part of the factory. I am prepared to follow on that the judgment of HILBERY, J., in Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (3). It seems to me that, when a regulation of this type is made to prevent danger to workmen, and when it is well known that there are two types of danger, the guard ought not to be confined so as to meet only one type of danger. If it can be said that, as both reg. 17 and reg. 18 mention only the cutter, they extend only to prevent an employee making contact with the cutter, it seems to me that what SOMERVELL, L.J., said in Benn v. Kamm & Co., Ltd. (1) should be applied and other parts of the machine should be regarded as dangerous parts of machinery within the meaning of s. 14 (1), and thus they should be securely fenced unless it is shown that they are in such a position, or of such a construction, as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as they would be if securely fenced. The evidence establishes beyond doubt that there were dangerous parts of machinery. The revolving head-piece, the block and the cutter were dangerous. Unless the regulation covers all those parts which I have mentioned, s. 14 (1) comes into play, and it is for the court to determine whether or not, in view of the known danger of this kind, what was said by LORD DU PARCQ ([1948] 2 All E.R. 391) applies in the circumstances of this case. I for myself would be prepared to hold that it does.

It has not been easy to determine precisely what the facts are in this case. Considerable evidence was given over five days, and the learned judge sets out his conclusions with great care, though I am inclined to think that there is something in the nature of an omission. HAVERS, J., considered the different types of guard which had been suggested. It rather appears from his judgment as though he thought he had to choose between that which is known as a Shaw guard and a cage guard. I cannot find from his judgment that he considered something in the nature of a combination of the two. He was of opinion that, for all ordinary straight working, such as the plaintiff would have to do when he had finished testing, the Shaw guard was an efficient guard by reason of the fact that it prevented the workman's fingers or hand coming near the cutters. He said that it afforded no protection against anything flying out of the machine as in this case. He thought that a cage guard would not have been a complete protection for the fingers. That would depend, I should say, on whether or not the guard was efficiently fitted and adjusted. The learned judge considered that the greater risk was the risk of the fingers or hand of the workman being caught, although, taking (as it were) the cage guard on the one side and the Shaw guard on the other side, he found that the Shaw guard was the most efficient guard, having regard to the nature of the work which had to be done.

I am not sure that he approached the matter on quite as wide a basis as he might have done. I recognise the difficulty of the judge who hears for days disputes between witnesses as to the best type of guard, and the most efficient guard for the work which has to be done. In the 1928 "Safety Pamphlet No. 8" there are diagrams of different guards, and on p. 54 there are two examples of the spindle-moulder guard made by J. Sagar & Co., Ltd., Halifax. It looks as though in the front, between the workman and where the cutters are, there is a complete guard which would protect the fingers, and above the cutters

A and the block there is a circular piece which must have the effect of preventing objects from being thrown out as a result of a break inside the machine. These matters are primarily for the trial judge, but I am bound to say that it looks to me from those diagrams as though for the work which was being done the Sagar guard is likely to be more efficient than the Shaw guard. One witness called on behalf of the defendants was in the employ of J. Sagar & Co., Ltd., of Halifax, but unfortunately, though his company makes the Sagar guard and the Shaw guard, he had never seen the 1935 (or 1947) pamphlet. That shows on pp. 11 and 12 diagrams of this type of machine with a guard in front, maybe not quite so complete a guard as the Shaw guard, and round the place where the cutters and the block are is an extra form of guard with something on the top of it. There is a page dealing with flying cutters, p. 13, and on p. 14 is the note which I have already read:

B "The danger to workers at neighbouring machines or benches can be minimised by the provision of guards and screens which will intercept a flying cutter."

C HAVERS, J., held that the Shaw guard was the most efficient for the work which was being done, and that, even if he had been in favour of the plaintiff on the construction of the regulation, the plaintiff would not have been entitled to succeed, because he was not satisfied that the defendants had not provided the most efficient guard. If he had come to that conclusion after considering the different guards suggested in the books, etc., and after considering the evidence, I should have found great difficulty in interfering with that which really is a question of fact for him. But it appears to me that he directed his attention only to the advantages of the Shaw guard as against a cage guard. [His LORDSHIP considered evidence given by Mr. Bevan, a witness for the employer, and continued:] One can see, as one looks at the photograph which shows the Shaw guard in position, the parts which are left uncovered at the front. A Shaw guard is doubtless a very good guard for the protection of the fingers and the hands, but if this photograph shows, as we are told it does, the position of the Shaw guard in use on the day of this accident, the Shaw guard did not go as high as the top of the block, and it was not a complete protection. Mr. Bevan, the witness for the employer, seems to have agreed. The question for consideration, therefore, was not which was the better for the type of work which was being done, the Shaw guard or some cage guard, but whether the employer on the occasion in question provided the most efficient form of guard. In my opinion, the guard shown in the photograph would have been more efficient had it come higher. I do not know whether it could have been so constructed or not, but I see no reason why it should not have been. Again, there is nothing whatever round the dangerous part. There is the Shaw guard in front, which does not provide complete protection. There is nothing at the side. There is nothing at the back. Was there any reason at all why there should not have been erected, or placed, a plate behind the Shaw guard a little higher than the Shaw guard? Was there some reason why the fence (as it is called) which runs across the table should not have been higher, or why any one of the covering types of guard shown in the little pamphlet on pp. 11 and 12 should not have been put on this machine? Would they have interfered with this type of guard? It may be that these questions were not all raised before HAVERS, J., when he came to the conclusion that the Shaw guard was the most efficient type of guard on a comparison between the Shaw guard and a cage guard.

H In order to form a view on the question whether the most efficient guard was provided, it is necessary to consider first the likelihood of accidents and the likelihood of injury. Those questions are referred to in both pamphlets before the court, and they were dealt with in the evidence. Assuming that reg. 17 calls for a guard which would prevent pieces, or help to prevent pieces of any broken part, being thrown out, it is necessary to consider that danger as well as the danger to the fingers, and I think one must ask oneself: Is there any difficulty about combining in one guard two forms of guard, or in the placing in front, on the side, and behind the machine, of a sheet of the kind I have mentioned. This workman was seriously hurt through a piece of the machine being ejected from it when it was travelling at high speed. It is the kind of risk that has been considered for many years. The books show that, and if the guard ought to meet that type of risk, as I think it should, it was a sorry thing if, in 1950, no one could provide any sort of guard which would lessen that risk, and at the same time be a guard against hand injury. The publications to which I have referred show that there are guards which would do that, or which would help to minimise the risk, and without something of that sort having been done I am not prepared to say that the most efficient guard was provided, having regard to the nature of the work which was being performed. [His Lordship considered evidence given by Mr. Sullivan on behalf of the plaintiff, and continued:] That shows, at least, the witness had the view that the cage guard was better for all purposes. There was no reason why the judge should accept that view against another view, but the result on the facts is that the finding of HAVERS, J., means, if it stands, that in a case such as this, where there is a known risk of pieces being flung out of the machine, there is no obligation on the employers, the occupiers of the factory, to provide any guard above or round the machine to stop what the learned judge described as danger No. 2—to stop pieces being flung out. I cannot think that that is right. I am satisfied that, on the materials which were before the court, there were shown other guards, or other types of guards, to meet both dangers, and I do not think that it can be said that in the circumstances of this case, and having regard to the work which was being done (and in that I include the testing), the most efficient guard was provided.

HAVERS, J., having reached the conclusion that the employer was not at fault in that he had not on his finding committed any breach of reg. 17, went on to consider the law, and he appears to have thought that what the House of Lords said in Carroll's case (4) weakened the decision of HILBERY, J., in the case some eight years ago under reg. 17. I do not think that what was said in the House of Lords ought to be regarded as meaning that HILBERY, J.'s decision was wrong. Indeed, it would appear that, in the like circumstances, certainly LORD DU PARCQ would have taken a view of s. 14 of the Act similar to that which HILBERY, J., took of reg. 17. Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co. (3), HILBERY, J.'s decision, was cited in argument in the House of Lords and was referred to in some of their Lordships' opinions. No one said it was wrong. I do not think that it was. I would say that, if it be shown that the defendants had not provided the most efficient guard, they were in breach of reg. 17, and the accident which was sustained by the plaintiff arose through that breach. If it can be said that reg. 17 does not go so far, I would be prepared to hold that there was a breach of s. 14 (1) with the like result, though I prefer to base my judgment on reg. 17. In my opinion, this appeal should be allowed, and judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for the amount of damages provisionally assessed by the learned judge.

DENNING, L.J.: There are two dangers from a vertical spindle moulding machine. One is the danger of a man's hand in the course of his work coming into contact with the cutters. The other is the danger of a cutter flying out. It seems to me that reg. 17 only deals with the first danger, the danger of a man's fingers at work coming into contact with the cutters. The evidence shows that several guards are available to deal with that particular danger, and that the efficiency of those guards varies according to the nature of the work. A different guard is necessary for curved work from that used for straight work, and even with straight work a different guard may be necessary for small pieces of wood from that which is necessary for large pieces of wood. Accordingly, reg. 17 requires that the most efficient guard should be provided, "having regard to the nature of the work . . ." Regulation 17 is in terms confined to a guard for the "cutter", and reg. 18 shows that the guard in mind is a guard for the man's hands in holding the work. I do not find that reg. 17 deals with the second danger, the danger of a cutter flying out. That danger depends, not on the nature of the work, but on the nature of the machine itself. It is inherent in it that the cutter may work loose and fly out whatever kind of wood is being used, curved, straight, small or large. Inasmuch as that danger is not dealt with by reg. 17, in my judgment, it comes within s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, itself.

This court quite recently in Benn v. Kamm & Co., Ltd. (1), held that the fact that a regulation requires a guard for one dangerous part in particular of a machine does not entail that there is no obligation in regard to other dangerous parts. In regard to other dangerous parts not covered by the regulation one has to go back to the Act itself. So here. The dangerous part provided for by reg. 17 is the part of the table where the man's hand is likely to come into contact with the cutters while he is doing his work. The regulation does not provide for the gap in the machine above the cutter where it may fly out and thus cause danger. That is another dangerous part. It falls within s. 14 (1) and must be securely fenced.

It is said that the decision of the House of Lords in Carroll's case (4) binds us to hold that the Factories Act, 1937, does not protect workmen from pieces which fly out of machines. That case does not warrant any such proposition. The decision turned on the fact that the belt was in such a position as to be as safe as it would be if it was securely fenced. That is one of the exceptions in the Act. It has no place in the case before us. The House of Lords distinctly kept open the case of a machine which ([1948] 2 All E.R. 393):

"may be expected to throw off detachable or broken parts in working . . ."

LORD NORMAND said (ibid.) that

"... these parts may fall to be treated as dangerous and subject to the requirements of secure fencing."

This, in my opinion, is such a case. I am of opinion that any part which may be expected to throw off a loose part is itself a dangerous part and ought to be securely fenced under s. 14 (1).

If, however, this view is wrong, that is to say, if reg. 17 is comprehensive and is intended to deal with both the dangers, then, in my judgment, it should be construed as requiring that a guard should be provided to protect the worker from both dangers. The guard which was provided in this case only protected him from one of the dangers, that of his hand coming into contact with the cutter; it did not protect him from the other danger, of a cutter flying out. I fail to see how a guard can be "the most efficient guard" when it does not make any attempt to deal with what is a palpable danger. If necessary there must be a combined guard or two guards.

It is said that our decision will involve a change in the practice hitherto adopted in the trade. That does not affect me in the least. A flying cutter is a serious danger, and it is recognised as such in all official publications. Those who for their own profit employ men on dangerous machines ought to devise some safeguard to protect the men from danger, and if our decision today encourages them to do so it will have done some good. I agree that the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiff, as my Lord has said.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. In regard to the construction of reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, the conclusion of the learned judge was expressed in these words ([1953] 1 All E.R. 245):

"In considering, therefore, what is the most efficient guard I have to decide what is the most efficient guard for the purpose of preventing any employee from making contact with the cutters, having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed."

That view is not in accord with the view which was the basis of the decision of HILBERY, J., in Harrison's case (3), but it is said that in Harrison's case (3) (where a piece of a flying cutter hit a man who was working by an adjoining machine) HILBERY, J., did not have debated before him the points which were raised by counsel for the defendants before the learned judge in the present case. It is further said that, in the light of the later decision of the House of Lords in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (4), HILBERY, J., would not have reached the same conclusion. HILBERY, J., said in Harrison's case (3) ([1946] 1 All E.R. 246):

"No doubt the primary consideration, where woodworking machinery is concerned, is the protection of the worker at the machine. The very fact that he works at the machine exposes him to particular risks. One would, therefore, expect, as the fact is, that the regulations would everywhere provide for securing as high a degree of safety for him as practicable. But it does not necessarily follow that the regulations must, therefore, be construed as only for the protection of the workers at the machines, and not for the benefit and protection of other workers in the factory as well."

He was there proceeding on the basis that, a fortiori, if the man at the particular machine had been hit by a piece of a flying cutter he would have been able to recover. I do not read the speeches in the House of Lords in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (4) as negating the correctness of HILBERY, J.'s decision, and, as SINGLETON, L.J., has pointed out, although the case is referred to in some of the speeches in the House of Lords, doubt is not cast on it. In Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (4) it was held that the requirement in s. 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, that every part of transmission machinery shall be securely fenced, imposes on occupiers of factories a duty to erect a barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machinery, but does not in ordinary cases oblige them to erect an inclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying out and injuring him. But it seems to me that, when considering that case, and the light which it throws on the construction of reg. 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, it is important to bear in mind that included in the words of s. 13 (1) are the words

"... unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced"; and it seems to me that that consideration had weighed with their Lordships in reaching their decision. LORD PORTER, for example, said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 389):

"For my own part, I find it difficult to envisage any set of circumstances in which unfenced machinery would be safe owing to its position, or, indeed, construction, if the risk of breakage is to be taken into consideration."

In reg. 17 there are no words comparable to those found in s. 13 (1), and also found in s. 12 (3) and s. 14 (1) of the Act. I do not read reg. 17 as being limited. It provides that the cutter shall, when practicable, be provided with the most efficient guard, having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed. It seems to me that the proof is overwhelming that, amongst the varieties of danger that relate to cutters, are the dangers that are involved if anyone comes in contact with the cutter and also the dangers which are involved in working near a cutter which may, owing to the centrifugal force of the vertical spindle moulding machine, on occasion become detached and may hurt someone working at the machine or at a neighbouring machine. The pamphlet issued by the Ministry of Labour says (p. 13):

“From time to time accidents occur as a result of cutters flying; such accidents are generally severe and are sometimes fatal.”

A I think in this connection it is relevant to have in mind that the law reports have now included for some years the decision of HILBERY, J., which arose out of a case where a flying cutter did harm to someone at a neighbouring machine. I consider, therefore, that reg. 17 is not to be read in a limited way, and that it has to be considered here whether there was the most efficient guard for this cutter, and in considering that question I think it is relevant to have in
B mind one answer given by the witness, Mr. Sullivan, when he was asked this by counsel for the plaintiff:

“I hope this is not too obvious: Would the Shaw type of guard prevent part of the cutter from being ejected from the machine? A.—No.”

C It was said that the Shaw guard was in position, and that the fact that that guard was in position would provide some protection against a flying cutter or against a flying nut or bolt. The answer made by counsel for the plaintiff to that submission seems to me very powerful, for he said that it was small comfort to the plaintiff who was at this machine when it had a Shaw guard on, and who had the best reason for knowing that the Shaw guard did not prevent a flying nut or part of a bolt from striking him. The question, in my view,
D therefore, is whether there was in this case the most efficient guard. We have not the precise facts which were before HILBERY, J., in the case which he tried, but the report says ([1946] 1 All E.R. 246):

“It was proved that there was a known form of cage guard which would have fenced the major part of the circumference of a circle round the vertical spindle with a wire-mesh screen, and that the work in hand could
E have been performed with that guard in position. Such a guard is in fact the subject of an illustration in the Safety Pamphlet No. 8, issued by the Home Office.”

It seems to me that there was no real protection here in regard to the upper part of the machine, and no real or valid protection provided, or attempted
F to be provided, against the risk of a flying cutter or a flying nut, and I am in agreement with the way in which the facts have been dealt with by SINGLETON, L.J. I concur, therefore, in the view that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

BOURNEMOUTH AND EAST DORSET HOSPITAL
MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 28, 1953.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Gift of residue—"To the trustees for the time being" of the hospital "and by them to be appropriated for or towards the building funds" of the hospital—Vesting of hospital and endowment funds in Minister of Health after date of will, but before death of testatrix—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6, s. 7 (4).

By her will, dated Feb. 1, 1945, the testatrix, who died on June 27, 1951, directed her executor and trustee to stand possessed of her residuary estate on trust to pay the same "to the trustees for the time being of the Cornelia and East Dorset Hospital and by them to be appropriated for or towards the building funds of the said hospital." On July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6 and s. 7 (4), the hospital and its endowments, including the building fund then in existence, vested in the Minister of Health. From that date the hospital was administered by the Bournemouth and East Dorset Hospital Management Committee, and there were no longer any trustees.

Held: the gift was a charitable gift for a genuine and ordinary purpose of a charitable organisation which previously existed; notwithstanding that it was for a particular purpose, and not for the general purposes, of the hospital, it did not fail by reason of the changes introduced by the Act of 1946; and the residue was to be handed over to the hospital management committee on their undertaking to use the gift for building fund purposes in connection with the particular hospital.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Susan Little, the gift thereby made of her residuary estate on trust "to pay the same to the trustees for the time being of the Cornelia and East Dorset Hospital and by them to be appropriated for or towards the building funds of the said hospital" took effect as a bequest to the first defendants, the Bournemouth and East Dorset Hospital Management Committee, subject to any, and, if so, what, undertakings by them as to its application, or whether the residuary estate was applicable on charitable trusts or was undisposed of by the will.

The testatrix made her will on Feb. 1, 1945, and died on June 27, 1951. On July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6 and s. 7 (4), the hospital and its endowments, including the building fund then in existence, vested in the Minister of Health. The former trustees, who were not an incorporated body, were considered to have been relieved of their trust on that day by the effect of the Act, and a scheme was approved under s. 11 (3) of the Act under which the first defendants, the hospital management committee, were appointed for the purpose of exercising functions with respect to the management and control of the hospital, which was now known as the Poole General Hospital.

VAISEY, J.: The testatrix, Miss Susan Little, made her will on Feb. 1, 1945, and on Nov. 2, 1948, she made a codicil to the will whereby she brought her testamentary intentions up to date, but did not in terms confirm the will. B Between the date of the will and the date of the codicil, namely, on July 5, 1948, the National Health Service Act, 1946, came into effect. The testatrix died on June 27, 1951, and her will was proved on Sept. 21, 1951. By the will she appointed the plaintiff bank her executor and trustee, and she gave, among other legacies, £1,000 to the Cornelia and East Dorset Hospital, free of legacy duty, to endow a bed in her name in perpetuity in the women's medical ward C of the hospital. That legacy was paid over to the first defendants, the Bournemouth and East Dorset Hospital Management Committee, by whom the hospital is now administered under the Act of 1946, and they gave an undertaking to associate the name of the testatrix with a bed in the women's medical ward of the hospital. The testatrix gave her residuary estate to the bank on the usual trusts for sale and conversion and directed that, after the payment of D her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies bequeathed by the will, the bank should stand possessed of the ultimate residue

"Upon trust to pay the same to the trustees for the time being of the Cornelia and East Dorset Hospital and by them to be appropriated for or towards the building funds of the said hospital."

E As the hospital vested in the Minister of Health on July 5, 1948, there were no trustees or acting trustees of the hospital at the time of the testatrix's death, and the endowments of the hospital, including the building fund then in existence, were transferred, under s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1946, to the Minister of Health.

F The question which has been raised is: Does the gift of residue to the trustees of the hospital for the building funds of the hospital go to the first defendants, the hospital management committee, as, undoubtedly, it would have done if the testatrix had directed that the gift should be applied to the general purposes of the hospital, or does the fact that she has given the gift, not only to a particular hospital, but to a particular purpose of a particular hospital, make any difference? On the whole, I do not think that it does make any difference. Counsel for the G Attorney-General pointed out that this is a charitable gift, and it is no less charitable now than it was before the vesting date under the National Health Service Act, 1946. It is a gift, not for the general purposes of an independent charity, which previously existed, but for a genuine and ordinary purpose of a charitable organisation which previously existed, and I think that I should be introducing differences where there is no difference in principle if I held that the gift failed H because of the admitted fundamental change of circumstances and conditions introduced by the Act of 1946. As the gift is to trustees who no longer exist and is to be appropriated for or towards funds which do not exist, it is obvious that the form of the gift has been transformed by the Act if one allows it to go to the hospital management committee, and I think that one has to move carefully before assuming that the testatrix's directions go for nothing and that the overriding charitable intention prevails. Having regard, however, to the effect which the Act has had on trusts of this kind, and, in particular, to the fact that, under s. 7 (4), all the funds of individual hospitals were transferred to the Minister of Health, or to the appropriate hospital management committee, on July 5, 1948, free of any trust existing immediately before that day, it does not seem to me that one is taking any further step if one allows this gift, although it is for a particular purpose, to be taken over and used for the purposes and under the authority of the Act. Counsel for the next of kin contended that the gift failed by reason of the change in circumstances which has arisen, but I think that Re Morgan's Will Trusts (1) and Re Glass (2) govern this case, and I cannot see any sound reason for distinguishing it from them.

As a rule, the direction is, as I understand it, to pay the fund given to a particular hospital over to the appropriate hospital committee on an undertaking (which, I believe, is now common form) to use that fund for the benefit of the named object. I think in this case I should desire to go a little further, and, the Attorney-General not objecting, I should direct that the testatrix's residue should be handed over to the Bournemouth and East Dorset Hospital Management Committee on their undertaking to use the fund for building fund purposes in connection with the Cornelia and East Dorset Hospital.

Order accordingly.

SWAN v. SWAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), July 13, 14, 15, 30, 1953.]

Divorce—Cruelty—Defence—Insanity—Husband unable to understand nature and quality of his acts.

Divorce—Condonation—Condonation of acts of insane person.

For several periods during the married life the husband had been a voluntary patient in a mental hospital. During the intervals in which he had returned to the matrimonial home he had committed acts of cruelty towards his wife. On the hearing of the wife's petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty there was medical evidence which was accepted by the court that at the material times the husband did not know the nature and quality of his acts.

HELD: in these circumstances the husband was not capable of being guilty of cruelty to the wife.

Quaere, whether the husband could be found to be guilty of cruelty if, while knowing the nature and quality of his acts, by reason of disease of the mind he did not know they were wrong.

Per HODSON, L.J. (with regard to condonation of cruelty committed by a person suffering from disease of the mind): I feel that the conception of forgiveness, which is always a necessary element in condonation, difficult, if not impossible, where the object of the forgiveness is not capable of receiving it by reason of the fact that he is out of his mind.

APPEAL by the wife from an order of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, Q.C., dated Apr. 24, 1953, dismissing her petition for a decree of dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. The following judgments were read.

HODSON, L.J.: This appeal is against an order of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, Q.C., dismissing a petition presented by the wife on the ground of the cruelty of the husband. The husband, by the Official Solicitor, his guardian ad litem, denied the cruelty, and further said that, if he had been guilty of any uncondoned act of cruelty, he did not know the nature or the quality of the act and did not know the act was wrong and was not responsible for the act. The learned commissioner found that the husband had been guilty of cruelty up to and including August, 1947, but that such cruelty was condoned. He further found that later acts of violence inflicted on the wife and threats used by the husband against her took place at a time when the husband had proved that he did not know the nature of the acts and did not know they were wrong. Accordingly, he found that the cruelty proved had not been revived since the later acts and threats did not amount to cruelty in law, and dismissed the petition.

The case was conducted on the footing that no question arises as to the responsibility of the husband for his acts prior to and including August, 1947, and, although the history of the husband, as disclosed by the evidence, shows marked mental instability over a long period of his life, the evidence relied upon on his behalf is concentrated on the period beginning in August, 1949. During this period alone it was alleged and proved that he did not know the nature of his acts and did not know whether they were right or wrong. On Aug. 6, 1927, before the marriage, the husband had been certified and he was detained until Jan. 28, 1928, in a mental institution. The parties were married on Apr. 12, 1935. A son was born in 1936 and a daughter in 1940. In 1941 the wife for the first time learned that the husband had had either a nervous breakdown or something of the sort before marriage. Between Jan. 21 and Mar. 9, 1941, the husband was a voluntary patient at St. Ebba's Hospital.

He was then at home with the wife until July, 1943, when he was suffering from tuberculosis. From that time until April, 1944, he was at a Bournemouth sanatorium. Between April, 1944, and August, 1947, he was at home when he again entered a tuberculosis hospital, this time at Headington, where he remained until some time in August, 1949. He then returned home where he remained until Sept. 20, 1949, when he was taken to the mental institution at Littlemore. On Oct. 6 he became a voluntary patient there until Nov. 10, when he discharged himself as recovered and went back to the tuberculosis hospital at Headington for further treatment. While at Headington he was visited by the wife on occasions and on Dec. 6, 1949, he returned as a voluntary patient to Littlemore where he has since remained. A

Cruelty having been proved down to August, 1947, the first question is whether or not the cruelty was condoned. The violence of the husband continued until he went into hospital in August, 1947, when the wife called in medical aid, and I do not think it could be said that such cruelty was condoned up to that time. Everything, therefore, turns on the circumstances which existed during the short period from August, 1949, until Sept. 20, 1949, when the parties were together for the last time. This period was very short. There was no sexual intercourse; this had ceased many years before. The husband was ill and in common humanity it was natural and reasonable for the wife to take him in. She and the children had nowhere else to go. She said in evidence: B C

"In August, 1949, he came home unexpectedly. I think he was discharged rather quickly. He was in a very bad state. He was very violent and very hopeless to live with." D

She then described how he dug a hole in the garden to bury her in and said he was going to strip her and beat her through the village if she did not make him tea at one o'clock in the morning. Thereupon, she said she telephoned for the doctor who came and saw the husband. Admittedly, the wife did all she could for the husband during this period. She had welcomed him home as her husband although she was apprehensive of him, but I cannot see how her conduct in relation to this particular man, who did not know what he was doing, can be taken to be condonation. The element of forgiveness, albeit conditional forgiveness, is always present in condonation. VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (1), taking a case where a wife had been guilty of a matrimonial offence, said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 45): E

"The essence of the matter is . . . that the husband with knowledge of the wife's offence should forgive her and should confirm his forgiveness by reinstating her as his wife." F

I feel the conception of forgiveness difficult, if not impossible, where the object of the forgiveness is not capable of receiving it by reason of the fact that he is out of his mind. I would, therefore, hold that the cruelty up to August, 1947, had not been condoned. G

The learned commissioner, having decided that this cruelty had been condoned, was bound to consider the allegations of cruelty during the period beginning at some date in August, 1949, and ending on Sept. 20, when the husband was taken away for the last time, first to be kept under observation and later as a voluntary patient at Littlemore, where, apart from a short period in a hospital for tuberculosis at Headington, he has been ever since. During this period the husband was violent and behaved in a manner which can fairly be characterised as insane. I have already given some examples of his conduct. In addition, he threatened the wife with a razor blade under a delusion that there was an Indian outside the house who was in some way being encouraged by the wife. When he was at Littlemore he came under the care of Dr. Armstrong, physician H superintendent of the hospital, who gave evidence that the husband was suffering from a schizophrenic illness of a paranoid type. He stated that, in his opinion, from the beginning of August it was probable that he did not know the nature of his acts and during the same period he would not have known whether they were right or wrong. In cross-examination, speaking of November, 1949, when he took his discharge, Dr. Armstrong said:

A "I do not think any man whose mind is biased by the sort of ideas that were in his mind at that time is capable entirely of distinguishing between right and wrong."

Dr. Armstrong adhered to this opinion, and, so far as the period when the husband was under the observation of this doctor is concerned, the latter was not contradicted by the expert who, not having seen the husband, was called B to give medical evidence in support of the contention that the husband was responsible for his actions. After his discharge from Littlemore hospital, while he was in the tuberculosis hospital the delusions persisted on the occasions when the wife visited him. He threatened her with a razor blade, hinted at drowning her in a bath of water, and made an attempt to get her into the bathroom, made her sit in a chair, and talked of a man next door having a C gun with a silencer. On Dec. 6 when he returned to Littlemore, he was hearing voices which told him to mutilate his wife with a razor. On this evidence the learned commissioner came to the conclusion, rightly as I think, that from the beginning of August, 1949, up to and including the occasions of the visits paid by the wife to him in November and December, 1949, the husband neither D knew what he was doing nor whether what he was doing was right or wrong. Since the learned commissioner dismissed the petition for this reason and that ground has been challenged, it is, I think, right for this court to express its view on it.

It is to be observed that the learned commissioner found that the husband did not know what he was doing, thus bringing into play the first branch of the so-called M'Naghten rules. Apart from authority, I should have thought E it was a contradiction in terms to describe as cruel the conduct of a person who did not know what he was doing. The word "cruel" carries with it implications of guilt which can no more be imputed to such a person than to a sleep walker. In this connection, I would cite the words of EVERSHED, L.J., in Squire v. Squire (2) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 55):

F "I do not attempt any definition of the words 'cruel' or 'cruelty' save to say that the conduct complained of must at least satisfy the ordinary acceptance of those English words, and that, on well settled authority, it must be such as to have injured, in fact, the complainant's mental or physical health or be such as to cause real apprehension of such injury."

G The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 27, uses the phrase "guilty of cruelty". The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 176 (c) employs the phrase "treated . . . with cruelty", and this language is reproduced in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. The word "guilt" carries with it the sense of wrong-doing, and, as HENN COLLINS, J., pointed out in Astle v. Astle (3) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 971), the word "treated" seems to connote a conscious action. In that case a decree was granted and the statement of law was obiter. H It was to the effect that the rule in M'Naghten's Case (4) applied so that the husband, in resisting a charge of cruelty, must prove that he was labouring under such a defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong. This dictum was consistent with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Hanbury v. Hanbury (5), cited by ASQUITH, L.J., in White v. White (6) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 348). LORD ESHER,

M.R., is reported to have expressed himself to the following effect (8 T.L.R. 560):

"The jury found that the respondent knew what he was doing when he committed the acts, and understood their nature and consequences . . . The jury were perfectly entitled to come to the conclusion they did, and he thought that it was the only sensible conclusion at which they could have arrived. There remained a question of law. Assuming a diseased mind, and that the diseased mind gave him certain impulses—he would not call it an uncontrollable impulse, as he did not know what that meant in such a case as this—the respondent knew what he was doing, and that he was doing wrong. An act of adultery was a culpable act against the wife. He was prepared to lay down as the law of England that whenever a person did an act which was either a criminal or a culpable act, which act, if done by a person with a perfect mind, would make him civilly or criminally responsible to the law, if the disease in the mind of the person doing the act was not so great as to make him unable to understand the nature and consequences of the act which he was doing, that was an act for which he would be civilly or criminally responsible to the law. Consequently, even though the respondent's mind was diseased, he was as responsible to the law as if his mind was not diseased."

LORD ESHER, M.R., however, left open the question whether the converse proposition was correct. He said (ibid.):

"There was a larger question which the President touched upon, but did not decide—namely, whether, even if the respondent's mind had been such that he did not know the nature of what he was doing or that he was doing wrong, the petitioner would or would not be entitled to a divorce."

The question was debated in the Scottish case of M'Lachlan v. M'Lachlan (7). There the cruelty founded on in a suit for separation was the defender's violent and threatening behaviour on an isolated occasion when, in consequence of a seizure, he was temporarily irresponsible. The defender contended that he could not be guilty of cruelty at a time when he was not responsible for his actions. It was argued that guilt required volition and that the court would be legislating if it extended the definition of cruelty so as to include involuntary conduct. LORD MONCRIEFF delivered the leading judgment of the First Division of the court. He stated the argument as follows (1945 S.C. 388):

"Seeing that the remedy is only given by our law on the ground eo nomine of cruelty, it was however courageously maintained by the appellant's counsel as their principal argument that this consequence must be affirmed in every case where the danger against which protection was asked had been occasioned by conduct for which the party charged with cruelty had not been responsible. Cruelty and guilt necessitated, to constitute either of them, both intention and malice; unconscious cruelty was indeed a contradiction in terms; and a man who was insane could thus not be guilty of cruelty."

Having stated the argument LORD MONCRIEFF went on to say (ibid.):

"The proposition is entirely logical and, as regards certifiable insanity, may be affirmed without hesitation or difficulty."

He then went on to point out that in such a case a spouse had another remedy, but refused to accept the argument in the case in question where no such remedy existed. Regarding a decree of separation as the exact obverse of a decree of adherence, he declined to accept the proposition, regarding it as intolerable to do so where certification was not available as a remedy. This view, deliberately discarding logic, lays emphasis on the protective element in a decree of separation. In the Court of Appeal in White v. White (6), where the majority of the court decided the case against a respondent who was accused of cruelty on the ground that he knew the nature and quality of his acts, DENNING, L.J., took his stand on this very ground, saying ([1949] 2 All E.R. 351):

A " . . . it seems to me that, in divorce cases, if such a man has treated his wife with cruelty, she will be entitled to maintenance, judicial separation, or a divorce, because there again it is not a question of punishing him but only of giving her relief from a situation which has been rendered intolerable by his conduct. The presence of mental disease makes this relief more, and not less, necessary."

B He cited (ibid., 352) the observations of LORD STOWELL in Kirkman v. Kirkman (8) (1 Hag. Con. 410) where he said that in cruelty cases if safety is endangered by violent and disorderly affections of the mind, it is the same in its effects as if it proceeded from mere malignity alone. DENNING, L.J., continued ([1949] 2 All E.R. 352):

" . . . on the strength of his authority I say that a violent and disorderly affection of the mind, i.e., insanity, is of itself no answer to a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty."

C This judgment was not adopted by the other members of the court and ASQUITH, L.J., gave powerful reasons for taking a contrary view. It was, however, followed by PEARCE, J., in Lissack v. Lissack (9).

D For my part, with all respect to those who think otherwise, I think that LORD STOWELL was far from saying that insanity in the sense covered by the M'Naghten rules will not relieve a person from legal responsibility for his acts in a suit founded on cruelty. Indeed, it can be said that all cruelty derives from violent and disorderly affection of the mind. LORD STOWELL's phrase was considered by the Judge Ordinary (SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL) in Hall v. Hall (10) where he said (3 Sw. & Tr. 349):

E "With danger to the wife in view, the court does not hold its hand to inquire into motives and causes. The sources of the husband's conduct are, for the most part, immaterial. Thus, I have no doubt that cruelty does not cease to be a cause of suit if it proceeded from 'violent and disorderly affections' as said in one case, or from 'violence of disposition, want of moral control, or eccentricity', as said in another, or 'from a liability to become excited in controversy', in the language of a third; but madness, dementia, positive disease of the mind, this is quite another matter."

F This passage was cited as authoritative by TUCKER, L.J., in Squire v. Squire (2), to which I have already referred, and EVERSLED, L.J., in the same case used these words ([1948] 2 All E.R. 56):

G "If it be conceded, as, in my view, it must, that, in such a case as the present, proof of malevolent design is unnecessary, all, or almost all, acts of cruelty, not, in fact, malevolent, must proceed from some sickness or disorder of the mind, though in many cases falling short of insanity."

H I respectfully agree with these observations and suggest that LORD STOWELL's dictum in Kirkman v. Kirkman (8) does not lend support to the view that insanity can be no defence to a charge of cruelty. Moreover, I can find nothing in the old authorities to justify the proposition that a decree based on cruelty is a remedy given, not for a wrong inflicted, but solely as a protection for the victim, as PEARCE, J., appears to have thought.

In Hall v. Hall (10) SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL said (3 Sw. & Tr. 349) that, although the object of the court's interference was safety for the future, its sentence carried with it retribution for the past. The charge of SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., to the jury in Hanbury v. Hanbury (5), is often quoted in support of the "protection" view. He, however, used language which, although laying emphasis on protection, did not exclude the attribute of remedy for wrongdoing. He said ([1892] P. 224):

"I conceive that the object of the Divorce Act is not so much, or nearly so much, the punishment or retribution for a marital offence as the protection of the party who is in peril."

I think, therefore, that PEARCE, J., went too far when he stated in Lissack v. Lissack (9) ([1950] 2 All E.R. 237):

"Since in petitions based on cruelty the duty of the court to interfere is intended, not to punish the husband for the past, but to protect the wife for the future, the question for the court is whether the wife can with safety to life and health live with the husband now."

In so far, therefore, as PEARCE, J., based himself on the proposition that, insanity could not be a defence to a petition based on cruelty, I am of opinion that Lissack v. Lissack (9) was wrongly decided.

To treat cruelty in the light only of need for protection would be to take it out of the realm of matrimonial offences altogether, which is not, to my mind, consistent with the language of the legislature nor with the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts which have laid the foundations of the law on this topic. Moreover, I confess that to me it seems that over emphasis on the need for protection of the victim tends to lose sight of realities. No effective protection is, in fact, provided by decree of the court from the violence of an insane spouse. The petitioner can only be protected in the same way as other members of the public, by the incarceration of the insane partner. If the insane spouse is not certifiable and cannot be incarcerated, it may well be that it is not only the other spouse who is in need of protection. If the respondent in M'Lachlan v. M'Lachlan (7) had been unmarried and looked after by a sister or a nurse the danger would have been the same. At least, where the insane person is unaware of the nature and quality of his acts—in other words, does not know what he is doing—I think it is not open to the courts to pronounce a decree of divorce or judicial separation on the ground of the cruelty of that person. If the violence of such a person is to be the ground of such a decree it is for the legislature so to provide. There are already grounds for divorce such as insanity (with certain limitations) and presumption of death which are outside the sphere of remedies for a wrong done by one spouse to another, but I cannot think that the courts can properly, by an extended interpretation of the phrase "treated with cruelty", add another ground to this class. The second limb of the M'Naghten rules does not, therefore, arise in this case and would, perhaps, arise but seldom. In White v. White (6) ASQUITH, L.J., thought it would be appropriate to apply it to a cruelty case where a person knew the nature of his acts, but, by reason of disease of mind, did not know they were wrong. SOMERVELL, L.J., and JENKINS, L.J., doubt whether this second limb applies to cruelty cases, having regard to the decisions in Squire v. Squire (2) and Kaslefsky v. Kaslefsky (11). It is not necessary to express a final opinion on this point, but I myself would incline to the opinion expressed by ASQUITH, L.J. The two branches of the rule have hitherto always been treated together and I am not satisfied that in civil as opposed to criminal matters they can properly be treated in isolation from one another.

In my opinion, therefore, the learned commissioner was right in refusing to make a finding of cruelty against the husband in respect of the acts done by him in 1949 and I would allow the appeal on the ground that there was no condonation of the earlier cruelty.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The first point raised before the commissioner was whether the fact that the husband did not know the nature of his acts constituted a defence. Whether, in other words, to establish treatment with cruelty it is necessary that the nature of the acts should be known. Both sides relied on Squire v. Squire (2). That case decided that there could be a treating with cruelty within the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 176 (c) although there was no intention to harm or hurt. On the other hand, reliance was placed in the judgments on the fact that the respondent knew perfectly well the nature of what she was doing. TUCKER, L.J., there quoted with approval ([1948] 2 All E.R. 53) the passage from Hall v. Hall (10) (3 Sw. & Tr. 349) which HODSON,

- A L.J., has already read. In a later passage on the same page he clearly distinguished from the case with which he was dealing a case in which the respondent did not know the nature and quality of the acts committed by her and relied on as cruelty. EVERSHED, L.J., at the outset of his judgment emphasised that the respondent remained at all material times responsible for her actions. In Kaslefsky v. Kaslefsky (11) the principle laid down in Squire v. Squire (2) was considered, and it was held that the conduct complained of must be aimed at or actually physically directed at the petitioner or done with intent to injure him or to inflict misery on him. BUCKNILL, L.J., in his judgment, emphasised the importance of the word "treated" in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 176 (c) which deals with this matter. In White v. White (6), although it was unnecessary to decide the point which we have to decide, observations were made on it both by ASQUITH and DENNING, L.JJ. C ASQUITH, L.J., referred to the earlier cases in which the problem was referred to, and he inclined to the view that, if the respondent did not know what he was doing or did not know it was wrong, this would be a defence. DENNING, L.J., took the opposite view, at any rate in certain circumstances. He thought it would make a difference if the petitioner realised that the respondent was of D unsound mind. He said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 352):

"I can well understand that a point might be reached when the conduct was so irrational that it was obvious to the injured party that the conduct was not cruelty, but was due to mental disease."

- E I do not wish to base too much on the precise wording of this sentence, but its wording seems to assume that conduct due to mental disease cannot be cruelty.

- The question came before the Court of Session in M'Lachlan v. M'Lachlan (7), where the acts complained of were done in an epileptic seizure. LORD MONCRIEFF admitted the logic of the proposition that unconscious cruelty is a contradiction in terms, and affirmed that proposition with regard to certifiable insanity. Where, however, the condition is not certifiable, the wife—so the argument runs—needs protection, and the logic, or as I would respectfully put it, the ordinary meaning of the words used in s. 176 (c) of the Act of 1925, must give way. In the present case the husband may have been certifiable. F The meaning of s. 176 (c) of the Act of 1925 cannot depend on whether the husband is certified or is a voluntary patient. I have come myself to a clear conclusion that if a respondent does not know the nature of the acts they cannot be relied on as establishing a "treating with cruelty". I agree that G Lissack v. Lissack (9) was wrong so far as it decided that insanity could not be a defence.

- In the observations in White v. White (6) it was assumed that the relevant test in a case of this kind was that applied in criminal cases and referred to as the M'Naghten rules. Applying Squire's case (2) and Kaslefsky's case (11), H I doubt whether this is right. I would have thought that, if the husband knew the nature of his acts, it would be no defence for him to say that he did not know they were wrong: Squire v. Squire (2). On the other hand, it might be a defence if it could be established that he did not know they were directed against the wife. It may be difficult to think of circumstances in which a man would know the nature of his acts, but would not know against whom they were aimed.

The wife, therefore, being unable to rely, in my opinion, on the acts in 1949 has an alternative in the acts prior to 1947. The learned commissioner found that they had been condoned, and that is the only defence suggested. The first question is whether they were condoned prior to the husband's departure for hospital in 1947. I do not think they were. Sexual intercourse had ceased between these parties in 1941. Notwithstanding this, the wife might de die in diem condone acts of cruelty, and it is not, of course, a case in which she left the home. When, however, one considers the evidence as to the circumstances in which the husband went to hospital, I am of the opinion that she had not condoned the acts complained of. The material answers are as follows:

"Q.—Take the month of August, 1947. In other words, the last, shall we say, few weeks before he went to the Osler Pavilion. If you can, throw your mind back to that for one moment. Were there any acts of violence during that period? A.—I believe so. I believe I wrote to the doctor and told him about my husband's behaviour and asked him if he could help me. He said he would take him into the Osler Pavilion. Q.—Can you tell my Lord when your husband went to the Osler Pavilion (I understand it to be in August, 1947), when was the last act of violence—how long before he went—that you complain of? A.—My husband was frequently violent. I cannot fix a date at all, except I knew I could not carry on as things were going. Q.—I appreciate that; but I wonder whether you could help my Lord as to how long before he went into the Osler Pavilion was the last act of violence? Was it one month, one week? A.—One week, perhaps. I cannot put it nearer than that. Q.—Try if you can. Consider the time from the last act of violence up to the time that he went to the Osler Pavilion. Were you then living a comparatively normal married life together during those last few days? A.—I believe so, yes. Q.—Were you looking after him like a wife would? A.—Yes. My husband was an invalid; I always looked after him. Q.—Can you give my Lord some idea—remembering that it was some time in August, 1947, that your husband went away to the Osler Pavilion? A.—It was probably just before that, because I was so afraid—getting so afraid of my husband—I was at my wits' end to know what to do. I wrote to the doctor. Q.—When you say 'just before that'—by 'that', do you mean about a week? A.—A day or two, I think. A week, may be. A day or two, probably. Q.—A week, may be; a day or two, probably. A.—Yes."

The next question is whether she condoned what had happened before 1947 by taking him back in August, 1949. According to her evidence, which was not challenged on this point, he came home unexpectedly, he was in a very bad state, he was very violent, and was very hopeless to live with. She then goes on to describe the distressing acts which he performed, which, as I have said, would have been cruelty if he had known what he was doing. She was, in fact, a trained nurse, although my decision is not affected by this fact. Condonation is defined as the re-instatement in his or her former marital position of the spouse who has committed a matrimonial wrong with the intention of forgiving and remitting on condition that the spouse whose wrong is so condoned does not henceforward commit any further matrimonial offence: see RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 6th ed., p. 177. It would, of course, be absurd to suggest that the mere fact that she took him in when he was unexpectedly discharged amounted to condonation. Very shortly after that he started the acts complained of. She summoned the doctor and ultimately got a friend in the village to telephone and he was removed. Having cited the definition, I think it is unnecessary to elaborate the reasons which lead me to the conclusion that there was no condonation by reason of what happened in 1949. In those circumstances, I think the wife is entitled to a decree and that the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree, and only desire to add, with respect to insanity as a defence to a charge of cruelty, that in the present case the medical evidence accepted by the learned commissioner was, as I understand it, to the effect that the husband, during the final period, not merely did not know that what he was doing was wrong, but did not even know the nature and quality of his acts, or, in other words, did not know what he was doing. I am satisfied that for the reasons given by my Lords a man who does not know what he is doing cannot be held to be guilty of cruelty to his wife or to treat his wife with cruelty. But I am not satisfied that the position is necessarily the same if a man's state of mind is such that while he does know what he is doing he does not know that what he is doing is wrong, and I would prefer to reserve that question for further consideration in a case in which it is necessary to the decision.

PERRINS v. DRAPER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), July 23, 1953.]

Rates—Agricultural buildings—Use “solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon”—Dairy—Treatment of milk from neighbouring farm—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 44), s. 2 (2).

D

The ratepayer occupied sixty-four acres of agricultural land from which he produced fifty gallons of milk a day. In 1950 he built on that land a dairy in which he cooled, pasteurised, and bottled those fifty gallons together with two hundred gallons which he acquired each day from his brother's adjoining farm. The question for the decision of the court was whether the dairy was an agricultural building within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2), which provides: “ ‘Agricultural buildings’ means buildings (other than dwelling-houses) occupied together with agricultural land . . . and . . . used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon ”.

E

HELD: the production of milk and not the more limited operation of cooling, pasteurising and bottling, was the “agricultural operation” in question; since, of the total production of two hundred and fifty gallons, only about one-fifth was produced on the ratepayer's land, the dairy was not used “solely in connection with agricultural operations” on his land; and, therefore, the dairy was not an agricultural building within the meaning of the sub-section.

H

CASE STATED by the Lands Tribunal.

The local valuation court for Dorset determined that the assessment relating to a hereditament comprising an agricultural dwelling-house, dairy, and premises situate at Stourpaine, in the county of Dorset, be altered from gross value £50 and rateable value £40 to gross value £20 and rateable value £12 on the ground that the dairy was an agricultural building within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2), and was not rateable. The valuation officer appealed against that decision to the Lands Tribunal.

It was proved before the tribunal that the hereditament, the subject of the appeal, comprised sixty-four acres of agricultural land together with a dwelling-house and outbuilding and a detached dairy; that the hereditament was formerly part of Havelins Farm which had an area of about three hundred and sixty-four acres, and had been occupied by the ratepayer's father who produced milk thereon which he retailed locally; that, in 1937, Havelins Farm was divided between the ratepayer and his brother, the ratepayer taking over the retail milk business and the sixty-four acres of land, the subject of the appeal; that, in 1950, the ratepayer built a dairy in which he cooled and bottled all the milk sold through his retail business, and pasteurised some of it; that the ratepayer produced about fifty gallons of milk per day on the hereditament in question and also bought from his brother about two hundred gallons per day produced on Havelins Farm, and in times of shortage he purchased milk in bulk from United Dairies, Ltd., to make up his daily delivery; that the dairy building was occupied together with the agricultural land comprising the hereditaments; that the sole use of the building was the cooling, pasteurising and bottling of milk; that the use of the building for milk purchased from sources other than Havelins Farm was occasional only and for brief periods.

For the valuation officer it was contended that on the facts as found the dairy building was rateable in that it was not an agricultural building within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1928, since it was not used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land occupied therewith, but also, and to a greater extent, in connection with agricultural operations on other land.

For the ratepayer it was contended that the dairy building was not rateable in that it was an agricultural building, since it was occupied together with agricultural land and the use to which it was solely put consisted of agricultural operations thereon, and that such use and operations were not connected with agricultural or any operations on any other hereditament. The parties agreed that, if the valuation officer's contention was correct, the assessment should be gross value £50, rateable value £40, but, if the ratepayer's contention was correct the figure should be £20 and £12 respectively.

The tribunal came to the conclusion that the building was used solely for an agricultural purpose, but that that use was in connection, not only with the associated hereditament, but also, and to a greater extent, with another hereditament altogether, viz., Havelins Farm. In the opinion of the tribunal, the decision rested on the construction of the words "used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon" in the definition of agricultural buildings in s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1928, and, subject to the de minimis rule, these words must be interpreted as meaning on the agricultural land occupied with the building in question and on that land alone. They further concluded that the de minimis rule could not apply seeing that some seventy-five per cent. of the milk treated in the building was produced elsewhere than on the agricultural land occupied by the ratepayer. Accordingly, the tribunal allowed the appeal and ordered that the assessment be restored to gross value £50 and rateable value £40. The ratepayer appealed.

Huntley for the ratepayer.

Maurice Lyell for the valuation officer.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: The sole question in the appeal is whether this dairy is an "agricultural building" within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2), which provides:

" 'Agricultural buildings' means buildings (other than dwelling-houses) occupied together with agricultural land . . . and . . . used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon."

It seems to me that so far as is relevant that definition is plain in its terms and meaning. The word "thereon" at the end of the definition must mean the agricultural land together with which the building is occupied, and the only question, therefore, is whether this dairy is being used solely in connection with some agricultural operations on the land with which the building is occupied. It is not, of course, open to doubt that maintaining a herd of dairy cattle is an agricultural operation, and it is, therefore, plain that, if this dairy were used exclusively for cooling, etc., the milk which the ratepayer produced on his sixty-four acres of land, it would be properly described as being used solely in connection with the agricultural operations on that land. In truth and in fact, as it seems to me, this building is used in connection with the agricultural operation of the production of milk, but that operation is not confined to the land occupied with the building: the milk produced is produced only as to about one-fifth on that land and as to the rest on the ratepayer's brother's land. If, therefore, I am right in saying that the production of milk is the "agricultural operation" in question, then, the milk produced not being exclusively produced on the ratepayer's land, it seems to me plainly to follow that the building is not an "agricultural building" within the definition.

It was, however, said by counsel for the ratepayer that the true agricultural operation which is here in question is not that of milk production but the more limited operation of cooling, pasteurising and bottling milk. If that is the agricultural operation, then it seems to me that it is exclusively carried on in the building and not at all on the adjoining land; alternatively, it is an operation connected with milk which is certainly not produced exclusively on the land occupied by the ratepayer. In my judgment, however, the true agricultural operation here in question is that of the production of milk, not that merely of cooling. The case, therefore, seems to me to be distinct from Thompson v. Milk Marketing Board (1), and, save for the language of SOMERVELL, L.J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 346) which supports the view I have taken of the meaning of the word "thereon" in the definition, that case does not, I think, assist in the solution of the present one. The question there related to a building which was part of a cattle breeding centre established by the Milk Marketing Board and used for the extraction of semen from bulls for the artificial insemination of cows. The agricultural land together with which the building in question was occupied was limited to some twenty-nine acres, on which the bulls were grazed and otherwise maintained. The semen, having been extracted from the bulls, was used for the purpose of the insemination of cows not brought on or kept on the twenty-nine acres but maintained on other farm lands in no sense occupied with the building in question—occupied, in fact, by farmers all round the neighbourhood. The argument for the valuation officer was that one could not treat the operation which consisted of and ended with the extraction of the semen as being a complete agricultural operation: the total operation was the insemination of the cows and that operation was not carried out on the land in question. This court, however, held that the keeping of these bulls and the extraction of the semen from them was an agricultural operation distinct in itself and that it did not matter that the product of that operation was not something sold in the market but was something which was thereafter used by way of service elsewhere. I have said that I find nothing in that case which can really assist in the problem now presented to us, and, for the reasons which I have given, it seems to me that the conclusion stated by the Lands Tribunal was correct. This appeal fails and must be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also agree. I think that the question in this case may be posed as follows: Is the dairy building which is occupied together with sixty-four acres of agricultural land used solely in connection with agricultural operations on that sixty-four acres of agricultural land? In my judgment, the answer to that question must be "No", for the reason that the dairy building is considerably used in connection with agricultural operations on other land—that is to say, on the adjoining three hundred acres.

Appeal dismissed.

LEVESLEY v. THOMAS FIRTH & JOHN BROWN, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.J.J.), July 17, 20, 1953.]

Factory—Safe means of access—Maintenance—Temporary obstruction—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 26 (1).

Inside a shop in a factory occupied by the defendants a space fifteen feet, three inches, wide was marked out with white lines on either side as a way along which employees might pass to and from their work. Returning from the factory canteen to work in another shop, the plaintiff, an employee at the factory, found the way partly blocked by a lorry. Passing the lorry, he tripped over a piece of steel packing, used to place heavy machinery on when it was being loaded, which was about two inches high and projected three or four inches into the marked way, and he fell and was injured.

HELD: in view of the transient and exceptional character of the obstruction caused by the steel packing, the defendants had not failed to maintain the safe means of access to work which they had provided, and, therefore, they were not liable for breach of their statutory duty to maintain such access (as defined in s. 152 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937) under s. 26 (1) of that Act.

APPEAL by the defendants against an order of CASSELS, J., dated Mar. 3, 1953, awarding the plaintiff £1,095 10s. 7d. damages against the defendants, the occupiers of a factory at which he was employed, in an action in which he claimed damages for negligence and breach of the statutory duty of the defendants under s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, to maintain a safe means of access to the place at which he had to work, there being an obstruction in the way caused by a piece of steel packing which extended three or four inches into it. CASSELS, J., held that the defendants were not guilty of negligence at common law, but were in breach of their statutory duty under the section.

Nelson, Q.C., and D. H. Robson for the defendants.

Elwyn Jones, Q.C., and Castle-Miller for the plaintiff.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This appeal must be allowed. The plaintiff, Mr. Charles Albert Levesley, worked for the defendants, Thomas Firth & John Brown, Ltd., as an engineer's turner. He was an experienced man, some fifty-years of age. He met with a most unfortunate accident and broke his leg.

"... J., decided that he was entitled to damages, and he gave judgment occupied £1,095 10s. 7d. Against that judgment the defendants appeal. connection of the plaintiff was put in two ways. It was said that the defendants It seems to me intelligent in that there was along the route which the plaintiff was taking at the time of the accident an obstruction which had been left there negligently, and it was said further that there was a breach of s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. The learned judge held that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants, but he decided in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the defendants were in breach of their duty under s. 26 (1).

A The plaintiff and another man had decided they would work overtime on the night of May 29, 1951. Accordingly, they left their work about ten minutes to five to go to the canteen for a cup of tea. About five o'clock they were on their way back to work when a buzzer sounded, which was the signal for other people to leave work. The plaintiff worked in O.5 shop, and to get there from the canteen he had to pass through O.1 shop. Through that shop there is a space fifteen feet, three inches, wide, which is normally the way along which people pass to and from their work, and on each side of this space there is a white line.

B Inside the space there is a set of railway lines on which sometimes a truck is brought into the works where heavy engineering work is carried out. Sometimes, also, a lorry comes into the space. According to the evidence of the plaintiff, when he and the other man went to their tea there was no lorry in the space. It was free for them to walk up and down. When they returned at five o'clock a lorry was occupying part, perhaps half, of the space. It was not completely in the middle of the space; it was rather more to one side than the other. Furthermore, the people who had heard the buzzer were hurrying from work in the opposite direction to that in which the plaintiff was going. According to some of the evidence, the lorry had been loaded up by that time, but, if so, people must have worked more speedily than they sometimes do.

C When heavy machinery has to be loaded on a lorry in these works a piece of packing, usually a piece of steel, is often used on which to put the machinery. The packing makes it easier for the people who are doing the loading to get a chain or chains under the object to be loaded. It looks as if that practice had been followed on this occasion.

When the plaintiff was returning through shop O.1 towards shop O.5 he saw the lorry. There was more room on the right-hand side than on the left-hand side of it, but he chose the left-hand side, it may be because there were more people coming in the opposite direction on the right-hand side. As he was passing the lorry he stumbled, fell, and broke his leg. The inference which was drawn afterwards was that he had tripped over a piece of packing which was not far from the lorry and extended over the white line for some three or four inches. CASSELS, J., said in his judgment:

F "It is accepted that this was a means of access for the plaintiff to his work, although he had selected a slightly earlier time in minutes to go and get a cup of tea and to be returning to his work . . . An obstruction like this on the gangway or on the means of access—a thing that does not yield; it is not as if anybody could so easily kick it off—is a considerable obstruction, although it may only be two inches in height, when it is stretched over this white line. It is quite clear that the object of the white lines is to see that the space between the white lines shall be kept clear. If the means of access for workmen getting to and from their work is to be shared with lorries which are being loaded, then it is quite clear that it is up to the defendants to see that the place is clear, so that, if the workmen have to share the gangway with the lorries, they shall have a clear space in which to pass on their way to work or on their way from it."

H I am not sure that is not putting the duty a little too high. The judge continued:

"I think that this was a breach of the statute. I think that it was reasonably practicable for them to have provided that, if these packing pieces were used in the loading of a lorry, when they are finished with them, they should not be left in the gangway. It was unfortunate that an accident like this did happen; and it may be that, if it had not been for the crowd going one way and the plaintiff going in the opposite direction, he would have seen what was on the gangway, but there it was."

To consider this appeal it is necessary to have regard to the words of s. 26 (1):

"There shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work."

The two white lines marked the place down which people went in the ordinary way. Their object was to ensure so far as possible that materials were not put over them to obstruct the way. The means of access for workers was also a means of access for lorries to be loaded. If lorries had to be loaded, from time to time it would occur that some object would be over the white line. So far as is reasonably practicable the defendants must maintain safe means of access. They had provided safe means of access, but it is said they had not maintained safe means of access. On the other side of the lorry there was some five feet of space down which the plaintiff could have passed. The lorry was only there temporarily. In a short time it would have gone. It may be that when the lorry had gone the piece of packing would have been moved back to the proper place, but there was safe means of access, and I find it difficult to see that there was any breach of the statutory duty laid on the defendants.

I recognise that a matter of this kind is very largely a question of fact, and for many reasons I should have liked to have agreed with the judgment of the learned judge, but I have looked again and again at s. 26 (1). My attention was called to what was said in Street v. British Electricity Authority (1) and, on full consideration, I find it impossible to say that in the circumstances of this case there was a breach of the terms of s. 26 (1). I asked learned counsel how an information under this section could be framed, and whether, if one was drawn in the terms of the section, there could be any possible chance on these facts of getting a conviction under this penal section. I do not think that there could be. Those are my reasons for saying that, in my opinion, this appeal should be allowed and judgment should be entered for the defendants, having regard to the findings of the learned judge that there was no negligence on their part.

DENNING, L.J.: The judge said that "it was up to the defendants to see that the place was clear," and, because it was not kept absolutely clear, he held the defendants liable. I can well understand the judge holding as he did, having regard to the state of the authorities at that time. Since his decision, however, we have the advantage of the decision of the House of Lords in Latimer v. A.E.C., Ltd. (2). It is true that that was a decision on s. 25 (1), but it gives an authoritative interpretation of the word "maintained" which is in each section. All previous decisions, not only on s. 25 (1) but also on s. 26 (1), need to be re-considered in the light of that decision. The difference between s. 25 (1) and s. 26 (1) is this. Section 25 (1) deals with specified things, some of which are themselves means of access, such as stairs, passages and gangways, whereas s. 26 (1) deals with unspecified things like scaffolding, staging and so forth, which are erected for the purpose of getting to or at a place of work. Section 25 (1), in regard to its specific means of access, imposes a higher obligation than s. 26 (1). It enacts that they shall be properly maintained, whereas s. 26 (1) only requires that the means provided under it shall be maintained so far as is reasonably practicable.

Section 26 (1) has given rise to some difficulty because of the close collocation of the words "maintain" and "safe". It has often been read as meaning that the occupier must maintain the safety of the access, or, in other words, must keep it safe. It seems to me that since Latimer's case (2) that is no longer a correct reading of the section. The proper interpretation is to read "safe" with "provided" so that the section reads in this way: There shall be provided a safe means of access (such as a scaffolding, staging, or so forth) and, such a means having been provided, it must thereafter be "maintained", i.e., maintained in the way defined in s. 152 (1), viz., maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair. Latimer's case (2) shows that this obligation to "maintain" should not be used so as to put an excessive obligation on the employer: see per LORD PORTER (ante, p. 452) and per LORD REID (ante, p. 454). The obligation is not an absolute obligation to maintain safety, but a relative obligation to maintain efficiently. Once a safe means of access is provided, such as a passage or gangway, the occupier is not responsible for every temporary obstruction (such as a patch of oil or slipperiness) which may, through some accident or mischance, occur in it. If he has an efficient system to keep it clean and free from obstruction, that is all that can be reasonably demanded of him. It is, indeed, all that is reasonably practicable. So regarded, s. 26 (1) adds very little to the common law obligation between employers and workmen, and it has been so said on several occasions in this court.

In the present case the defendants have "provided" a safe means of access. They have provided a roadway of sound construction marked out by white lines fifteen feet, three inches, wide. The only question is whether they have "maintained" it in an efficient state so far as is reasonably practicable. I think they have. It so happened that in the course of some loading operation a block of iron was left temporarily protruding three inches out into the gangway. It is not known whether it was done by the servants of the defendants or not. In my opinion, a transient and exceptional obstruction of that kind is not a breach of the obligation to maintain the means of access. I agree, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also agree. On the facts it does not seem to me that it could be said that there was a failure to provide safe means of access. For the plaintiff to succeed, in my judgment, he had to show that there was a failure, so far as reasonably practicable, to maintain a safe means of access. The word "maintained" is defined in s. 152 (1) of the Act to mean "maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair."

In his speech in Latimer's case (2), in a passage in which he was dealing with s. 25, but which is applicable in a wider context, LORD PORTER said (ante, p. 452):

"To be efficient, the appellant contended, the floor must be fit for any of the purposes for which it is intended, e.g., for support and for passing over in safety. The difficulty of such a view is that it puts an excessive obligation on the employer. Indeed, it was conceded that it could not be carried to the length of saying that a temporary obstruction, such as a piece of orange peel or the like, would make it inefficient. Once this concession is made it becomes a question of the degree of temporary inefficiency which constitutes a breach of the employer's obligation."

In the present case the lorry was only temporarily in position, and in all probability the packing piece was also only temporarily in the place where it was. The time involved was very short, and a consideration of the facts in this case leads me to the view that it was not shown that, so far as reasonably practicable, there was a failure to maintain or to provide safe means of access.

Appeal allowed.

CEYLON MOTOR INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, LTD. v. THAMBUGALA.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Porter, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, the Chief Justice of Canada (Rt. Hon. T. Rinfret) and Mr. L. M. D. de Silva), June 8, 9, July 21, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Motor insurance—Action against insurance company to satisfy judgment against insured—Notice of proceedings—Sufficiency of letter to insurers—Motor Car Ordinance of Ceylon (No. 45 of 1938), s. 134 (a).

By the Motor Car Ordinance of Ceylon (No. 45 of 1938), s. 134: "No sum shall be payable by an insurer under the provisions of s. 133—(a) in respect of any decree, unless before or within seven days after the commencement of the action in which the decree was entered, notice of the action had been given to the insurer by a party to the action . . ."

On Sept. 1, 1945, the respondent was injured by a car which had been insured with the appellants against third-party risks in accordance with the requirements of the Motor Car Ordinance, s. 128. On May 21, 1946, his proctors wrote to the appellants saying that an action would be filed against the owner of the car unless his claim for Rs.15,000 damages was settled before May 31, 1946. The claim not having been settled, the respondent instituted proceedings against the owner of the car and was awarded Rs.10,000 damages, and, on the appellants' refusal to pay this sum, he instituted proceedings against them. The appellants contended that the letter of May 21, 1946, was not a sufficient notice of action under s. 134 (a).

HELD: the notice, in setting out the name and address of the proposed plaintiff, the name of the owner and the number of the car which caused the injuries, the date of the accident, and the sum being claimed as damages, was a sufficient notice of action under s. 134 (a), it not being necessary that it should contain the name of the court in which it was proposed to file action, and, accordingly, the appellants were liable to pay the sum claimed as damages.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of Ceylon, dated May 20, 1952.

On Sept. 1, 1945, the respondent, P. P. Thambugala, was knocked down and injured in a street in Colombo by a motor car owned by one K. S. Perera while it was being driven by his driver in the course of and within the scope of his employment. At that date Perera was insured by the appellants, the Ceylon Motor Insurance Association, Ltd., against third-party risks as required by the Motor Car Ordinance (No. 45 of 1938), s. 128. On May 21, 1946, the respondent's proctors wrote a letter to the appellants claiming Rs.15,000 as damages for the accident, and saying that, if the claim was not settled before May 31, 1946, an action would be begun against Perera as the owner of the car. On May 23, 1946, the appellants replied that Perera had not reported the accident to them and advised the respondent to communicate direct with Perera. On June 10, 1946, without any further communication to the appellants, the respondent instituted proceedings in the District Court of Colombo against Perera for Rs.15,000 damages for personal injuries, and on June 25, 1948, he was awarded Rs.10,000 damages. On Nov. 11, 1949, an appeal by Perera to the Supreme Court of Ceylon was dismissed. The appellants were then called on to pay the Rs.10,000, but they refused to do so, and, on Apr. 5, 1950, the respondent instituted proceedings against them in the District Court of Colombo.

- A The appellants claimed that a "notice of action", as required by the Motor Car Ordinance, s. 134 (a), had not been given them. On Oct. 24, 1950, the District Court held that the letter of May 21, 1946, sent by the respondent's proctors to the appellants was a sufficient notice under s. 134 (a), and that, therefore, the appellants were liable to pay the respondent Rs.13,881.22, being the amount due when he instituted the proceedings on Apr. 5, 1950. The B appellants appealed to the Supreme Court of Ceylon, who, on May 20, 1952, affirmed the decision of the District Court.

Cross, Q.C., and Handoo for the appellants.

Stephen Chapman for the respondent.

- C July 21. Mr. L. M. D. de SILVA: This is an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of Ceylon dated May 20, 1952, dismissing an appeal from a decree of the District Court of Colombo dated Oct. 24, 1950, in favour of the respondent. The respondent had been injured by a car belonging to one K. Stephen Perera who had been duly insured against third-party risks with the appellant company in accordance with the requirements of the Motor Car Ordinance (No. 45 of 1938). In an earlier action in the District Court of Colombo, D the respondent obtained a decree against Perera for Rs.10,000 with legal interest and costs. The amount due on that decree on Apr. 5, 1950, was Rs. 13,881.22. The respondent, availing himself of the provisions of s. 133 of the Motor Car Ordinance, brought this action on that day for the recovery of the said sum from the appellant company. Section 133 of the ordinance says:

- E " (1) If after a certificate of insurance has been issued under s. 128 (4) to the person by whom a policy has been effected, a decree in respect of any such liability as is required by s. 128 (1) (b) to be covered by a policy of insurance (being a liability covered by the terms of the policy) is obtained against any person insured by the policy, then notwithstanding that the insurer may be entitled to avoid or cancel, or may have avoided or cancelled, the policy, the insurer shall, subject to the provisions of ss. 134 to 137, pay F to the persons entitled to the benefit of the decree any sum payable thereunder in respect of that liability, including any amount payable in respect of costs and any sum payable in respect of interest on that sum under such decree. (2) In this section, 'liability covered by the terms of the policy' means a liability which is covered by the policy or which would be so covered but for the fact that the insurer is entitled to avoid or cancel, G or has avoided or cancelled, the policy."

Section 134 is to the following effect:

- " No sum shall be payable by an insurer under the provisions of s. 133—
(a) in respect of any decree, unless before or within seven days after the commencement of the action in which the decree was entered, notice of H the action had been given to the insurer by a party to the action; or (b) in respect of any decree, so long as execution thereof is stayed pending appeal."

It will be seen that no sum is payable by the appellant unless the respondent has given the notice of action provided for by s. 134 (a). The only ground on which the appellant company seeks to avoid liability is that notice under the section has not been duly given. Sections 136 and 137 of the ordinance enable the insurer to obtain a declaration of non-liability on certain grounds in legal proceedings instituted for the purpose, provided that they are instituted before the expiration of a specified period and provided, in certain circumstances, notice is given of the proceedings by the insurer to the injured party within a prescribed time. Their Lordships are of the opinion that one of the objects, but not the sole object, of the notice of action required by s. 134 is to enable the insurer to institute within time proceedings under ss. 136 and 137.

On May 21, 1946, the respondent's proctors wrote the following letter to the appellant company:

(Re Car No. X—4851. We are instructed by Mr. P. P. Thambugala . . . to file an action for the recovery of Rs.15,000 against Mr. Kodituwakku Aratchige Stephen Perera . . . being damages sustained by our client as a result of the above car knocking down our client on Sept. 1, 1945, by reason of the negligent and careless driving on the part of his driver. We are given to understand that the above car has been insured with your company. Our client is still under treatment and unless our client's claim is settled on or before the 31st instant, we are instructed to file action against the owner of the car."

The only question for decision by their Lordships is whether this letter is a sufficient notice of action under s. 134 of the ordinance.

The Motor Car Ordinance (No. 45 of 1938) follows to a large extent the English legislation on the subject of the liability of an insurer to a third party. Section 134 (a) bears a resemblance to s. 10 (2) (a) of the English Road Traffic Act, 1934, which reads:

"No sum shall be payable by an insurer under the foregoing provisions of this section—(a) in respect of any judgment, unless before or within seven days after the commencement of the proceedings in which the judgment was given, the insurer had notice of the bringing of the proceedings."

In Weldrich v. Essex & Suffolk Equitable Insurance Society, Ltd. (1) the question arose whether a notice in the following terms was a sufficient compliance with its provisions (83 Lloyd L.R. 102):

"We understand your society has repudiated liability, and we shall be grateful to have your confirmation thereof in writing, because, you will appreciate, we shall have to take proceedings as against Mohamed, and as against the owner of the other vehicle, and at the same time give notice to the Motor Insurers Bureau of your repudiation of liability."

It was held that it was not. But their Lordships are of the view that this decision does not help the appellants. They agree with the learned district judge "that the main purport of this letter was to obtain confirmation of an alleged repudiation of liability," and that it was not possible to say that it was a proper notice complying with the provisions of s. 10 (2) (a) of the Road Traffic Act, 1934. Other English cases have been cited to their Lordships which are distinguishable from the present case on a variety of grounds. They involve the interpretation of the words "notice of action" in various statutes, and their Lordships would observe about them generally that the interpretation of such a set of words in a particular statute does not always greatly assist the interpretation of the same words in another. Their Lordships think it necessary to refer to only one of these cases, namely, Lewis v. Smith (2). In that case an Act of Parliament incorporating the West India Dock Company was under consideration. It enacted that no action could be brought against the company unless fourteen days' notice of such action had been given. A letter on which the plaintiff in that case relied as giving notice bears in some respects a resemblance to the letter under consideration by their Lordships, but was thought by SIR VICARY GIBBS, C.J. (Holt, N.P. 29) to leave "it open to conjecture what legal proceedings were in contemplation . . . and against whom they were to be brought." He held that the letter under consideration in that case was not a proper notice of action under the Act. The letter sent by the respondent to the appellants, however, in the present case says that the proceedings were to be for the recovery of damages and that they were to be brought against Perera, the owner of the car. It was, consequently, free from the defects referred to by SIR VICARY GIBBS, C.J.

- A It has been argued that the letter which is challenged should have contained the name of the court in which it was proposed to file action. An action cannot be specified with precision without reference to its number and to the name of the court in which it is filed. It is to be noticed, however, that s. 134 contemplates the possibility of giving notice before the action is filed. In that event no number could be given. It follows that the section contemplates something
- B containing less than a precise specification of the action. The name of the court could, no doubt, be given, but their Lordships do not think that the section requires that this should be done. It does not do so expressly and there is nothing from which it can be said to do so by implication. Then it was said that the words "unless our clients' claim is settled" reduced the notice to one which was conditional and insufficient for the purposes of s. 134.
- C Their Lordships agree with the view of the Supreme Court that the words must be taken to mean "settled by you", namely, by the appellant company. But they are of opinion that, even if they meant "settled by you or someone else", the words do not vitiate the notice. A notice of action without such words necessarily carries with it the implication that action will be filed only if the claim is not settled, and the addition of the express statement does not
- D alter its meaning or its effect. The notice which has been sent in this case sets out the name and address of the proposed plaintiff, the name of the owner and number of the car which caused injuries, the date of the accident, and the sum which was being claimed from the owner as damages. Their Lordships are of the opinion that these elements, taken together, constitute a sufficient notice of action under s. 134 (a) and that there are no elements in it which in
- E any way reduce it to something less than a sufficient notice.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellant company will pay the respondent's costs of appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

EDWARDS v. GRIFFITHS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Parker and Donovan, JJ.), July 30, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Disqualification—Driver mental defective—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Need to produce insurance policy—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

In 1951 the respondent passed a driving test and was granted a driver's licence for twelve months. After the expiration of the licence he applied for a new licence which was refused because he was under the supervision of the local health authority under the provisions of the Mental Deficiency Acts, 1913 to 1938. In February, 1953, he drove a motor tractor belonging to his employer and was charged with driving a motor vehicle without a policy of insurance being in force. The certificate of insurance of his employer contained a proviso that the driver must hold a licence to drive the vehicle or that he must have held one and not be disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence.

HELD: the words "disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence" in the proviso in the certificate of insurance must be construed as meaning a disqualification of the driver by an order of the court under s. 4 (6) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; the respondent was not so disqualified; and, therefore, he was covered by the certificate and no offence was committed.

PER LORD GODDARD, C.J.: It would be better in all these cases, and I desire police authorities to take notice of this, always to take the precaution of having the policy before the court. That can be done by issuing a subpoena requiring the assured to produce the policy to the court.

FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 4 (6) (b) and s. 35, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 24, p. 576 and p. 602.

CASE STATED by Wiltshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Chippenham, on Apr. 9, 1953, the appellant, Henry Edwards, preferred an information against the respondent, Herbert Griffiths, charging that he used a motor tractor when there was not in force in relation to such user of the vehicle by him such a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third-party risks as complied with the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to s. 35 (1) of the said Act.

It was proved or admitted that on Feb. 22, 1953, the respondent drove an agricultural tractor on a public highway; that the tractor was the property of D. O. Cooper, a farmer, by whom the respondent was employed, and the respondent was driving with Cooper's permission; that the respondent was not the holder of a current driving licence; that in October, 1951, he had passed a driving test and been granted a driving licence for twelve months, enabling him to drive motor cycles and tractors, but that in 1952 he was verbally informed by an official of the Wiltshire County Council that, as he was then under the supervision of the local health authority under the provisions of the Mental Deficiency Acts, 1913 to 1938, he must not drive his motor cycle; that no formal notice revoking the licence had been received by the respondent under s. 5 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; that since the expiration of his licence the respondent had applied for a licence and his application had been refused by the licensing authority, the respondent being informed that the authority had received notice that he, the respondent, was under the supervision of the local health authority under the Mental Deficiency Acts, 1913 to 1938; the certificate of insurance held by the respondent's employer provided for use of the vehicle by (a) the policy holder, (b) any other person with the permission of the policy holder, provided that the person driving held a licence to drive the vehicle or had held and was not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence.

For the respondent it was contended that, as he had previously held a driving licence and had not been disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence, he was insured in respect of third-party risks under the employer's certificate of insurance. For the appellant it was contended that, as the respondent was prohibited from holding or obtaining a licence by virtue of his being under statutory supervision, he was automatically disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

The justices were of opinion that "disqualified" in the insurance certificate meant disqualified by an order of the court in accordance with s. 4 (6) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and not prohibited from obtaining a licence by reason of mental or physical disability, and they dismissed the information. The appellant now appealed.

McGougan for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This case is a good illustration of the inconvenience of having to decide, in the absence of the insurance company, whether a policy covers a particular person at a particular time, but there is no provision in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, by which an insurance company can be brought in to take part in the argument on these matters. If the insurance company is, or would regard itself as being, on risk, the mischief which the compulsory insurance sections is intended to guard against does not arise, and it was for that reason that two years ago, with the sanction of the Home Office, it was arranged that police authorities who were in doubt whether a particular policy covered a particular driver at a particular time might consult the committee of underwriters at Lloyd's to find out whether or not in the particular circumstances they would regard themselves on risk. This course was not taken by the police authorities in this case. We have, therefore, in the absence of the insurance company, to decide whether the insurers would have been on risk if there had been an accident.

The facts show that the respondent was in the employment of a farmer who held a policy of insurance. If the master holds a policy of insurance, an employee who drives on his instructions is covered, provided the policy is not by its terms confined to the holder of the policy. It would be better in all these cases, and I desire police authorities to take notice of this, always to take the precaution of having the policy before the court. That can be done by issuing a subpoena requiring the assured to produce the policy to the court. According to the certificate, the persons covered by this policy were the policy holder and any other person driving with his permission. Therefore, prima facie, the respondent was covered. The certificate goes on to provide:

"Provided the person driving holds a licence to drive the vehicle or has held and is not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence."

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] Section 4 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, provides:

"(2) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act as to the physical fitness of applicants for licences, the licensing authority, except in the case of an applicant who is disqualified as hereinafter mentioned, shall on payment of a fee of 5s. grant a licence to any person who applies for it in the prescribed manner and makes a declaration in the prescribed form that he is not, under the provisions of this Part of this Act, disqualified by reason of age or otherwise for obtaining the licence for which he is applying . . . (6) A person shall be disqualified for obtaining a licence—
(a) while another licence granted to him is in force whether the licence is suspended or not; (b) if he is by a conviction under this Part of this Act or by an order of a court thereunder disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence."

The justices held that the words in the certificate of insurance "not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence" meant a disqualification by order of the court under s. 4 (6). In my opinion, they were right. It is true that, by reference to s. 4 (2) and s. 5, it may be argued that under the provisions of the Act relating to physical fitness and age a person may be said to be disqualified for obtaining a licence, but what we have to decide is whether or not as between the assured and the insurers these words "not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence" refer merely to the provision of disqualification by order of the court on conviction. Prima facie, the person who is driving with the permission of the policy holder is covered. It is further provided by the certificate that the person who is driving, whether he is the policy holder or a person driving with permission, must hold or must have held a licence to drive. The words "and is not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence" following immediately after the words "has held" seem to me to indicate clearly that the insurers are contemplating the case of a man who has held a licence, but has been disqualified for holding it, meaning disqualified for getting a new one or holding his current licence by reason of an order of the court. It is clear, as it seems to me, that as between the assured and the insurers we have to construe the certificate against the insurers, that is to say, if there is an ambiguity or a doubt as to its extent and the question were to arise as to the liability of the insurers, we should have to put the construction on the certificate most favourable to the assured, but I have come to the conclusion that the justices were right in the interpretation they put on this certificate of insurance, and, therefore, this appeal fails.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

DONOVAN, J.: Like LORD GODDARD, C.J., I have not found this an easy case, but when I read in s. 9 (5) of the Act of 1930 that a person prohibited by reason of his age from driving shall be deemed to be disqualified, I think it is clear that "disqualification" in the Act has the restricted meaning given to it in s. 4 (6) (b) which is not the same as "prohibited". Then, when I find a certificate of insurance using in its language the language of the Act, I think "disqualified" in the certificate should receive the same restricted meaning. Therefore, I agree with the judgment proposed.

Appeal dismissed.

BARNARD v. TOWERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), July 29, 30, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—"Suitable alternative accommodation"—Offer of share of house to tenant of whole house—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1) (b).

A The landlord claimed possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, applied and of which the tenant had sole and exclusive possession, and contended that suitable alternative accommodation was available to the tenant. The alternative accommodation consisted of a dwelling-house of which the tenant was joint owner and which she would be obliged to share with her sister who was already in occupation thereof.

B HELD: the offer of a share of a house was not an offer of suitable alternative accommodation within s. 3 (1) (b) of the Act of 1933 to a tenant who had exclusive occupation of a house, and, therefore, no order for possession would be made.

FOR THE RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST RESTRICTIONS (AMENDMENT) ACT, 1933, s. 3, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 1048.

C APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE WRANGHAM, at Market Harborough County Court, dated May 11, 1953.

D The landlord of a dwelling-house to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, applied, sought possession of the premises and contended that there was suitable alternative accommodation available to the tenant. The alternative accommodation consisted of a dwelling-house, No. 21, Charles Street, Mayfair, of which the tenant was joint owner with her sister and which was occupied at the date of the proceedings by the sister. The house of which possession was sought by the landlord was in the sole and exclusive occupation of the tenant. The county court judge refused to make the order for possession on the ground that the security of tenure afforded by joint ownership was not reasonably equivalent to the security which the tenant had as a protected tenant within s. 3 (3) (b) of the Act of 1933.

F SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE WRANGHAM in a case arising under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. The landlord sought an order for possession of the dwelling-house known as 52, Lubenham Hill, and the case proceeded on the basis that to succeed he had to show that there was available suitable alternative accommodation under s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933 which provides:

G "No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts [i.e., the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts, 1920 to 1925] apply or for the ejection of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a judgment and . . . (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order or judgment takes effect."

H Section 3 (3) provides:

" . . . accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists either—(a) of a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply; or (b) of premises to be let as a separate dwelling on terms which will, in the opinion of the court, afford to the tenant security of tenure reasonably equivalent to the security afforded by the principal Acts in the case of a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply, and is, in the opinion of the court, reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family as regards proximity to place of work, and either—(i) similar as regards rental and extent to the accommodation afforded by dwelling-houses provided in the neighbourhood by any housing authority for persons whose needs as regards extent are, in the opinion of the court, similar to those of the tenant and his family; or (ii) otherwise reasonably suitable to the means of the tenant and to the needs of the tenant and his family as regards extent and character.”

It was pointed out that the form of that sub-section is that accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists of the premises mentioned. There have been some observations in the cases to which we were referred as to how far it is exhaustive. In my view, that point does not affect this case, but I think it is right to say a word about it. If the tenant sought to be evicted had a house of his own which was empty, to which he could go, and to which it was reasonable he should go, but which happened, owing to its rateable value to be outside the application of the Acts, it would clearly not be within s. 3 (3), but it is difficult to believe that the court would be precluded from considering it as alternative accommodation. However, in my opinion, those points do not arise in the present case for reasons which I will indicate in a moment.

The tenant, Miss Towers, had lived with her father and two sisters at 21, Charles Street. The father had died and one of the sisters remained at 21, Charles Street, and for some time before the tenant took a lease of the house of which possession is sought she was living there with her sister. The alternative accommodation on which the landlord seeks to rely is 21, Charles Street, which is at present occupied and lived in by the sister, but of which the tenant is the joint owner. It is clear that, if this were a question of fact, the learned judge would have found on the facts that it was reasonable for the tenant to go and live there with her sister. I think he would have found as a fact, although the sisters gave contrary evidence, that the sisters were on such terms that, if they had nowhere else to go, they would live together. He took the view that the tenant was being unreasonable because of family disputes, but that is not a matter with which we are concerned. He decided that the landlord could not recover possession because he applied the provisions of s. 3 (3) (b) and took the view that the facts did not enable him to say that the security of tenure, afforded to the tenant if she went into this house with her sister, was that required by the sub-section. He said:

“Security of tenure of joint owners is nothing like equivalent to the security which a protected tenant has. Either joint owner can take the security away and force a sale at any moment.”

I think there is great force in that.

That was the sub-section under which this case was argued below, but, we having had the advantage of a second argument, it seems to me, first, that s. 3 (3) (b) cannot apply because these premises were not premises to be let as a separate dwelling. The reference to security of tenure there might give guidance to the meaning of suitable alternative accommodation. This case does not fall under that sub-section. I think that the landlord's case fails in limine. I do not think that the offer of a share in a house is an offer of suitable alternative accommodation to a tenant who under a tenancy has a house of his own. It seems to me that accommodation in a house of one's own differs in kind from sharing a house with someone else. When this section speaks of suitable alternative accommodation it means suitable alternative accommodation of the kind, although it may not be in all respects so good, as that which the tenant is enjoying, namely, in this case a house of which she has exclusive occupation. For these reasons I think the learned judge came to the right conclusion, although my reasons are different, and I would dismiss the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

BONE v. BONE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.), July 28, 1953.]

Divorce—Insanity—Guardian ad litem—Extension of duties to ancillary matters—Maintenance.

D Since 1947 the wife had been receiving medical attention. In 1948 she underwent two frontal leuchotomy operations, and since 1949 she had been considered unable to look after her children and had been living with her parents. In May, 1952, the husband filed a petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the grounds of the wife's cruelty and adultery, and asked for the exercise of the discretion of the court in his favour. By her answer the wife
E cross-prayed for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's adultery. By his reply the husband admitted the adultery, but alleged that the wife had condoned to it. A draft deed of maintenance was drawn up and agreed to by the parties before the hearing. At the hearing of the suit one Head was appointed and joined as guardian ad litem of the wife. The husband then withdrew the prayer of his petition and gave evidence of his own adultery.
F The wife was given leave to amend her answer by including a prayer for maintenance.

G LORD MERRIMAN, P., dismissed the prayer of the husband's petition and granted a decree nisi on the prayer of the wife's answer. HIS LORDSHIP approved the substance of the draft deed and said: It should be plainly understood that it was with reference to this deed that I thought it necessary that the duties of the guardian ad litem should be extended to ancillary matters, including, of course, maintenance. The application for maintenance was thereupon adjourned generally.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), July 27, 1953.]

Divorce—Practice—Petition—Service—Dispensing with service—Avoidance of irremediable hardship—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 9 (5).

The wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion and applied, under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 9 (5), for leave to dispense with service of it on the husband. In her affidavit in support of the application the wife stated that she and the husband (who was of Czechoslovak origin) lived together for a short time after the war, mostly in Czechoslovakia; that in 1947 she left him there and came to England and that there was an understanding between them that after a few months he should join her in England; that he had never done so and had ignored her letters to him; that she had communicated with his sister-in-law, who lived in Czechoslovakia and from her had learned that in 1950 he had been arrested, apparently as a political prisoner, and had remained under restraint ever since. The wife had sent one copy of the petition by post to the husband at his place of detention, another to him through the Czechoslovak embassy, and a third to the address of his sister-in-law, but she had received no answer from him.

HELD: while there was ground for thinking that the husband might have received a copy of the petition, it was not established that he had, and no effective method of substituted service could be suggested; if the court gave leave for service to be dispensed with, a decree absolute, which might be irrevocable, would probably be pronounced within a few weeks, whereas, if leave were refused, the husband's position might change and he might be able to acknowledge service of the petition and indicate whether or not he wished to defend, or some form of substituted service might become possible; and, therefore, leave would be refused.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

Picard for the wife.

Colin Duncan for the Queen's Proctor.

WILLMER, J.: The wife asks the leave of the court to dispense with service on the husband of her petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his desertion. The case came before me in chambers, but when I heard the facts I felt that it raised difficult problems on which I should welcome the assistance of argument on behalf of the Queen's Proctor. I, therefore, adjourned the matter into court.

The case arises under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 9 (5), whereby it is provided:

“Service may be dispensed with altogether in any case in which it may appear necessary or expedient to do so.”

A The rule substantially re-enacts the proviso to s. 42 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which has now been repealed. That section, after providing that a petition was to be served on the party to be affected thereby, contained a proviso that the court might dispense with such service altogether if it should seem necessary or expedient so to do. The wife is a woman of English origin, and has been resident in this country for a number of years. The husband is of Czechoslovak origin. The petition is presented in pursuance of the rights conferred by s. 18 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

B According to the wife's affidavit the relevant facts, so far as they can be ascertained, are that the parties lived together for a short time after the war, mostly in Czechoslovakia, and that some time in 1947 the wife came to England, leaving the husband still residing in Czechoslovakia. It is said by the wife that there was some sort of understanding between them that the husband was to leave Czechoslovakia and come to England to join the wife after the lapse of a few months. However, the husband did not come, and the wife says that when she wrote to him he ignored her letters. She remained in correspondence, and, indeed, is still in correspondence, with the husband's sister-in-law, who lives in Czechoslovakia, and from information derived from that source it appears that some time in 1950 the husband was arrested and has remained under some form of restraint ever since. There is no evidence to show that the husband has been guilty of any criminal offence. The inference which, I think, must be drawn is that he has been put under restraint as a political prisoner and for political reasons. That inference is supported by a recent letter from the husband's sister-in-law, in which, after commenting on the release of certain political prisoners in Czechoslovakia, she went on to say that C unhappily the husband had not so far obtained his release. The wife has, I am satisfied, made every reasonable attempt to serve this petition. A copy has been sent through the post to the address where the husband is known to be detained. Another copy has been sent through the Czechoslovak embassy in London. A third attempt was made to serve him by sending a copy to the address at which his sister-in-law resides and which had been his home before D his arrest. But there has been no answer. The high-water mark of the case for the wife is reached in the most recent of all the letters received from the husband's sister-in-law, a letter of June 15, 1953, received actually since the previous hearing of the case in chambers. I do not propose to read the letter, but it is sufficient to say that it does, at any rate, give some ground for thinking that the husband may possibly have received one or other of these copies of E the petition.

F That, however, to my mind, is not the whole of the difficulty, because, even if one were to assume that in all probability the husband has received a copy, or that the petition has been brought to his attention in some way, there are, it seems to me, good grounds for drawing the inference that during his present detention he would not in any case be allowed by the responsible authorities G to take any part in the case, and by that I mean that, not only would he not be allowed to defend it, but it may be that he is not even allowed to send off the acknowledgment of service enclosed with the petition. Further, for reasons which I have given, there is no means of knowing what, if any, answer the husband may have to the charge made against him. He may, for all that is known, wish to deny that he ever had any animus deserendi, or to set up that he had just cause for not rejoining his wife. It seems clear that three years had not elapsed by the time this husband was placed under restraint. Those H are the facts in relation to which I have to decide whether or not leave to dispense with further service should be granted.

I have, I believe, been referred to all the relevant authorities where similar questions have arisen, but it has been forcefully, and rightly, pointed out to me by both counsel that, in the end, the matter is entirely one for my unfettered discretion. It is, however, useful to look at the reports of some of the cases that have arisen, especially as several of them have reached the Court of Appeal. One cannot help but receive some guidance from such authority even on a matter of the exercise of discretion. A

I have already referred to the provisions of s. 42 of the Act of 1857, now substantially re-enacted in the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 9 (5). I think I am right in saying that until recent times the power conferred by the section was a power which the court was seldom called on to exercise. No doubt, this was due to the natural reluctance of any court in this country to allow any proceedings, particularly proceedings affecting status, to continue against a party who had no opportunity of being heard. That attitude is well summed-up in the words of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Read v. Read (1), where he says ([1942] 1 All E.R. 228, 229): B

"The system of constructive service, where a defendant can have judgment recovered against him without his ever having any opportunity of knowing that the proceedings are on foot is a thing against which English jurisprudence has always set its face . . ."

However, such cases did arise during the recent war, of which Read v. Read (1) was one. Another was Luccioni v. Luccioni (2). Both those cases arose out of applications to dispense with service on a respondent who was either an alien enemy or at any rate resident in enemy territory, and in both cases the ultimate decision was against granting leave to dispense with service. In Luccioni v. Luccioni (2) LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 262): D

"In my opinion, in the case of petitions which involve a change of status, and where any form of substituted service is impossible, the court, before dispensing with service, should require to be satisfied that the respondent spouse has become aware of the fact that the petition is being prosecuted, or, at the very least, of the intention to prosecute it, and in either case has had time and opportunity to indicate whether he or she desires to defend." E

In the Court of Appeal (ibid., 384) some criticism was directed in argument to those words of the learned President, and it was suggested that he was going some way towards fettering the discretion which the court, undoubtedly, has. The Court of Appeal, however, rejected that argument, and, I think, accepted and indorsed what was said by the learned President to the extent that circumstances such as those referred to were properly to be taken into consideration when the court was called on to exercise its discretion on this matter. There is, it seems to me, a marked similarity between the case of a respondent who is in enemy territory and for that reason unable to communicate, and a respondent who is detained in a foreign country as a political prisoner and for that reason equally unable to communicate. Undoubtedly, it seems to me, the present is a case in which the considerations referred to by the learned President in the passage which I have just read apply with the fullest possible force. F

It is proper, however, to refer to the fact that since those decisions there have been three further cases which have gone to the Court of Appeal, in each case on appeal from the refusal of a judge of this Division to grant leave to dispense with further service, and in each of those cases the Court of Appeal, for various reasons, have thought it right to allow the appeal and to grant the leave that was asked. The first was Weighman v. Weighman (3), where the G H husband had emigrated to Canada many years before, leaving his wife in this country. She sought to institute proceedings on the ground of desertion, but when it was attempted to serve the petition it proved impossible to find the husband. He had, however, written to the wife some time before the attempt to serve the petition a letter in which he informed her that he had left his old address, but he gave no new address and he further informed her that he never intended to return to England. That letter, it became clear, was in response to a letter from the wife asking him what he proposed to do about rejoining her. The Court of Appeal thought that leave to dispense with service ought to be granted on the basis that it was a fair inference on the facts that the husband recognised not only that he was in desertion, but also that there was at least a likelihood of proceedings being taken. That consideration had been specifically dealt with in those words of LORD MERRIMAN, P., which I quoted from Luccioni v. Luccioni (2). In other words, in Weighman v. Weighman (3), the Court of Appeal acted in accordance with one of the possibilities envisaged by the learned President. I do not think I can derive much assistance from the view which the Court of Appeal took of the special facts in Weighman v. Weighman (3).

The second case, Heath v. Heath (4), was an appeal from my own refusal to grant leave to dispense with further service. The facts were very different. The ground on which the Court of Appeal eventually decided the matter was that all the probabilities went to show that the husband, who was being proceeded against for desertion, had received the petition, although he had not taken the step of sending back the acknowledgment of service. That case was relied on by counsel for the wife in the present case because of certain remarks made by BUCKNILL, L.J., and DENNING, L.J., in the course of their judgments. BUCKNILL, L.J., said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 880):

"It is difficult, however, to lay down any principle in a case of this kind, except the principles I have tried to indicate. One is that all reasonable steps should be taken to see that a respondent has knowledge of the proceedings, and the other is that an unreasonable burden should not be put on an innocent petitioner before she can be released from a marriage which is no marriage now except in its legal aspects, and from a man who has deserted her and her child in the way that this man has left this woman."

"If the probabilities are that the respondent has received the petition and simply declined or omitted to sign the acknowledgment, then the court can dispense with further service."

It will be observed from what I have said that in that case there was no question of the respondent being under any form of restraint. What the Court of Appeal were concerned with was the question whether or not he had probably received the petition, and the further question whether, if he had, he had had any reasonable opportunity either of acknowledging its receipt or of indicating what course he wished to take did not arise and was not present to the minds of the learned lords justices when giving their judgments. That seems to me to be a feature which distinguishes the present case from that decision of the Court of Appeal.

The last and most recent case in the Court of Appeal to which I was referred was Paolantonio v. Paolantonio (5). That was again a case of a wife's petition which she was endeavouring to serve on a husband whose last known address was in the United States. The facts really amounted to this, that the respondent had been completely lost and nobody had the faintest idea where he had gone although it was thought he might have returned to Europe. In those circumstances there was no address at which he could be served either personally or by post, and it was impossible to conceive of any satisfactory means of substituted service which would be likely to be effective. There was no particular newspaper the advertisements in which it might be expected the respondent would see. In those circumstances the Court of Appeal thought it right to make an order dispensing with further service of the petition. That case is remote from the present one, and I should not have thought it necessary to refer to it but for some remarks made in the concluding sentences in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J. Those remarks might, it seems to me, be read as amounting to a statement of some rigid rule, which would have the effect of fettering the discretion of the court. TUCKER, L.J., referring to the judgment of WALLINGTON, J., below, said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 407):

“Not being able to bring the case within the four corners of Weighman v. Weighman (3), he [WALLINGTON, J.] appears to me to have regarded himself as precluded from dispensing with service. Otherwise there could be no ground for refusing the order. I think there must be cases of which the present is one, although they will necessarily be few, where once the court is satisfied, as I am in the present case, that the only suggested method of substituted service is not only beyond the means of the applicant, but will be ineffective, justice requires that the court should exercise its discretion to dispense with service of the petition.”

It may be said that those rather wide words might be applied in this case, for I cannot help being satisfied that no suggested method of substituted service would be in the least effective here. It might be thought that the learned lord justice was enjoining any judge finding himself in that position to decide the case in a particular way. Bearing in mind that it has been laid down so often that this is a matter for the unfettered discretion of the judge, I cannot read those observations of TUCKER, L.J., as being intended in any way to fetter my discretion, any more than the words of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Luccioni v. Luccioni (2). Having mentioned those three cases, all of which went to the Court of Appeal, and in all of which leave to dispense with further service was granted, I leave them with the observation that the facts of each of the three seems to me to be very remote from those of the present case which, as I have already indicated, much more nearly resemble the war-time cases of Read v. Read (1) and Luccioni v. Luccioni (2).

In this case, although, as I have said, there is ground for thinking that the husband may have received a copy of the petition, I cannot be satisfied that in all probability he has. Certainly it seems to me there is no ground for thinking that he has had any opportunity either of presenting his defence, if he has one, or even of indicating whether or not he wishes to defend. For all I know, if I grant leave in this case to dispense with service, I may be causing him a grave injustice. I say that because, if leave is granted, it seems clear that the wife would have every opportunity of obtaining a decree in an undefended suit, and, within a few weeks from now, if service is to be dispensed with, there may be a decree absolute in respect of which this husband will have had no opportunity of being heard. Against that it is forcibly and properly said, that, if I do not grant leave to dispense with service, I may be inflicting a grave hardship on the wife. The wife, at any rate so far as her own story goes, is an innocent victim of her husband's wrongdoing. It has been pressed on me that not only would I be inflicting hardship on her by leaving her notionally married to the husband, but that I might be depriving her of the opportunity of finding happiness by marriage with another man.

I am conscious that, if I refuse leave, the wife may suffer grievous hardship. I have to balance the possible hardships on the one side against those on the other. I do not think it is possible to make any order either way in this case without incurring at least the risk of causing grievous hardship to one side or the other. What has finally influenced me as to the way I should exercise my discretion is the fact that, if I act in one way, the damage may be irrevocable, whereas, if I act in the other way, no irrevocable damage will have been done. If I allow service to be dispensed with, it seems almost certain that within a few weeks a decree absolute will be pronounced, as to which the husband will never have been heard, which may cause him grievous hardship, and which may be irrevocable. If, on the other hand, I decline to exercise my discretion in that way, there is no finality. The wife may have to wait, but, perhaps, not for long, before she can proceed. The situation in Czechoslovakia may change. There may be a release of further political prisoners which may result in the husband obtaining his freedom. There may be a change of policy which will enable the husband to acknowledge service of the petition and to indicate whether or not he desires to defend. Again, with the passage of time, further and different opportunities may arise of devising some other form of service on the husband. It would, I think, be unwise to prophesy what may happen. I do not wish to raise the hopes of the wife too high, but the possibility exists that what I refuse today may readily be granted tomorrow, but in the circumstances as they exist today I cannot exercise my discretion in her favour, and I feel I ought to refuse the leave which is asked for.

Summons dismissed.

ROSENFELD v. NEWMAN AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Morris, L.JJ.), July 28, 29, 1953.]

Estoppel—Res judicata—Possession claim—Claim in county court on ground of trespass by defendants, and, alternatively, assignment to them without landlord's consent—Claim in trespass beyond jurisdiction of county court—Election to proceed on alternative ground—Defendants found not to be "tenants"—Order for possession refused for lack of jurisdiction—Subsequent claim in trespass in High Court.

In 1940 the plaintiff, who was the owner of a dwelling-house, let it on separate tenancies to B. and T. Thereafter the defendants came to live on the premises with B. and T. By 1946 both B. and T. had left the premises, leaving in possession the defendants who continued to pay the rent. On discovering the position in 1951 the plaintiff brought an action in the county court for possession. By his particulars of claim, he alleged (i) that the defendants were trespassers, and, alternatively, (ii) that, if they were within the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, he relied on the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (d), as the premises had been unlawfully sub-let or assigned to them by the original tenants without his consent. On the trial of the action it was found that the annual value of the property was over £100, and, accordingly, the county court judge had no jurisdiction so far as the action was based in trespass. According to the judge's notes, the plaintiff then elected "to proceed on the alternative ground". The county court judge found that the defendants were not contractual or statutory tenants, and he held that he was unable to make an order for possession owing to lack of jurisdiction. In a subsequent action in the High Court for possession on the ground of trespass, the defendants contended that the plaintiff was estopped from alleging that they were trespassers as his abandonment of the claim for trespass in the county court amounted to a final election to treat them as tenants.

Held: by his alternative claim the plaintiff alleged, not that the defendants were in occupation of the premises under a contract, but that they had obtained possession by an unlawful sub-letting or assignment and had no right to remain there, and, therefore, the alternative claim, which was merely made by way of anticipation of a defence under the Rent Restrictions Acts, was not inconsistent with the claim based in trespass; the election to proceed with the alternative claim did not amount to a final election to abandon the claim in trespass; and, therefore, the plaintiff was not estopped from alleging in the High Court that the defendants were trespassers, and, as the defendants had no right or title to the premises, the plaintiff was entitled to an order for possession.

Decision of PARKER, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 840), reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., dated Mar. 12, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 840.

The plaintiff was the owner of residential premises at 149, Parnell Road, Bow, and in 1940 he let them on separate tenancies to two tenants named Ball and Tracey who came to live in the premises with their families. In 1941 the first two defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Newman (senior), came to the premises and at first occupied one room on the ground floor with the Ball family. Later, the Newmans' daughter-in-law came to live with the Traceys upstairs. In 1942 the Ball family left the premises, but the Newmans continued to reside there. After the war, the Newmans' son, Albert Newman, came to join his wife. In 1946 the Traceys, except for the mother, who stayed till she died in January, 1951, left the premises. Rent continued to be paid in respect of the whole premises by the Newmans and was accepted till June, 1951. In November, 1951, the plaintiff brought an action in the Bow County Court for possession of the premises. By his particulars of claim he claimed possession on the ground that the defendants were trespassers, and, alternatively, he said that, if the defendants were protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, he relied on para. (d) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, as the premises had been unlawfully sub-let or assigned to the defendants by one of the original tenants without his knowledge. At the trial of the action it was found that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to deal with the claim in trespass as the annual value of the premises exceeded £100, and, according to the judge's notes, counsel for the plaintiff elected "to proceed on the alternative ground." On the alternative claim the county court judge found that the defendants were not contractual or statutory tenants and he held that he was unable to make an order for possession "owing to lack of jurisdiction". The plaintiff then brought an action in the High Court for possession on the ground of trespass. PARKER, J., held that the abandonment of the claim for trespass in the county court amounted, in the circumstances, to a final election by the plaintiff to treat the defendants as tenants, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was estopped from alleging in the High Court that they were trespassers.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: There has been a considerable confusion, not only in this case, but in the previous litigation in the county court which occurred in 1951, and, in my opinion, the whole difficulty has been occasioned by the fact that the true nature of the claim in the county court, and, in particular, in para. 4, as finally amended, of the plaintiff's particulars of claim, was never clearly apprehended when the case was tried in the county court. I should be the last person to suggest that the parties to an action should

A not try to limit the issues to be fought in the action, but, if there be a moral in this case, it is that, when parties do attempt to limit the issues and to confine themselves to one issue of several, it is highly desirable that the counsel concerned, and the judge as well, should first have clearly defined and, if necessary, recorded what is the issue which the court is called on to decide.

B The appeal which is before us comes from a judgment and order of PARKER, J., in an action in the Queen's Bench Division in which the plaintiff, as owner of a house known as 149, Parnell Road, Bow, sought an order for possession against the defendants (who were a man and his wife and the man's son and his wife) on the footing that they had no right, title or interest in the premises, and were, therefore, trespassers. The nature of the defence (and it was substantially the same defence which had been raised in the previous proceedings)

C was that the defendants, or, at any rate, two of them, had a right, title or interest justifying their possession, namely, that they were there as tenants, either as assignees of the previous tenants or otherwise. The result of the decision of PARKER, J., is at first sight remarkable, for, on the question whether the defendants had any right, title or interest, the judge intimated quite plainly that his view on the evidence was that the defendants at no time had such a

D right, title or interest, but he held that the plaintiff was estopped from alleging in these proceedings that the defendants were trespassers, so that the action failed. The effect of the judgment, therefore, appears to be that, at one and the same time, the judge has said that the defendants have never been tenants and have no right or title to the premises, and that the plaintiff has no right to eject them on the footing that they are not tenants. Thus, a position of stalemate is achieved. The ground on which the learned judge so decided was,

E briefly, that, in the previous proceedings in the Bow County Court (which were also ejectment proceedings), the plaintiff, by his counsel, deliberately and clearly elected to abandon any claim based on the allegation of no title in the defendants, and, therefore, as counsel for the defendants contended, he could not retract his election because, in the event, his choice has turned out to be unsuccessful.

F There is no doubt that that contention would be correct if the election were made clearly and unequivocally.

Counsel for the defendants cited a number of cases, but I do not think that the law is in doubt. PARKER, J., referred to Scarf v. Jardine (1), in which the plaintiff, who claimed as a creditor of a firm, had the choice of saying either

G that the debt was a debt of the firm (which had been newly constituted), or that the debt was owed to him by a previous partner. The House of Lords held that the two claims were inconsistent, and that the plaintiff could not sue both the new firm and the retired partner at the same time. Similarly, in Morel Brothers & Co. v. Earl of Westmorland (2), the Court of Appeal held that, if a creditor had a claim against a wife or a husband in respect of necessities supplied to the wife, he could choose which of the two, husband or wife,

H he sued, but, if he recovered judgment against the wife, he could not then sue the husband.

If those principles were applicable in this case, a similar result, no doubt, would follow, but the question is: Are they applicable? With all respect to the learned judge, my view is that, on the facts, they plainly are not. To make good that conclusion I will turn to the first proceedings, the county court action. The defendants on that occasion were only the first two of the defendants now before the court, but no point has been made of that, and, in substance, the nature of the action was the same as that now before the court, namely, an action in ejectment in respect of 149, Parnell Road. By his particulars of claim the plaintiff said that he was entitled to, and claimed possession of, the dwelling-house "in which property the defendants are without any right or title". He then alleged (as it turned out erroneously) that the annual value of the property did not exceed £100. There was an informal answer to that claim by the first defendant, Mr. Newman, and then the plaintiff amended his claim. He amended it twice, and I cannot help thinking that the second amendment may have had something to do with the unfortunate consequences which followed. Paragraph 4, as first amended, was:

"If, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the defendants are protected by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, the plaintiff reasonably required possession of the said dwelling-house as a residence for himself."

Having seen that alternative claim, the defendants then put in a formal defence in which, having denied the right of possession generally, they proceeded as follows:

"The defendants admit that they are tenants of the property protected by virtue of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, but they deny that the plaintiff reasonably requires possession of the said dwelling-house as a residence for himself and maintain that greater hardship . . ."

would flow from the order than if no order were made. Strictly, there was no allegation of tenancy which the defendants could admit, but that I pass by. The allegation that the plaintiff wanted the house reasonably for his own occupation was without foundation because at the trial or at some late stage (by leave, I take it), the claim was again amended and the former assertion of reasonable requirement for the plaintiff was abandoned altogether, and, therefore, it can be disregarded as though it had never been made. What eventually was alleged in para. 4 was this:

"If, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the defendants are protected by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, the plaintiff relies on sched. I [to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933]. On a date unknown to the plaintiff one of the original tenants without the consent of the plaintiff sub-let or assigned the whole of the premises to the defendants or one of them."

The reference to sched. I to the Act of 1933 was, obviously, a reference to para. (d) in that schedule. The manner of working of s. 3 of the Act of 1933 and the schedule is too well known to need any exposition on my part. It is sufficient to say that the court is thereby given power, if it thinks it reasonable so to do, to make an order for possession against a tenant if

"(d) the tenant without the consent of the landlord has at any time after [a named period] assigned or sub-let the whole of the dwelling-house or sub-let part of the dwelling-house, the remainder being already sub-let."

Bearing that in mind, let us see what para. 4 alleges. In the first place, I think it is quite obvious that, if this action had been brought in the nineteenth century under the old rules of pleadings which are enshrined in BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADING, 2nd ed., para. 4, as finally amended, would not have appeared in the statement of claim, which would have stood, broadly, as originally drawn. The defendants would then have raised a plea that they were tenants or entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and this paragraph would have come in by way of replication (or so I should have thought), for it is not, in truth, anything other than a plea in anticipation of a defence. Nor is it (on one view of the proper conclusion, which happens to be the view of the judge who tried the case) inconsistent with the first plea, viz., that the defendants were trespassers. What I think that para. 4 is saying is: "If the defendants are not, as I say they are, mere trespassers, and if they say they are entitled for any reason to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, then my answer to that defence is that they acquired their interest, if any, by a letting or an assignment to them without authority, without the consent of the landlord, of the whole of the premises, and, therefore, if they are not mere trespassers an order for possession under the Act ought to be made by the judge." Observe that the allegation is not that the defendants themselves were ever, directly, tenants of the plaintiff (the landlord) in the sense that the plaintiff had made a contract of tenancy with them. What is alleged is that at some date unknown one of the original tenants, without the consent of the plaintiff, sub-let or assigned to the defendants the whole of the premises.

When the case came before the learned county court judge, the point was taken by counsel for the defendants—rightly, on the facts, as is now conceded—that the allegation, in para. 2 of the statement of claim, that the annual value did not exceed £100 was wrong. The result of that submission was to deprive the county court of jurisdiction save in so far as the case could be treated as falling within the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 17 (2), namely, as being a proceeding "arising out of" the Act. Since this matter has been fully argued and may be of some significance to more persons than the parties, I will venture to take a few minutes of time in referring to the County Courts Act, 1934. The joint effect of s. 40 (1) and s. 48 (1) of the Act of 1934 is, plainly, that the county court's jurisdiction to try an ejectment action is strictly limited to cases where the value of the land in question or the rent payable in respect thereof does not exceed £100 per annum. It is to be noted, however, that for other classes of action, videlicet actions in contract or tort, though there is again a strict limit of jurisdiction, which cannot be exceeded even with the consent of the parties, provision is made by s. 42, as substituted by the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938, s. 19 (1), and sched. II, for the case where a plaintiff, who is suing, let us say, in contract for a sum in excess of the limit of the jurisdiction, may abandon the excess. He is then deemed to be suing only for the amount of the statutory limit. Section 42 (3) is, I think, important, for it provides:

"Where any action, in which the plaintiff has abandoned part of his claim under this section, is heard in a county court, the plaintiff shall not recover an amount exceeding £200 or £100, as the case may be, and the judgment of the court in the action shall be in full discharge of all demands in respect of the cause of action . . ."

It follows, therefore, by the terms of the statute, that, in the case of a contract, if, to give jurisdiction, a plaintiff abandons the excess, he abandons it for good and all, and the amount adjudged is a full discharge of the total claim. There is no similar provision in regard to ejectment actions, and, obviously, there could not be under the framework of the Act, but it may be that the presence of s. 42 and the provision in s. 42 (3) about an abandonment affected the minds of learned counsel and of the judge when he came to deal with the point taken by counsel for the defendants, namely, that the claim for ejectment was beyond the jurisdiction of the county court because of the value of the land. There is some dispute as to what occurred when that point was raised, and, to throw light on the matter, we were permitted by counsel for the defendants to look at the indorsement made by counsel for the plaintiff in the county court on his brief in that case, but I do not think that this additional piece of evidence assists the court. In view of certain further correspondence with the judge which was also put in (as secondary evidence, presumably, of the same fact) the result leaves the matter wrapped in the same obscurity as that in which it first started. It only remains to say that, whatever may have been in the mind of counsel for the plaintiff, is, of course, far less important than what was the reasonable apprehension, by the judge and the counsel opposed to him, of the words he used, but I think I may safely take it that the effect of what he had done is necessarily reflected in and recorded by the notes that the judge made at the trial. I use that phrase deliberately because this matter is not solved merely by looking at the judge's notes of what happened when the objection was taken by counsel for the defendants. The note is:

"On [the] objection [of counsel for the defendants] that the rent exceeds £100 a year and that I have no jurisdiction, [counsel for the plaintiff] elects to proceed on the alternative ground set out in para. 4 (as amended) of the amended particulars of claim."

The whole burden of the defendants' case is that the so-called "alternative ground" was the allegation that, the defendants being treated as in occupation of the house by right of contract, the question for the county court judge was whether one of the terms of sched. I to the Act of 1933 had been brought into play so as to give him power, if he thought it reasonable to exercise it, to make an order for possession. But para. 4 of the amended statement of claim, did not, at any rate primarily, make any such allegation. As an alternative to the plaintiff's first claim and by way of anticipation of a defence under the Rent Restrictions Acts, para. 4 alleged, I think, that the defendants had obtained possession of the premises by an unlawful sub-letting or assignment by someone else, and, therefore, that they had no right to remain there, and, in any event, an order could be made against them accordingly. If the learned county court judge had then and there said: "Now, let us see what is the issue you want me to try", and counsel had agreed on it and had had it all written down and clearly stated, no further trouble could have arisen. But the significant thing is that, so far from the issue being what counsel for the defendants said was the only issue that remained to be tried, the action then proceeded, and the question debated was whether, as a matter of fact, the defendants ever had any contract of tenancy or right to a contract of tenancy, i.e., whether they ever became, by assignment, sub-letting, or otherwise, "tenants" of the premises, which was the one thing which had to be admitted so as to found the jurisdiction under the Rent Restrictions Acts. After the trial had lasted some time, the learned county court judge came to this conclusion:

"Owing to lack of jurisdiction I am compelled to hold that the plaintiff's claim fails, as there is no evidence that the defendants are contractual or statutory tenants."

Therefore, the end of the matter was that the case stood as it had started. The judge found as a fact that there never was any contract of tenancy to which the defendants were entitled—in other words, that they were trespassers, having no right or title. Accordingly, he held that he was unable to make the order asked—not, observe, "because counsel for the plaintiff has elected not to sue on that ground", but "owing to lack of jurisdiction". That was the end of the county court proceedings. The plaintiff, not unnaturally, then issued his proceedings in the High Court and merely claimed ejectment against the defendants on the footing that they were trespassers. The point was taken by the defendants that he was estopped by what occurred in the county court, and that he had elected to abandon for ever the claim that the defendants were trespassers and were not there by right of contract. It is, indeed, a Gilbertian situation, if I may so, because the allegation is that the plaintiff abandoned the right to assert that which the judge in the county court action (where the plaintiff is supposed to have made his abandonment) found as a fact. PARKER,

J., was persuaded that that plea was well-founded and that the plaintiff had abandoned any claim to allege as a fact that the defendants were trespassers.

A This is a matter which may be capable of a great deal of exposition, but the case really falls within a small compass, and I think that the clue is to be found in the proper interpretation of para. 4 of the particulars of claim in the county court action. Once the true significance of that paragraph is understood, it seems to me to follow that, not only in justice, but in common sense, no such abandonment can be taken to have been made. I repeat that it is not a case within the authorities to which counsel for the defendants referred, where there are inconsistent rights or claims, or where a man, in the well-known phrase, basing himself on assumpsit "God-like waives the tort". That follows, in my judgment, (i) from the nature of para. 4; (ii) from the fact that, as recorded by the county court judge, what counsel for the plaintiff elected to do was to proceed on his para. 4 as pleaded; (iii) from the fact that the case thereupon was tried out by the county court judge to discover whether, as a fact, there was any such tenancy; and (iv) by the nature of the judge's conclusions, refusing relief to the plaintiff, not on the ground of the plaintiff's election, but on the ground of his own want of jurisdiction.

C In the High Court the evidence was again gone into, and, although it was not, in the circumstances, necessary to express a conclusion, PARKER, J., said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 842):

" . . . if I am wrong [on the point about the estoppel], I should be forced to hold on the evidence that the defendants at no time have become tenants of the plaintiff . . . "

D The long and confusing proceedings which have occurred have, at any rate, made one fact doubly clear. Two judges have found, in two actions, that the defendants at no time were tenants of the plaintiff, and the county court judge also found that the defendants never had a tenancy of the premises. The result, is, I think, that the conclusion of PARKER, J., cannot be sustained. I think that the appeal should be allowed, and that the plaintiff is, in the circumstances, entitled to an order for possession.

F BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment delivered by the Master of the Rolls, and, as he has dealt fully and lucidly with all the points, it would be idle to repeat them. It is clear that, when the defendants took the point in the county court that the claim for ejectment was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, there was considerable confusion and misunderstanding as to what occurred and what was intended by counsel for the plaintiff. It was contended, on the one side, that there was a complete abandonment of the claim that the defendants were trespassers, and, on the other side, that no such abandonment was intended or occurred. In the decision under appeal, G PARKER, J., took the view that the claim had been abandoned. I should like to emphasise the point that, if the matter had been dealt with in the county court with greater precision in regard to the issue which was being contested, many of the subsequent difficulties would have been avoided. I think that the case turns, not on the law of election, but on the true construction of para. 4 of the amended statement of claim in the county court, and I heartily agree with the interpretation which the Master of the Rolls has given to the paragraph.

H MORRIS, L.J.: I also entirely agree. PARKER, J., proceeded on the basis that in the county court action the plaintiff had abandoned his claim in trespass and had finally elected to treat the defendants as tenants. If that basis had been established, I think that PARKER, J., would have arrived at a correct conclusion, but, when the proceedings in the court court are fully analysed, I think it appears that there was no final election by the plaintiff to treat the defendants as tenants. When it was decided to proceed to consider para. 4 of the particulars of claim in the county court action, there was, I think, no real appreciation of what was involved in the plea in that paragraph. I agree fully with the analysis of the matter that has been made by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and I could not in any way add to what has been said. The result was that at the end of the hearing in the county court, after the learned judge had heard the evidence and heard much argument, the parties, so to speak, "came out by that same door wherein they went". They found themselves exactly where they started. They found that what had been advanced by the evidence and in argument on behalf of the plaintiff was really in support of a claim to possession on the ground that the defendants were trespassers. The result, therefore, in my judgment, is that nothing that took place at the county court amounted to an election to treat the defendants as tenants. That being so, it seems to me that the claim of the plaintiff in the High Court was not defeated as has been submitted by the defendants.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Morris, L.J.J.), July 30, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Shop—Renewal of tenancy—Tenancy at will—Tenancy coming "to an end . . . by the expiration of a notice to quit"—Determination by service of writ in action for possession—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (c. 38), s. 10 (1).

Landlords served on a tenant a writ claiming possession of shop premises which the tenant held under tenancies at will. The tenant thereupon applied, under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, for the renewal of the tenancies.

HELD: the service of the writ in the possession action did not constitute a "notice to quit given by the landlord" by the expiration of which the tenancies had come to an end within s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1951, and, therefore, the sub-section did not apply and the tenant's applications failed.

Semble: section 10 (1) did not apply to a tenancy at will.

FOR THE LEASEHOLD PROPERTY (TEMPORARY PROVISIONS) ACT, 1951, s. 10 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 30, p. 206.

APPEALS by the tenant against orders of His Honour JUDGE HOWARD in the Southend County Court dated May 13, 1953, dismissing applications for the renewal of the tenancies of shop premises under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (1).

The tenant alleged that the tenancies were tenancies at will and had been determined by the service of a writ in an action by the landlords for possession, which service constituted a notice to quit within the sub-section. The landlords contended that the service of the writ did not amount to a notice to quit, and, therefore, that the tenancies had not "come to an end . . . by the expiration of a notice to quit given by the landlord" within the meaning of the sub-section, which, accordingly, did not apply. They also contended that the sub-section did not apply to a tenancy at will.

SINGLETON, L.J.: These appeals arise out of certain applications under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. The tenant, Mr. Martinali, was in occupation of various properties which belonged to the landlords, who were the personal representatives of Mr. Frederic Francis Ramuz, deceased. There had been six leases in respect of the properties, which leases had expired, four on June 24, 1950, and the last two on Mar. 25, 1951. There had been applications by the tenant under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, which failed. On Dec. 5, 1951, the landlords issued a writ claiming possession of all the premises. That was followed by applications by the tenant under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, for new leases. In each of those applications, one in respect of each property, it was said that the date of the termination of the tenancy was Dec. 8, 1951, and that the mode of termination was by service of a writ in a High Court action by the landlords claiming possession.

The learned county court judge had these applications for new leases before him, and the whole question, as I see it, depended on the view which he took of s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1951, which is in these terms:

"(1) The provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for enabling the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which this section applies (hereinafter referred to as 'the expiring tenancy') to apply to the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act to obtain, the grant of a new tenancy where apart from the next following section the expiring tenancy would come to an end immediately before the date of the commencement of this Act or within the period of two years beginning with that date, and would so come to an end by effluxion of time or by the expiration of a notice to quit given by the landlord, whether before or after the commencement of this Act."

It is said by counsel for the tenant that, after the terms granted by the leases had expired, there arose in each case a tenancy at will, and for the purposes of this case, and for no other purpose, it is assumed there was in each case a tenancy at will. Counsel then submitted that each tenancy at will was brought to an end by the service of the writ in December, 1951, which service he claimed was (within the definition in the Act) a notice to quit. So far as I know a writ has never been held to be a notice to quit. A notice to quit is a well-recognised term. In order to bring the case within s. 10 (1) it has to be shown that the tenancy within the stipulated time came to an end either by effluxion of time (which does not arise) or by the expiration of a notice to quit given by the landlord. There was no notice to quit given by these landlords. There were at the most tenancies at will. The learned county court judge did not think that s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1951 covered a tenancy at will. Counsel for the landlords desires to keep that point open and no good purpose would be served by my considering it, but for what it is worth I would say that I share the view of the learned county court judge having regard to the wording of the section. But, assuming that it could be said that a tenancy at will was within the contemplation of s. 10 (1), still there was in this case no notice to quit, so that it cannot be said that the tenancies were brought to an end by the expiration of a notice to quit. That is sufficient to dispose of this appeal. I agree with the judgment of the learned county court judge, and I am satisfied that the appeals ought to be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. It is elementary that a tenancy at will is determined by a demand for possession, not by a notice to quit. These tenancies at will were determined by the issue of a writ claiming possession, which is itself a demand for possession. The tenancies were not determined by a notice to quit at all, and the case, therefore, does not come within the extension provisions of the Act of 1951.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Appeals dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Denning, L.JJ.), July 10, 22, 1953.]

Writ—Service—Service more than twelve months from date of issue—Unconditional appearance by defendants—Waiver of irregularity—R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1; Ord. 64, r. 7.

A plaintiff in an action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, issued a writ within twelve months of the death as required by s. 3 of that Act, but only effected service of it more than twelve months after its date, when, by virtue of R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, it had ceased to be in force. The defendants entered an unconditional appearance to the writ, and later applied to have the service set aside on the ground that the writ had become a nullity.

HELD: failure to serve the writ within the prescribed time did not render it a nullity, but was an irregularity which had been waived by the defendants' unconditional appearance, and, therefore, service of the writ would not be set aside.

APPEAL by the plaintiff against an order of BARRY, J., dated June 15, 1953, and reported ante, p. 382, affirming an order of a master setting aside the service of a writ on the ground that it was out of time. The plaintiff contended that failure to serve the writ until more than twelve months after its date, Oct. 3, 1951, i.e., on Oct. 7, 1952, when, under R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, it had ceased to be in force, did not render the writ a nullity, but was an irregularity which had been waived by the second defendants' entering an unconditional appearance to the writ. The first defendants had entered a conditional appearance only and had successfully applied to have the service on them set aside.

July 22. SINGLETON, L.J.: The writ in the action was issued on Oct. 3, 1951, just within the twelve months' limit prescribed by s. 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846. There were two defendants, neither of whom was served with the writ within twelve months from the day of its date. We are only concerned with the second defendants, Dawnays, Ltd. The first defendants entered a conditional appearance and successfully applied to have service on them set aside. The second defendants entered an unconditional appearance. The affidavit of their secretary shows that they heard of the first defendants' successful application. Thereafter they made an application of the like kind. The summons is dated Nov. 25, 1952. The master granted the application and set aside the service of the writ. On appeal, BARRY, J., upheld the order of the master. He said that it was a difficult case, and he granted leave to appeal to this court. On the facts as to service, I am in complete agreement with the master and the judge. Indeed, there was no appeal as to this.

Under R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, the writ of summons ceases to be in force after twelve months from the day of the date thereof. A note in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, at p. 59, says:

A "This means shall be in force for the purpose of service for twelve months, not that the writ ceases to be efficacious for any purpose whatever. And after an undertaking by solicitors to accept service and appear (see Ord. 9, r. 1), it would require a very strong case to induce the court to refuse renewal."

B Support for that statement is to be found in Re Kerly, Son & Verden (1): see the judgment of FARWELL, J., in the court of first instance ([1901] 1 Ch. 471), and that of STIRLING, L.J., in the Court of Appeal (ibid., 478).

Order 64, r. 7, provides:

C "A court or a judge shall have power to enlarge or abridge the time appointed by these rules, or fixed by an order enlarging time, for doing any act or taking any proceeding, upon such terms (if any) as the justice of the case may require, and any such enlargement may be ordered although the application for the same is not made until after the expiration of the time appointed or allowed. Provided that when the time for delivering any pleading or document or filing any affidavit, answer or document, or doing any act is or has been fixed or limited by any of these rules or by any direction on or under the summons for directions or by any order of the court or a judge the costs of any application to extend such time and of any order made thereon shall be borne by the party making such application unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order."

D It has been held over a long period of years that this rule enables the court to renew a writ even though application is not made until after the expiration of the twelve months laid down in Ord. 8, r. 1. The court will not normally exercise its discretion in favour of the renewal of a writ after the period of service has expired if the effect of doing so will be to deprive a defendant of the benefit of a limitation which has accrued. In the present case, if the order of BARRY, J., is right, the second defendants are free, for it is too late for the issue of another writ, having regard to the terms of s. 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846.

E The position was considered by the Court of Appeal in Battersby v. Anglo-American Oil Co., Ltd. (2), in which the court would not exercise its discretion in favour of the renewal of a writ after the period allowed for service had expired, nor allow an amendment of the pleadings to be made the effect of which would be to deprive the defendants of the benefit of a limitation which had accrued. Learned counsel for the defendants who appealed argued ([1945] K.B. 24):

H "Where an original writ of summons has been in force for more than twelve months without being renewed it is no longer in force and is a nullity: R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1; but by virtue of what is now Ord. 64, r. 7, there is normally power to renew it after the expiration of that period of twelve months: Re Jones (3). The court, however, will never exercise this discretion when its exercise will defeat the vested rights of a defendant to plead a statute of limitations."

The court accepted that submission. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was delivered by LORD GODDARD, who said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 389):

"Before dealing with the authorities on this point we think we ought to refer to one matter dealt with in the judgment of MACKINNON, L.J., in Holman v. George Elliott & Co., Ltd. (4), which was not strictly necessary for the decision, but from which we feel constrained to differ. That, also, was a case under the Fatal Accidents Act; and, as in the present action, a writ was issued within twelve months of the death, but was not served, and application for renewal was not made within twelve months of the date of issue. Acceding to an argument advanced by the plaintiff, MacKINNON, L.J., is reported as saying ([1944] 1 All E.R. 640): 'Counsel for the plaintiff points out, and I think with reason, that this is not a case where the order of the judge in extending the period for the delivery of the writ deprives the defendants of an accrued right of defence . . . under Lord Campbell's Act. The right of defence by the limitations section . . . would arise if the writ had not been issued before Oct. 9, 1942. It was, in fact, issued on Oct. 7, 1942, two days before the expiry of the twelve months.' With all respect, we are unable to agree that the issue of a writ which has become a nullity by reason of non-service within the prescribed time satisfies the section. If the writ has ceased to be in force the position is the same as if it had never been issued; otherwise we see no reason for the concluding words of Ord. 8, r. 1, which provides for a renewed writ preventing the operation of statutes of limitation. These words would be unnecessary if a writ which had expired and had not been renewed would answer that purpose. A new writ issued more than twelve months after the date, would clearly be out of time, so either the writ originally issued must be renewed or the action is barred."

I do not regard it as strictly accurate to describe a writ which has not been served within twelve months as a nullity. It is not as though it had never been issued. It is something which can be renewed. A nullity cannot be renewed. The court can grant an application which results in making it just as effective as it was before the twelve months' period had elapsed. I do not think that the court had in mind what had been said in Kerly's case (1) ([1901] 1 Ch. 471, 478), to which I have referred. Moreover, it was not necessary for the decision of the court in Battersby's case (2) to consider this. The question was whether the court would exercise the discretion which it had under Ord. 64, r. 7, to renew a writ when the renewal would deprive a defendant of the benefit of a limitation which had accrued, and the judgment was to the effect that the discretion ought not to be exercised in such circumstances. If the writ had been a nullity, there would have been no point in considering whether the court should exercise its discretion to renew it. The position under Ord. 8, r. 1, is that the writ is not in force for the purpose of service after the twelve months' period had run. It is still a writ. The unconditional appearance by the second defendants is a step in the action. It amounts to a waiver with regard to service. It prevents the second defendants' being able to contend successfully that the service on them is bad.

It does not appear that the attention of BARRY, J., was drawn to Ord. 12, r. 30, which is in these terms:

"A defendant before appearing shall be at liberty, without obtaining an order to enter or entering a conditional appearance, to take out a summons in the Queen's Bench Division and in any other Division take out a summons or serve notice of motion to set aside the service upon him of the writ or of notice of the writ, or to discharge the order authorising such service."

That rule provides the procedure for setting aside service of the writ. See the note in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 144, under the order, "Before appearing". The rule gives support for the view which I have stated above.

Counsel for the second defendants submitted that there was still an inherent jurisdiction in the court to set aside service of the writ. I do not see why we should be asked to act on any such assumption when there is a practice rule which is clear in its terms, and appears to recognise the entering of an unconditional appearance as a step in the action. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: It is enacted that every action for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846,

“shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the death”

A of the deceased person. This action was commenced within that time. The death was on Oct. 12, 1950. The writ was issued on Oct. 3, 1951. That writ should have been served within the next twelve months, because under R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, a writ does not remain in force for more than twelve months unless the court gives leave to renew it, and the court does not, as a rule, give leave to renew a writ if the effect of so doing would be to deprive the defendant of the benefit of a statute of limitation: see Battersby v. Anglo-American Oil Co., Ltd. (2).

B This writ was not served within the twelve months permitted by the rule. It was served three or four days out of time. The first defendants thereupon entered a conditional appearance and got the service on them set aside. That meant that they obtained the benefit of the statutory limitation, because all C that the plaintiff could then do, as against them, was to issue a new writ which would be statute-barred. The second defendants, however, did not notice that the writ was served out of time. On Oct. 13, 1952, they entered an unconditional appearance, but they soon afterwards got to know what the first defendants had done, and then they also applied to get the service of the writ set aside. The question is whether they are prevented from so doing by reason of their D unconditional appearance. This depends on whether the service of a writ after the twelve months permitted by the rule has expired is a nullity or an irregularity. If it was an irregularity, then the irregularity was waived by the unconditional appearance. But if it was a nullity, then it could not be waived at all. It was not only bad, but incurably bad.

E In determining the question, it is important to notice that, even after twelve months have expired, the writ can be renewed. This is not done under Ord. 8, r. 1, for that only permits renewal before the twelve months have expired. It is done under Ord. 64, r. 7, which is the general rule permitting enlargement of time. It was first done in 1877 by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Jones (3), which has been accepted as good law ever since. Now, if a writ can be renewed after the twelve months have expired, that must mean that it is not then a F nullity.

There are other reasons, too, why the writ cannot be considered a nullity. Suppose a defendant, who is served after the twelve months, deliberately enters an unconditional appearance and goes to trial. It may be that it is a case in which no statute of limitation avails him and he does not think it worth while to object to the service of the writ, because he knows that it would only mean G the issue of a fresh one. Could he thereafter turn round and say that all the proceedings were void on the ground that the writ was a nullity? Clearly not. That shows that the service out of time was only an irregularity which could be waived.

H The judge likened this case to one where a mere form of writ (which had never been issued out of the Central Office) was served. Such a form would, I agree, be a nullity. No waiver could give effect to it or to any subsequent proceedings founded on it. I cannot regard that as anything like this case. If we accept the plaintiff's evidence, the writ was served by post on Oct. 1, 1952, and should have reached the second defendants on Oct. 2, 1952, before the twelve months had expired. It was delayed in the post and did not in fact reach them until Oct. 7, 1952, after the twelve months had expired. The delay was a matter known to them and not to the plaintiff. If they chose to waive any objection to it, they should be held bound by their waiver. They should not be allowed to turn round and say that the writ itself was a nullity. If they could say so now, they could also say so at a much later stage, even after the trial. I cannot believe that to be the law.

It follows that I think that the dictum in Battersby's case (2) ([1944] 2 All E.R. 389) is incorrect. When the rule says that after twelve months the writ is no longer in force, it only means that it is no longer in force for the purpose of service: see Re Kerly, Son & Verden (1) ([1901] 1 Ch. 479). In my opinion, the service of the writ after the twelve months was not a nullity but an irregularity which was waived by the unconditional appearance. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

B APPEAL by the third defendant, the legal personal representative of Reginald Seymour Allen, from an order of VAISEY, J., dated Mar. 4, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 308.

C On an originating summons to determine, inter alia, whether the devise by Henry George Allen of his dwelling-house "Paskeston" and of other hereditaments referred to in the third codicil to his will to the eldest of the sons of Francis Seymour Allen (excepting his son Hugh) who should be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church was valid or void for uncertainty, VAISEY, J., held that the terms "member of the Church of England" and "adherent to the doctrine of that church" were incapable of exact definition, and, therefore, the condition was void for uncertainty, and it followed that the devise failed.

D Hunter-Brown for the third defendant.

Elles for the second, sixth and seventh defendants, who were interested if the devise were void.

R. O. Wilberforce for the plaintiff, one of the trustees of the will.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. The following judgments were read.

E SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: By a third codicil dated Nov. 10, 1907, to his will made in the previous year the testator, Henry George Allen, gave and devised his dwelling-house "Paskeston" in Pembrokeshire and certain other property, subject to certain prior limited interests which determined in 1952, "to the eldest of the sons of" his nephew Francis S. Allen

F "who shall be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church."

The codicil further provided that

"in case there shall be no son of the said Francis . . . who shall be a member of the Church of England or an adherent to the doctrines [sic] of that church I devise and bequeath the said dwelling-house and other property"

G in the events which have happened to Wilfred Baugh Allen, in the codicil called Judge Wilfred Allen, and his heirs. The testator died in November, 1908.

The present proceedings were begun by way of originating summons, one of the present personal representatives of the testator being the plaintiff. The defendants, in addition to a life tenant of the premises in question who has since died, consisted of the personal representatives of two of the sons of Francis S. Allen, the third of his sons, the personal representative of Wilfred Baugh Allen, and the personal representative of the testator's heir-at-law. The first question asked by the summons was whether the devise in favour of the eldest of the sons of Francis S. Allen, already recited, was valid or void for uncertainty. The second and third questions arose only on an answer being given to the first in favour of the validity of the devise. The fourth question asked whether, in the event that the devise was held void, the subject-matter of the devise devolved on Wilfred Baugh Allen or his estate by virtue of the later direction in the codicil which I have also quoted or devolved as on the testator's intestacy. The remaining questions related to matters not relevant to this appeal.

By his order of Mar. 4, 1953, VAISEY, J., declared in answer to the first question that the devise in favour of the eldest of the sons of Francis S. Allen was void for uncertainty. He answered the fourth question in a sense favourable to the personal representatives of Wilfred Baugh Allen. In the view which the judge took, nothing turned on the difference in language in the two references in the codicil to membership of the Church of England and adherence to its doctrine or doctrines, for he held both references to be too uncertain to be capable of being effective. The personal representative of the eldest of the sons of Francis Allen, who was the third defendant (but neither of her co-defendants in a similar interest) has appealed to this court against VAISEY, J.'s answer to the first question in the summons and the only respondents before us (apart from the plaintiff) are the personal representatives of Wilfred Baugh Allen. The representative of the testator's heir-at-law has not himself appealed and was not represented before us.

At the beginning of his judgment, containing a considerable analysis of the significance of membership of the Church of England and of the character of the doctrines of that church (matters on which the learned judge has notably great knowledge and experience) VAISEY, J., referred ([1953] 1 All E.R. 309) to the relevant formula as a "description, qualification or condition", but it is, I think, clear from later passages (see, for example, ibid., 313) that he regarded it as either a condition precedent or a qualification distinct in either case from a condition subsequent. The judge was, in my opinion, plainly right in his view that the formula here in question is not a condition subsequent. In my judgment, the effect of such a formula as part of a condition subsequent differs from its effect in a condition precedent or as part of a qualification or limitation. I understand from the passage in his judgment referring to Clayton v. Ramsden (1) that the judge was also of that opinion, and I agree with him in differing from the New Zealand case of Re Biggs (2) in so far as the judge in that case expressed the contrary view.

A condition subsequent operates to divest or determine a gift or estate previously or otherwise vested, so that if the condition be void the gift or estate remains. It has been long established that the courts (which are inclined against the divesting of gifts or estates already vested) will hold a condition subsequent void if its terms are such that (apart from mere difficulties of construction of the language or of the ascertainment of the facts) it cannot be clearly known in advance or from the beginning what are the circumstances the happening of which will cause the divesting or determination of the gift or estate. The strictness of the special rule as to conditions subsequent was the basis of all the opinions of the noble Lords in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) and was thus expressed by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1943] 1 All E.R. 18):

"The courts have always insisted that conditions of defeasance, in order to be valid, should be so framed that the persons affected (or the court if they seek its guidance) can from the outset know with certainty the exact event upon the happening of which their interests are to be divested. The principle was enunciated many years ago by LORD CRANWORTH in Clavering v. Ellison (3) in the following words (7 H.L. Cas. 725): '... where a vested estate is to be defeated by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, that condition must be such that the court can see from the beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine'."

I feel, therefore, no doubt that if the present formula constituted a condition subsequent it would, for the reasons fully set out by VAISEY, J., be held to be void—its second part falls clearly, I think, within the reasoning and language of LORD RUSSELL and LORD ROMER in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) (ibid., 18, 20) to which I shall later again refer.

A It appears that the avoidance of a condition precedent may or may not (in the case of personality) carry with it the avoidance of the gift according as the condition is the sole motive of the gift: see Re Piper (4). In the present case, if the formula constitutes a condition precedent, I will assume that failure to satisfy the condition will involve failure to take the benefit of the devise. The same result is equally (if not more) clear if the formula is not a condition at all but part of the description of the devisee (as though it were to the eldest son who should have red hair)—in other words, if it is a limitation or qualification, as I think it is: see, for example, per TOMLIN, J., in Re Wilkinson (5) and Re Wolfe's Will Trusts (6), decided by HARMAN, J., in May, 1953. In any case, and whether the formula be a condition precedent or a qualification, it seems to me that no such general or academic test is called for as a condition subsequent requires. All that the claiming devisee has to do is at the relevant date to establish, if he can, that he satisfies the condition or qualification whatever be the appropriate test. If the formula is such as to involve questions of degree (as prima facie is implicit in any requirement of "adherence" or "attachment" to a particular faith or creed) the uncertainty of the test contemplated may well invalidate the formula as a condition subsequent, but will not, in my judgment, necessarily do so in the case of a condition precedent, for if the claimant be able to satisfy any or at least any reasonable test, is he disentitled to the benefit of the gift? The essential difference which, I think, exists, and to which I have alluded, was well illustrated by counsel for the third defendant in the course of argument. A condition subsequent divesting an estate vested in A. if A. at some relevant date should not be a tall man would, as it seems to me, be held void for uncertainty. For tallness being a matter of degree, by what standard is it, for the supposed purposes, to be judged? If "tallness" is achieved by being above the "average" height, then what average is contemplated? The average of A.'s town or neighbourhood, the average of Englishmen, the average of all mankind? And would a man in height above the average, say, of all Englishmen by however small a fraction of an inch, be called "tall" in any ordinary sense? But questions of this kind, which might be fatal to the supposed formula as a condition subsequent, might have no application in the case of a condition precedent or qualification, for a claimant who was six feet six inches tall might fairly say that he satisfied the testator's requirement judged by any reasonable standard.

F It may well be that, in a case such as I have supposed, very difficult questions might arise, e.g., if the claimant proved that he was a man very slightly above the average height of Englishmen. The court would then have to decide on the facts and on the construction of the bequest (e.g., that by "tall" the testator had meant "lofty") whether the claimant satisfied the requirements of the testator and had established his claim to the gift. But I am not persuaded that where a formula constitutes a condition precedent or a qualification it is right for the court to declare the condition or qualification void for uncertainty so as thereby to defeat all possible claimants to the gift, unless the terms of the condition or qualification are such that it is impossible to give them any meaning at all or such that they involve repugnancies or inconsistencies in the possible tests which they postulate as distinct, for example, from mere problems of degree.

H If I have correctly stated the relevant principles, I now try to apply them to the formula here in question. As regards the qualification of membership of the Church of England it seems to me that notwithstanding the differences in degree which the language contemplates they do not suffice to render void for uncertainty this part of a formula regarded as a qualification. Thus, if it so happened that the eldest of the sons of Francis Allen was at the relevant date (whatever that date may be) a prelate or dignitary of the church, he would fairly claim to satisfy any reasonable test implicit in the words—the contrary view might at least, to my mind, be said to shock common sense. Indeed, I venture, on my part, to think that if membership of the Church of England be regarded as a qualification, the language of STIRLING, J., in Re Perry Almshouses (7) is fairly appropriate ([1898] 1 Ch. 400):

“Whatever difficulty there may be in giving a strict legal definition of what constitutes membership of the Church of England, I think that a person who has been baptised, has been confirmed, or is ready and desirous to be confirmed, and is an actual communicant, does hold the status of a member of that church, and would be ordinarily regarded and spoken of as such.”

For if a trust for the benefit of members of the Church of England be a good charitable trust, then members of the Church of England must be a definable class or section of the public and membership of the church an intelligible qualification for membership of the class of possible beneficiaries. On this part of the case, I respectfully adopt the reasoning of ROMER, L.J., whose judgment I have had the advantage of reading in advance.

The second part of the formula is, however, in my view, very much more difficult. The testator clearly intended that the devisee should not only outwardly “belong to” the Church of England but that his membership should be in some sense conscientious as well. So much it is easy to state, but the references to “adherence” and to the “doctrine” of the church raise inevitably the problems of uncertainty and degree to which LORD RUSSELL and LORD ROMER drew attention in their opinions in Clayton v. Ramsden (1), which are illustrated in the judgment of VAISEY, J., and which would clearly, in my view, be fatal in any event to the validity of the formula if it were part of the terms of a condition subsequent. But are the words when used as part of a qualification so uncertain as necessarily to vitiate the gift? With considerable hesitation I have come to the conclusion that they are not. On the evidence so far before the court, it does not seem to me that the words are shown to involve any insoluble inconsistency or that they are incapable of any reasonably clear meaning or any sensible definition at all—as might, for example, be the case if the devisee were required to be “a pure-blooded Englishman”. If the supposition again be made that the eldest of the sons of Francis Allen were a prelate or dignitary of the Church of England it seems to me liable to offend against common sense if the court were compelled to say that he was none the less incapable of taking because he was incapable of qualifying as “an adherent of the doctrine” of the church.

No case was cited to us—nor have I been able to discover a case—in which the validity of a comparable formula, constituting a condition precedent or a qualification, has been considered by the court. In W. R. Patton v. Toronto General Trusts Corp'n. (8) part of a condition precedent to enjoyment of an annuity was that the annuitant should “be of the Lutheran religion” and its validity was assumed (and acted on) by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a judgment delivered by LORD BLANESBURGH. I have already expressed my view that all the speeches in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) proceeded from the basis that the condition there under review was a condition subsequent requiring that the persons affected (or the court) should were to be divested (per LORD RUSSELL ([1943] 1 All E.R. 18)). It is, therefore, in that context that LORD RUSSELL’s later sentence should, in my judgment, be interpreted (ibid., 19):

“The requirement that a person shall be of the Jewish faith seems to me too vague to enable it to be said with certainty that a particular individual complies with the requirement."

LORD ROMER in the same case says (ibid., 23):

A " . . . in the Court of Appeal they answered this question [i.e., whether a man was of the Jewish faith,] by saying that whether a man was or was not of the Jewish faith was a mere question of fact to be determined on evidence . . . I should agree entirely with the Court of Appeal . . . if only I knew what was the meaning of the words 'of the Jewish faith'. Until I know that, I do not know to what the evidence is to be directed."

This language must again, in my view, be interpreted in its application to a provision for forfeiture. In his next sentence LORD ROMER states:

B "There are, of course, an enormous number of people who accept every tenet of and observe every rule of practice and conduct prescribed by the Jewish religion."

C If this be so, as I assume that it is, would not such persons be fairly described on any view as "adherents to the doctrine of the Jewish faith"? And if such adherence were the qualification required for beneficiaries under a trust, would not they at least be entitled to qualify?

D Of the other cases referred to by VAISEY, J., both the decision of FARWELL, J., in Re Tegg (9) and that of SMITH, J., in Re Lockie (10) related to conditions subsequent. The second New Zealand case, Re Biggs (2), may, on the other hand, have been a case of a condition precedent, the relevant words of which were, moreover, comparable to those in the present case. The relevant words of the gift were:

"To stand possessed of the residue . . . upon trust for my . . . grandson . . . absolutely should he survive me and attain the age of twenty-five years and at the date of my death or the attainment by him of the age of twenty-five years whichever last occurs be an adherent of the Church of the Province of New Zealand otherwise known as the Church of England."

E I have already stated my view that (with all respect to CALLAN, J.) the principles applicable to a condition precedent differ from those applicable to a condition subsequent. Moreover, on the facts of the case the result was the same if the condition was void for uncertainty whether it was a condition subsequent or a condition precedent, for, if the former, the grandson took free from the condition, and, if the latter, he took as the testatrix's sole next of kin. The learned F judge found it, therefore, unnecessary to decide whether the condition was precedent or subsequent.

In my view, therefore, it would not be right to say that the third defendant could not seek to establish as a matter of fact that Reginald Seymour Allen was, at whatever may be held to be the relevant date, an adherent of the doctrine of the church. It may be that the third defendant will fail in her proof, G for the onus will be on her, and the court will have to reach some conclusion at least as to the test to be applied. Counsel for the third defendant suggested in argument that an adherent of the doctrine of the Church of England meant "one who accepts in general the teaching of the Church of England as opposed to the teaching of any other church or denomination." Although we were not referred to the details of the evidence, I understand that R. S. Allen's mother

H was a Roman Catholic and that he was himself, at any rate at one time, a member of the Roman Catholic Church. It does not appear (though it would prima facie be relevant and admissible if it were the fact) that at the date of the codicil the testator was aware of Mr. Francis Allen's faith and that he held anti-Catholic views. If so, proof that R. S. Allen had genuinely forsaken the Catholic Church for the Church of England might be held to amount to substantial compliance with the requirement and, therefore, to satisfy the qualification. It also seems to me that the required degree of "adherence" would be that appropriate to a lay member of the church rather than to a priest. My present inclination, on the facts now before the court, is to think that by his double qualification the testator intended that at the material date the designated beneficiary should not only have (formally) joined the Church of England and, therefore, (formally) left any other church or denomination to which he had belonged, but that he should also have to prove to the satisfaction of the trustees (or, if necessary, the court) that his membership of the church was conscientious; that is to say, it at least involved, if he had left some other church or denomination, that he had, in general or substantially, renounced the distinct doctrines or tenets of that other church in favour of the distinct doctrines or tenets of the Church of England. But unless I am wrong in the principles which I have sought to apply, it is not, I think, useful or possible, to attempt further exposition in the absence of the evidence. If the third defendant desires to prosecute her claim, she must place such evidence of the relevant facts as she can before the court, and the court must then decide whether, on the facts so proved, R. S. Allen can fairly be said to have substantially complied with the requirement which the testator intended to impose.

I think it follows from what I have said that, had the language of the condition in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) relating to the Jewish faith formed part of a qualification or condition precedent, it is probable (at least) that the decision of the House would have been in a sense opposite to that in the case which was decided. It follows also, I think, that the principles applicable to a condition precedent must be taken materially to differ from those applicable to a condition subsequent (and it is not always easy to determine whether a condition is of the one kind or the other). Right or wrong, I accept these consequences, and I am able to do so with somewhat less misgiving for these reasons. First, because, on the matter of principle, I think VAISEY, J., was also of that opinion: secondly, because in the case of a will it is in general the function and duty of a court to construe the testator's language with reasonable liberality and to try, if it can, to give sensible effect to the intention he has expressed. To this general rule, conditions subsequent seem to me to be an exception. The requirement that it must be known with certainty from the outset what are the exact events which will cause a forfeiture or divesting (to borrow once again the language of LORD RUSSELL) seems to me to be founded on principles well established by authority, but peculiarly applicable to provisions for forfeiting or divesting an estate or interest previously conferred. For these reasons, I think the appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: If the question which calls for an answer in this appeal were being asked for the first time in the courts, I should have thought that the answer could be given without very much doubt or hesitation. "Is this man a member of the Church of England?", would seem to me to be a question that could be answered quite simply "Yes" or "No". It would certainly be surprising to be met with the reply that the words were so vague and uncertain that no reply could be given. Similarly, if the question were asked: "Is this man an adherent to the doctrine of the Church of England?", I should have thought that it would be possible to answer the question with equal ease. It is quite true that the apparent simplicity of the questions may be made to look extremely deceptive by saying: "It all depends on what you mean by 'member' or 'adherent' or 'doctrine'", and widely varying definitions of the words may be given, so that what at first sight seemed simple and quite straightforward, becomes clouded and difficult and obscure. But when a testator uses the words "a member of the Church of England", he must not be assumed to be speaking as a learned theologian or an ecclesiastical historian, with special meanings in his mind, or with refinements and reservations. He must be assumed to be an ordinary man using ordinary language.

Millions of people today use precisely the same words when they say with complete assurance: "I am a member of the Church of England." The words have a clear and definite meaning and are understood to mean exactly what they say. If those people are called on to make some formal acknowledgment of the religion they profess, they reply with the same confident assurance: "Church of England." If a poll were taken in this country and the question asked was: "What is your religion?", millions of people would answer: "Church of England", just as others would answer, "Methodist", "Baptist", "Congregationalist", "Member of the Society of Friends", "Roman Catholic", or some other designation. The word "religion" would be used here in its meaning of some particular system of faith and worship, in distinction to the wider and truer meaning of religion as the recognition of some higher power in the world and the acceptance of the standards of spiritual and practical life that this recognition involves. Almshouses for aged poor persons who are members of the Church of England have long been established and recognised; scholarships for sons of members of the Church of England have presented no difficulty; and instances of this kind could be multiplied. In a word, in practice, the use of the words "a member of the Church of England" has long been understood as conveying a clear and definite meaning.

To say, therefore, as it is said in the present appeal, that when a testator speaks of a "member of the Church of England" he has used words that are not capable of any certain meaning, is at first sight extremely surprising. It is, no doubt, true that, if the persons who confidently assert that they are members of the Church of England were asked to define what they regard as the qualifications for membership, they would make answers that differed widely from each other. Some would say that they had been brought up in the Church of England from their infancy, and had never given allegiance to any other church or denomination; some would rely on the fact that they attended the services of the church with regularity and never attended any other; some would rely on having been baptised in the parish church, on having been confirmed, and on being regular communicants at the church; but in one way or another, they would all unite in saying that they were members of the Church of England. So far as I know, they would all be members of the Church of England, and in practice certainly, they would all be so regarded.

I am not unmindful of the fact that it was this wide diversity of view which led VAISEY, J., to say ([1953] 1 All E.R. 313):

"There are so many views as to what 'member of the Church of England' means that I should have thought that those words, even alone, were incapable of having attached to them a definite meaning."

It might, perhaps, be said that there are so many ways of becoming a member of the Church of England that uniformity is not to be expected, but, in the absence of any precise and rigid test of membership, it seems to me that the words "a member of the Church of England" have a definite meaning. Quite apart from the clergy, to whom, perhaps, different considerations apply, does anybody doubt that distinguished and devout laymen, who proclaim themselves to be members of the Church of England, could not be allowed to show why they were members of the Church of England?

Similarly, when a man says: "I am an adherent to the doctrine of the Church of England", I should have thought that he was only saying what millions of people who attend the services of the church, recite the creeds, use the book of common prayer, and sing the hymns of the church, and gather from these things the distinctive teaching of the Church of England, say with confidence and assurance, and what presumably the testator was accustomed to say, if one may judge from his use of the words in his testamentary dispositions. It is not to be supposed that one who was so anxious that those who benefited under his will should adhere to the doctrine of the Church of England did not know what the doctrine was to which he desired his beneficiaries to adhere.

It is said that the testator has given no indication of what the doctrine of the Church of England was that he had in mind, and no guide as to the degree of adherence that he had in mind either; but as I say, if the matter was being discussed for the first time in the courts, I think that, giving plain words their plain meaning, and interpreting the testator's words to ascertain his intention, the question in the originating summons would not have presented the difficulty which it does in the circumstances of today. For the question does not come before the court for the first time, and has, indeed, been the subject of great and prolonged disputation and examination by many learned judges, and many judicial decisions have been given. It is, therefore, necessary to consider the question before us in this appeal in the light of that history, and the judicial decisions. A

Mr. Henry George Allen died in 1908, and by a codicil to his will dated Nov. 10, 1907, he devised his estate of "Paskeston" in Pembrokeshire, subject to life estates which expired in 1952, to the eldest of the sons of his nephew Francis "who shall be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church". The proceedings with which we are today concerned arise out of the answer made by VAISEY, J., to the first question asked in the originating summons. That question asked whether the devise made by the testator in the terms set out, was valid, or was void for uncertainty. VAISEY, J., answered that, in his view, it was void for uncertainty, and this appeal is brought against that decision. It seems particularly fitting for me, in discussing the judgment of VAISEY, J., to acknowledge the great learning and the wide experience of the learned judge in the Chancery Division, and also his special knowledge of things ecclesiastical, to which I can make no claim. But I think some of the problems are solved once it becomes clear that the words used by the testator are not to be regarded as a condition subsequent. VAISEY, J., was clearly of opinion that the words were not to be regarded as a condition subsequent, and, further, that there was a distinction to be observed in construing words when they formed a condition subsequent, as opposed to a condition precedent, when questions affecting the certainty of the meaning of the words were being considered. It was for this reason that he found Clayton v. Ramsden (1) of little help, and differed from the judgment of CALLAN, J., in the New Zealand case of Re Biggs (2). B

The material words in Re Biggs (2) were "adherent of . . . the Church of England", and the learned judge had expressed the view that the standard of certainty required was the same, whether the words used formed a condition subsequent or a condition precedent. It was from this view that VAISEY, J., dissented. In my opinion, the words employed by the testator in the case before us should be considered as a description or qualification or a condition precedent and not as a condition subsequent. C

In the earlier part of his judgment VAISEY, J., discussed the various ways in which a man might claim to be a member of the Church of England, and in one passage he says ([1953] 1 All E.R. 310): D

"Another, and much narrower, meaning is that a member of the Church of England is a person who, having been baptised and confirmed, regularly attends the parish church, conforms, so far as he can, to the discipline which is laid down by the formularies and has his name on the electoral roll of the parish, and would describe himself as a member of the Church of England, or, at any rate, would say negatively: 'I am not a dissenter or a nonconformist. I am a churchman'." E

I should imagine that a high proportion of those calling themselves members of the Church of England, if called on to explain why they so called themselves, would (possibly with a little prompting) make this answer or one very like it, but, F in my view, they are entitled to call themselves members of the Church of England, although other people may give different reasons why they so describe themselves. The testator did not say more than "a member of the Church of England", and once a man has shown himself to be such a member, the description is satisfied. The slightest acquaintance with the history of the Church of England makes it plain that within its borders are men and women who differ acutely from each other on questions of theology and procedure. Men may be described as High Churchmen, Broad Churchmen, Evangelicals, Tractarians, Ritualists, upholders of the Establishment or opposed to it; but they all claim to be members of the Church of England.

In Re Tegg (9) the words to be considered were: "should at all times conform to and be members of the Established Church of England". FARWELL, J., held the words to be a condition subsequent and held the condition void for uncertainty, but in the course of his judgment he said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 881):

"It may be—I am not deciding this—that if the testator had been content to say 'should be members of the Established Church of England', that might be a matter of some certainty, but that is not enough, because the lady and her children must 'at all times conform to'."

On the first part of the words we are considering it seems that FARWELL, J., did not think that they were incapable of a definite and certain meaning. In Re Perry Almshouses (7) STIRLING, J., said ([1898] 1 Ch. 400):

"Whatever difficulty there may be in giving a strict legal definition of what constitutes membership of the Church of England, I think that a person who has been baptised, has been confirmed . . . and is an actual communicant, does hold the status of a member of that church, and would be ordinarily regarded and spoken of as such."

That judgment was upheld in the Court of Appeal, and it has declared that there was a charity for members of the Church of England. VAISEY, J., seemed to think that there was a different kind of test for admittance to an almshouse as a member of the Church of England from that which is required to qualify a man to take benefits under a will as a member of the Church of England, but I confess to some difficulty in seeing where the distinction lies. In both cases, the essential thing seems to be that it should be made plain that the applicant in the one case, and the beneficiary in the other, is a member of the Church of England, and STIRLING, J., and the Court of Appeal both thought that qualification would be ascertained and established.

It is clear, I think, that a definite and certain meaning can be given to the words "a member of the Church of England," and if it be right that the words are a description or a qualification or a condition precedent, then a claimant to the gift ought not to be debarred from trying to show that he fulfils the qualification. The Church of England is an institution bound into the national life by a thousand links, legal and historical. It seems to me to be a very strange conclusion that when millions of people, drawn to that church by ties of piety or feeling or history, claim to be and are recognised to be members of that church, this court should say that the words employed by this testator are so uncertain in their meaning as to be void, and the beneficiary is not even entitled to try to show that he occupies a position that millions of his countrymen enjoy without any question being raised. With great respect, I venture to differ from VAISEY, J., on the first part of the words, and I would hold that the words "a member of the Church of England" are capable of having a definite certain meaning attached to them, and that R. S. Allen should be given the opportunity to show that he is a member of the Church of England.

The second part of the words used by the testator—"and an adherent to the doctrine of that church"—present much more difficulty. The problem is best seen, perhaps, by formulating two questions. The first question is: What is the doctrine of the Church of England? And the second question is: What is meant by "an adherent to that doctrine"? Here, again, at first sight, it would seem to be a very strange thing if the answer to the first question should be: "Nobody really knows; it is so uncertain that if the words form part of a condition precedent, a possible beneficiary would be quite unable to satisfy the condition, because the words 'the doctrine of the Church of England' are void for uncertainty". No beneficiary could be an adherent to that doctrine in those circumstances whatever the meaning of the word "adherent" may be.

VAISEY, J., said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 311):

"What is the doctrine of the church? It is a body of beliefs of a very wide character, covering the whole of human experience and divine revelation, but not capable of being reduced to the certainty of a code."

It may very well be that there is no one specific test that can be applied to decide what it is that constitutes membership of the Church of England, and, further, that there is no precise formulation of the doctrine of the Church of England in some recognised code so that it is possible to say: "Here is the doctrine of the Church of England and it is not to be found elsewhere." But do these two things in conjunction compel this court, in the precise case before us, to say that the words the testator has chosen to use are void for uncertainty?

With great respect to VAISEY, J., I think not.

So far as the clergy are concerned, after the passing of the Clerical Subscription Act, 1865, a clergyman was only called on to make the following declaration:

"I assent to the thirty-nine articles of religion, and to the book of common prayer and of the ordering of bishops, priests and deacons. I believe the doctrine of the Church of England as therein set forth, to be agreeable to the Word of God; and in public prayer and administration of the sacraments I will use the form in the said book prescribed, and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority."

But although clergymen were required to assent to the doctrine of the Church of England in these words, no such assent, so far as I know, is required from lay members of the Church of England, and, for my own part, I do not think the decision in this case requires a consideration of the extremely difficult questions which have perplexed scholars and divines and laymen in many ages when seeking to formulate with any precision the doctrine or faith of the Church of England. Undoubtedly, there are those who seek for more precision, and those who seek for a larger freedom for the members of the church, in what they must hold or preach. But this I think to be clear: that if any dignitary of the Church of England, or any layman of great standing in the church, had happened to be the beneficiary under the will of the testator, it would be a surprising thing to say that he failed to bring himself within the meaning of the words used by this testator.

If the true rule of construction be that the court must take the words used by the testator and gather from the words the intention of the testator, and, having done that, seek to give effect to the intention of the testator, then, I think, for myself, that in this case it is possible to gather the intention and to give sensible expression to it. The testator was not content to say, "who shall be a member of the Church of England," but added, "and an adherent to the doctrine of that church."

First of all, therefore, the testator would seem to have had in mind that there might be many persons who claimed to be members of the Church of England who were members in name only, and the added words would seem to indicate his view that it was not enough to render lip service only. The words "an adherent to the doctrine of that church", seem designed to secure sincerity and a conscientious attachment to the Church of England, and the forsaking of any other. It is, perhaps, a fair assumption to make that a testator who uses words such as these believed himself to be a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church; otherwise he would not have laid down the condition in these words.

A It is not to be supposed that the testator was himself acquainted with all the niceties of doctrinal disputation, but rather that he was using words as an ordinary layman who was a sincere member of the Church of England, and when he uses words such as "the doctrine of that church", he must be taken, I should have thought, as meaning the general teaching of the Church of England, as opposed to the distinctive teaching of other denominations. When he uses the word "adherent", he is using a word that is commonly used as meaning "one who conforms to", or, "one who is attached to", and to say that it is impossible to know what the testator meant by the use of the word because no guidance is given as to the degree of adherence, is, I think, with the utmost respect to those who take and have taken a contrary view, to import doubt B that ought not to exist when the whole of the words used are given their ordinary meaning. I cannot subscribe to the view that it is impossible to say what is the doctrine of the Church of England. In my view, it is capable of reasonable formulation. I also think it is possible for a man to say: "I conscientiously and sincerely agree with that doctrine", which is all that an adherent is required to do, as I understand and interpret the word as used by the testator.

C I am fully conscious of the limitations on the power of this court in a matter of this kind. It must construe the words the testator has used, and not make a new or amended will for the testator, which might seem more conformable to what is thought to be right or just. But, in my judgment, the testator has used words in this case which are capable of a sensible and definite meaning, and any claimant under the provisions of the will ought to be allowed to try D to bring himself within the scope of those words. That task may not be easy, and I do not know what the exact facts may be. The trustees will have to decide whether the claimant fulfils the condition expressed in the will by the testator. They will have to decide, as I think, whether the claimant is a member of the Church of England, giving his sincere allegiance to it, and accepting the characteristic and distinctive teaching of the church. These things, I venture E to think, are capable of a sensible and definite meaning, and, in my view, when the testator used the words "a member of the Church of England and an adherent to the doctrine of that church," he was not using words that ought to be held void for uncertainty, and the claimant should be permitted to show, if he can, that he fulfils the condition. For these reasons, I would allow the appeal.

F ROMER, L.J.: The person who claims as devisee on the death of Francis Allen must establish four things, viz., (i) that he is a son of Francis Allen, (ii) that he is a member of the Church of England, (iii) that he is an adherent to the doctrine of that church, and (iv) that there is no brother older than he who is a member and an adherent as aforesaid. In a sense, it is true to say G that the qualifications embodied in points (ii) and (iii) constitute conditions precedent, for proof that the claimant possesses them precedes the vesting of any legal or beneficial interest in the property. However, I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., that it is more accurate to regard the qualifications as forming part of the description of the devisee—as though, for example, the gift had been to the tallest son of Francis Allen; and I approach the question H as to the validity of the devise on that footing.

On this view, the difficulty which arises is whether the testator has described the beneficiary whom he had in mind with a sufficient degree of certainty to enable the court to identify him, and the principle which is relevant to this question is "id certum est quod certum reddi potest." The first point which I propose to consider is whether an inquiry whether any particular individual is or is not a member of the Church of England would be foredoomed to failure from the start on the ground that it is not possible to answer that question in regard to anyone at all. If failure were inevitable, then a gift depending on the possession of the prescribed qualification could not take effect, for the testator would have introduced into the description of the beneficiary an element of uncertainty which could not, by inquiry, be rendered certain. If, on the other hand, the true view of the matter is that it might be predicated of some people that they were members of the Church of England, the fact (if fact it be) that it could not be predicated of others would not automatically invalidate a gift which was dependent in its vesting on possession of the qualification. Is it then beyond the power of the court to ascertain of anybody, with a reasonable degree of certainty, whether he can be said to be a member of the Church of England?

This question is not free of authority. In Re Perry Almshouses (7) the founder of an eleemosynary charity prescribed by the instrument of foundation that the objects should be selected from persons who should have (i) regularly attended divine service at the parish church for a fixed period, (ii) been partakers of the Holy Communion, and (iii) lived a godly, righteous and sober life to the glory of God's Holy Name; and that the trustees should be members of the Church of England. The question before the court was whether this was a charity the endowment whereof was held for the benefit of members of the Church of England "as such", and, accordingly, whether the charity was an ecclesiastical charity. During the argument before STIRLING, J., it was contended (inter alia) on behalf of the Charity Commissioners that there was no legal definition of membership of the Church of England and that the only test of membership was by a person conscientiously declaring himself to be a member. The contrary argument which was advanced by counsel for the trustees of the charity was that as there could be no question but that there was an established church the suggestion that the phrase "a member of the Church of England" had no meaning was not tenable; and that the difficulty of predicating whether in a particular case a person was or was not a member would not prevent the court from giving effect to that phrase. In the course of his judgment (in which he held that the charity was an ecclesiastical charity) STIRLING, J., expressed his conclusion on this question as follows ([1898] 1 Ch. 400):

"Whatever difficulty there may be in giving a strict legal definition of what constitutes membership of the Church of England, I think that a person who has been baptised, has been confirmed, or is ready and desirous to be confirmed, and is an actual communicant, does hold the status of a member of that church, and would be ordinarily regarded and spoken of as such."

In the Court of Appeal, SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., said ([1899] 1 Ch. 31):

"It is very forcibly urged by the appellants that the founder has not, in terms, made such membership [of the Church of England] a condition for participating in her charity. The appellants contend that such a condition cannot properly be inferred from the terms of her gift. It is urged that it is quite consistent with those terms that she did not intend to do more than require performance of the conditions which she expressly prescribed. The answer to this argument is that, although it may be true that some persons may conscientiously perform these conditions without being members of the Church of England, there is nothing to show that the founder ever thought of them. She specified those conditions as the most obvious means of ascertaining who were such members. She took it for granted that poor persons conducting themselves as she required would be members of the Church of England; and a construction which would let in a succession of hypocrites is, in my opinion, clearly inadmissible . . . I feel the force of the observation that, if the founder had been asked whether any further inquiries were to be made to ascertain whether

A persons conforming with her requirements were really members of the Church of England, she might have said 'No', and might have been content with the test she imposed. It may be extremely difficult to determine whether a constant worshipper at church, who partakes of the Holy Communion and leads a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's Holy Name, is or is not a member of the Church of England. Prima facie he would be taken to be so, and the founder took the risk of non-members, whether conscientious or unconscientious, benefiting by her charity."

CHITTY, L.J., in dealing with the same point, after referring to the three tests which the founder had prescribed, said (ibid., 34):

B "These three tests are all practical, and eminently so—indeed, as efficient as any that can be reasonably suggested for ascertaining whether a person is a member of the Church of England. If the question is asked, Is a person who complies with these tests, who attends the parish service every Sunday for five years, partakes of the Holy Communion and leads the life described, a member of the Church of England? it seems to me that the answer cannot be otherwise than in the affirmative."

C VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said that he had no doubt but that the charity was one for the benefit of members of the Church of England as such and in no way indicated any doubt as to the meaning of that phrase. In Re Tegg (9) FARWELL, J., refrained from expressing a definite opinion on the question whether the expression "members of the Established Church of England" in relation to a condition subsequent was sufficiently definite in itself to be enforceable but confined himself to saying that the expression "might be a matter of some certainty."

D The result of the cases above cited is that STIRLING, J., and two members of this court expressed the view (from which the third member did not dissent) that there are at least some people in this country of whom it can be postulated that they are members of the Church of England, while FARWELL, J., although leaving the point unanswered as a matter of decision, did not indicate a contrary view. It, accordingly, seems to me that a departure from the opinion of SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., STIRLING, J., and CHITTY, L.J., would only be justified if this court were satisfied that those opinions were manifestly erroneous. For my part, I think that they were manifestly right. The contrary view would result in the disqualification of any one of the highest dignitaries of the church from claiming a legacy to which the only condition attached by the testator was that the taker should be "a member of the Church of England." Such a conclusion, I venture to think, would come as something of a shock to the public conscience. It may well be that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to say of some persons whether they are or are not members of the Church of England, but (as was argued for the trustees before STIRLING, J., in Re Perry Almshouses (7)) that consideration does not of necessity render it impossible for some particular individual to establish that he is. It seems to me, therefore, that the claimant in the present case would at least be entitled to prove, if she could, that her husband possessed such qualifications as SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., and CHITTY, L.J., referred to in the judgments to which I have referred, if she can also show that he satisfied the second part of the requisite qualification, viz., that he was an adherent to the doctrine of the Church of England.

H I now turn to this further requirement. The primary question here, again, is whether this part of the qualification is of so uncertain a nature that an inquiry whether any particular individual satisfied it would be useless at the outset on the ground that it could not be answered in relation to anyone. VAISEY, J., has expressed the view, and has given cogent reasons to support it, that it is impossible to say, with any approximation to certainty, what the testator meant by the language which he has used, and that as the court cannot, therefore, ascertain whether any person who claims as devisee is qualified to take or not, the gift of necessity fails. I think this question is an exceedingly difficult one, but I have come to the conclusion on the whole that the learned judge was right.

The two reasons which have mainly led me to this conclusion are, first, that I do not know what the testator meant by the doctrine of the Church of England, and, secondly, if I did know to what doctrine the devisee had to adhere, I have no idea of the degree or manifestation of adherence which the testator had in mind. No evidence was before the court (as I suspect that it would have been if any had been available) to prove either what the testator meant by referring to the doctrine of the Church of England, or what that expression means in its ordinary acceptation. It is referred to in the Clerical Subscription Act, 1865, s. 1, but the phrase as there used is referable only to the taking of the oath by priests and embodies, moreover, a definition which it is improbable in the extreme that the testator had ever heard of. There is, accordingly, no certainty, and no means, so far as I am aware, of achieving any degree of certainty, as to the doctrine to which the devisee is required by the will to adhere. Even, however, if the doctrine could be ascertained or the assumption made that adherence to the Church of England was all that the testator had in mind, there would remain the difficulty of what adherence means when the word is used in relation to a religious teaching or faith. "To adhere" to the Church of England is much the same thing as "to conform" to it and FARWELL, J., in Re Tegg (9) was constrained to admit that he did not in the least know what that phrase meant. A like inability was confessed in the decisions in the New Zealand cases of Re Lockie (10) and Re Biggs (2), and by the very learned judge from whom this appeal has been brought. In Re Lockie (10) SMITH, J., put to himself a series of questions for the purpose of testing the meaning of adherence. I do not repeat them, but they show convincingly, to my mind, the uncertainty which must of necessity attach to the word in relation to religious belief. Some of the tenets of the church may be said, without irreverence, to be contrary to all established scientific experience. Does a man "adhere" to such tenets if he accepts them merely as imagery or allegory, or does nothing short of absolute and literal belief constitute adherence? Does outward acceptance of a doctrine suffice whatever the degree of mental reservation? Must the doctrine be accepted in its entirety or may certain exceptions be permitted, and, if so, what?

Unless a testator gives some guidance on these points, I know of no authority that the court possesses to set up signposts of its own. So to do is to extend the power of testamentary construction into the field of testamentary disposition and thus to perform a function which lies outside the jurisdiction of the court. A man must exercise the testamentary power himself; neither the court nor his executors can do it for him (compare the observations of LORD SIMONDS in Chichester Diocesan Fund & Board of Finance (Incorporated) v. Simpson (11)). In the present case, the testator has given no sufficient guidance in the matter of adherence to doctrine, nor are there any means, in my opinion, by which his intention can be satisfactorily ascertained, and in these circumstances it is impossible, in my judgment, to postulate of any son of Francis Allen that he is within the specified description.

It is important to note that the testator was apparently drawing a distinction between membership of the Church of England, on the one hand, and adherence to its doctrine, on the other. This suggests to me that the difference which he had in mind was between outward conformity to the church, which could be demonstrated by membership of it, and sincerity of belief in its teaching, which could, as he thought, be proved by "adherence" to its doctrine. He has failed, however, to explain either the doctrine which he had in mind or the degree of sincerity which he required or the manner in which such sincerity was to be manifested, and the result of his omission in these respects is, in my judgment, that it is impossible for the court to identify the object of his bounty, and the gift, accordingly, fails.

A It appears to me that it is difficult to reach a contrary conclusion consistently with the reasoning of the majority speeches in Clayton v. Ramsden (1). The gift in that case was to determine if the testator's daughter should marry a person "not of Jewish parentage and of the Jewish faith" and the House held that that provision of defeasance was void for uncertainty. In the course of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN's speech, he observed that the words "of Jewish parentage" referred to race and then proceeded as follows ([1943] 1 All E.R. 19):

B "Must both parents be of the Jewish race, or would one alone, and which, suffice? I confess myself unable to find any context which provides an answer; but the answer may well be that, in the absence of a context to the contrary, the true construction is that both parents must be of the Jewish race. But at this point the real difficulty begins, viz., the question of degree. The testator has given no information or clue as to what percentage or proportion of Jewish blood in the husband will satisfy the requirement that he should be of Jewish parentage. The daughter could never, before marrying the man of her choice, be certain that he came up to the requisite standard of Jewish parentage, nor could a court enlighten her beforehand. The standard is unknown, and incapable of ascertainment. It is this uncertainty of degree which prevents the divesting event from being seen precisely and distinctly from the beginning, and which makes this condition void for uncertainty. The uncertainty attaching to the requirement of Jewish parentage avoids the whole condition subsequent, with the result that no defeasance takes place. In these circumstances it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon the certainty of the words 'of the Jewish faith'; but had it been necessary I should have felt a difficulty in holding that their meaning was clear or certain. It seems to me that (apart from the difficulty which arises from the existence of the three varieties of Judaism referred to by LORD GREENE, M.R.) the testator has given no indication of the degree of attachment or adherence to the faith which he requires on the part of his daughter's husband. The requirement that a person shall be of the Jewish faith seems to me too vague to enable it to be said with certainty that a particular individual complies with the requirement."

It is true that the condition in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) was a condition subsequent and that the courts have always required such conditions to be defined with precision. Nevertheless, the conclusion which LORD RUSSELL reached derived from the poverty of guidance by the testator as to what he really intended and by his failure to describe the qualities which he required of the man whom his daughter might subsequently marry. The House, therefore, held that it was not possible to say of any man that he did, in fact, possess those qualities, and, instead of establishing some criterion of its own, rejected the condition as being unsusceptible of ascertainable meaning. In my opinion, a parallel result must logically follow in a case where the description relates, not to the person on whose ascertainment a gift is to determine, but to the person to whom the gift is bequeathed. If the gift in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) had been, e.g., a legacy to the eldest of the testator's employees who should be "of Jewish parentage and of the Jewish faith" it is difficult to see how, consistently with the reasoning of LORD RUSSELL (and I may add that the reasoning of LORD ROMER followed a very similar line) any of the employees could have been held entitled to take, for if, in the words of LORD RUSSELL, it is unknown and unascertainable whether a person is or is not of Jewish parentage, then no employee could have established a claim by showing that he was; per contra, if effect could have been given to the description, the condition in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) would presumably not have been held void for uncertainty, for the court would have been able to "enlighten" the daughter before she contracted a marriage. In such cases as the present, it seems to me that the only escape (were it permissible) from the difficulty would be to disregard the qualification as being merely subordinate to the gift (and in some instances that might, indeed, be possible), or, on the same justification, to treat it as sufficiently satisfied by conformity to some test which the court itself thinks reasonable to apply. I do not think, however, that either of these courses would be legitimate in the present case. The testator has shown unmistakably that he looked on adherence to church doctrine as an essential quality in the devisee and it is not permissible, in my opinion, either to abrogate the requirement or to guess what he meant by introducing it, and thus establish a speculative standard. Many people might hazard many different guesses, and, even if the majority of them guessed the same, the principle "id certus est quod certum reddi potest" can only be applied, in my judgment, where that which the testator has left uncertain can be rendered certain, not where it can only be rendered probable. A B

In these circumstances, it seems to me that it would be of no use to direct an inquiry whether Reginald Allen qualified or not, without also giving directions to the master as to what meaning he should attribute to the "doctrine" of the Church of England and as to the degree, quality and manifestation which the testator intended in the use of the word "adherent"; and, for the reasons which I have attempted to explain, I, for my part, would feel quite unable to give any such directions. I, accordingly, agree with VAISEY, J., that this part of the qualification or description of the intended devisee is expressed in such uncertain terms that it is impossible to ascertain whether he was the eldest, or some other, or none of the sons of Francis Allen, and that the devise must, accordingly, fail. It follows that I would dismiss the appeal, but, as my brethren take a different view, the appeal will be allowed. C D E

A Tort—Joint tortfeasors—Contribution—Action against two defendants—Action against second defendant not commenced within statutory period—First defendant's right to contribution from second defendant—Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 6 (1) (c).

B One year and nine months after an accident in which he was injured a plaintiff issued a writ in an action for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty against the first defendants. Within three months the first defendants brought in as third parties the public corporation which had employed the plaintiff, and subsequently the plaintiff by leave amended his writ by adding the third parties as defendants. At the trial, both the first defendants and the third parties were found to have been guilty of negligence or breach of duty giving rise to the injury, blame being attributed to them in the proportions of two-thirds and one-third respectively, but the plaintiff's action against the third parties was dismissed on the ground that it was brought against a public authority and had not been commenced within one year of the accrual of the cause of action as required by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). The first defendants claimed contribution towards the damages from the third parties under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c).

F HELD: (i) (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente) a "tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the . . . damage," against whom contribution could be claimed under s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935 meant either (a) one who had been sued and held liable for the damage, or (b) one who had not been sued, but would have been held liable if he had been sued; "sued" could not be construed as "sued in time" (dictum of BIRKETT, J., in Merlihan v. Pope (A. C.), Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 451), approved); and, as the third parties had been sued and held not liable for the damage, they were not liable for contribution under the section.

G (ii) the time limit under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), for the recovery of contribution commenced to run from the date on which the first defendants' liability was ascertained, i.e., when judgment was given against them, the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16A, which provided for the bringing in of the third parties, being machinery for the convenient determination of the position contingently on the first defendants being held liable.

Merlihan v. Pope (A. C.), Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 449), overruled.

APPEAL against an order of PARKER, J., dated Jan. 29, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 583.

Following an accident in which he was injured on July 28, 1949, the plaintiff, on Apr. 26, 1951, issued a writ in an action for damages for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty against the first defendants, who, on July 6, 1951, issued a third-party notice which was served on the third parties, the plaintiff's employers, on July 12, 1951. On Feb. 4, 1952, the plaintiff by leave amended his writ and statement of claim in the action by adding the third parties as second defendants. On Jan. 29, 1953, PARKER, J., gave judgment on the question of liability in the action, holding that the first defendants were liable to the plaintiff for negligence and that the third parties had been in breach of their statutory duty to provide the plaintiff with a safe system of work, and apportioning the blame for the damage as to two-thirds to the first defendants and as to one-third to the third parties. He held, however, that the third parties

A were a public authority within the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and that, as the action had not been commenced within one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued, as required by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), it was statute-barred, and he dismissed the action against them. He further held that the first defendants were not entitled

B to contribution from the third parties towards their liability for the plaintiff's damages under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c). The first defendants appealed against the order refusing an order for contribution by the third parties.

Diplock, Q.C., and S. Rees for the first defendants.

Scarman for the second defendants and third parties.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 27. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: On July 28, 1949, the plaintiff was employed by the third parties. He was working on a vehicle known as a fork lift when a lorry belonging to the first defendants came into collision with it. On Apr. 26, 1951,

D he commenced proceedings against the first defendants claiming damages for personal injuries which he alleged were due to the negligence of their driver. On June 20, 1951, the first defendants delivered their defence, which denied negligence and alleged that the accident was due to the negligence of a servant of the third parties. On July 6, 1951, the first defendants issued a third-party notice against the third parties claiming contribution or indemnity. On Nov. 12,

E 1951, the first defendants delivered their statement of claim against the third parties, and the third parties delivered their defence thereto on Nov. 28, 1951. On Feb. 4, 1952, the plaintiff, pursuant to leave, amended his writ and statement of claim by adding the third parties as defendants in the action. Both in the third-party proceedings and in their defence to the statement of claim, as amended, the third parties pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), as one

F of their defences. It was said that at the time of the collision their servants were acting in intended execution of the Civil Aviation Act, 1946. PARKER, J., held that this was so, and it is not now in dispute.

The action came on for hearing in January, 1953, and the judgment of PARKER, J., which was given on Jan. 29, 1953, was in favour of the plaintiff against the first defendants. The judge held that the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), provided a defence to the claim against the third parties, and that the action failed as against them. Thereupon he had to consider the claim of the first defendants against the third parties for contribution. On that claim the judge held that the first defendants were not entitled to an order for contribution against the third parties, though, but for the defence under s. 21 (1), he would have given judgment against them in the action, and in

H the third-party proceedings would have ordered them to contribute one-third of the damages. The first defendants appeal to this court on this last part of the judgment, and it is submitted that the third parties ought to be ordered to make contribution.

The right to contribution in the circumstances of this case depends on the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) which reads:

"Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort . . .

(c) any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise, so, however, that no person shall be entitled to recover contribution under this section from any person entitled to be indemnified by him in respect of the liability in respect of which the contribution is sought."

The machinery by which the right can be enforced is provided by R.S.C., Ord. 16A. The decision of PARKER, J., on the claim to contribution was based entirely on the wording of s. 6 (1) (c). He held that the claim to contribution failed on the ground that it had not been shown that the third parties were a tortfeasor who either "is liable, or would have been liable if sued". It is said on behalf of the first defendants that the finding of the judge that the responsibility for the collision was to the extent of one-third on the third parties is sufficient to entitle the first defendants to an order for contribution, and that their cause of action against the third parties only arose on judgment against them in the action. If it were otherwise, it was argued, the rights of the defendants against the third party could be defeated by the plaintiff.

I repeat that which I have already said—the position is to be determined by s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935. It appears to me that the draftsman of the sub-section had in mind a suit in which there were one or more defendants, and it was sought to provide that, after judgment in the action, contribution could be ordered as between the defendants, and, further, that a tortfeasor who had not been sued in the action, but who was brought in as third party, might be ordered to make contribution if he would have been liable in respect of the same damage had he been sued. In that way, the natural meaning of the word "liable" in the first line of the sub-section is "held liable", and the words "who is . . . liable" two lines later would have the same meaning. I am prepared to assume that the meaning of "liable" ought not to be limited to "held liable", and that if a tortfeasor paid a claim he might have a right to contribution. In such a case he would have to prove: (a) that he was a tortfeasor; and (b) that he was liable at the time he paid. And it would be open to the one against whom contribution was claimed to raise any defence which was open to the one who claimed contribution.

The action by the plaintiff was not commenced until twenty-one months after the commission of the tort. At that time an action against the third parties could not have succeeded if s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, was pleaded. They were not held to be liable in the action in which they were subsequently added as defendants. Counsel for the first defendants sought to establish that they were in the position of a tortfeasor who would, if sued, have been liable in respect of the same damage. Now, I find difficulty in treating a tortfeasor who has been sued as though he had not been sued. And I find still greater difficulty in treating such a tortfeasor as one who would have been liable if he had been sued when he is sued in the action and is held not to be liable. I cannot see how a judge who has held that a defendant is not liable can immediately thereafter say that he would have been liable if he had been sued. The claim of the first defendants can only succeed if one is to read into the sub-section after the word "sued" some such words as "in time" or "before any period of limitation had run". There may be omissions in the sub-section. It may not have provided for every eventuality. But it is not legitimate to introduce words into the sub-section. A reasonable interpretation can be given to it as it stands, though it does not go as far as it might have done. The claim does not fall within either limb of the sub-section. The duty of the court is to apply the sub-section as it stands, not to extend it. I agree with the judgment of PARKER, J.

That is all that it is necessary to say for the determination of this appeal, but as much time was devoted to argument on the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), perhaps I ought to say something on it. One question which was raised is as to the time at which the cause of action of a defendant against a third party arises. In Merlihan v. A. C. Pope, Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) (1), a case rather like this, BIRKETT, J., held that the cause of action accrued on the commission of the tort. It is right to say that authorities were not cited to him.

- A In a later case, Hordern-Richmond, Ltd. v. Duncan (2), CASSELS, J., took a different view, with which PARKER, J., agreed in the judgment now under appeal. The adoption of the view of BIRKETT, J., would lead to simplification, for there seems to be something incongruous in the position of two defendants who are sued in respect of an accident when one puts (or both put) forward a claim to contribution and it can be said that the cause of action of the plaintiff
- B arises on the date of the accident and the cause of action as to contribution arises on a later date (or dates). None the less, it is difficult to see what cause of action a person who is indirectly involved in an accident has if he has suffered no damage. If he is sued he can make use of the third-party procedure. It may be that his cause of action accrues when the writ in the action is served on him—but that was not argued—and I am content to adopt the view of
- C PARKER, J., that the cause of action arises when the defendant is held liable, i.e., when judgment is given against him, and that R.S.C., Ord. 16A, is merely machinery for the convenient determination of the position which may arise subsequently. This is in accordance with the decision in Wolmerhausen v. Gullick (3): see [1893] 2 Ch. 529; and in the ordinary case it avoids the possibility of any injustice to a defendant as against a third party. The form
- D of order in use in contribution cases where both are defendants provides that, on one defendant paying the whole, he shall be at liberty to enter judgment against the other for the proportion of damages and costs found against him.

- E Counsel for the first defendants submitted that a claim to contribution did not fall under, and was not affected by, s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. He cited in support the decision of the Court of Appeal in Tuckwood v. Rotherham Corpn. (4). The claim in that case arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, s. 6 (2), and it was held that the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (a), did not apply to such a claim. It had been held in an earlier case (Fry v. Cheltenham Corpn. (5)) that the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, did not apply to a claim by a workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1921] 1 K.B. 535):

- F "In the first place there is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Fry v. Cheltenham Corpn. (5) that to a claim by a workman employed by the corporation against the corporation for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, does not apply. I take the ground of the decision to be that the
- G Act of 1893 deals with claims based on acts or neglects, and that the liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act is not based on acts or neglects, but on the statutory consequences of a contract to employ. It seems to me, and this is my first ground, that, if one starts with the proposition that claims by workmen under the Workmen's Compensation Act are not within the Public Authorities Protection Act, the subsidiary claim against public authorities for indemnity against the workmen's
- H claims must also be outside the Public Authorities Protection Act. If it were necessary to strengthen my view, it has been decided by BRAY, J., in Smith's Dock Co. v. John Readhead & Sons (6) that the claims on which an employer can recover an indemnity are not limited to claims which can be made by the workman's dependant at common law. In that case the defendants had been guilty of negligence, causing injury to a workman in consequence of which he died shortly afterwards. His illegitimate daughter obtained compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act from the employer, and indemnity was obtained against the defendants in respect of the compensation so paid to the illegitimate daughter, though the daughter could not have claimed damages against the defendants, because under Lord Campbell's Act such an action could not have been brought on behalf of an illegitimate child. That appears to me to strengthen my view that this action under the Workmen's Compensation Act is outside the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act. Secondly, and in some respects this is very like the first ground, I think, looking at the words of the Public Authorities Protection Act, that the claim against the corporation is not for an act done in execution of an Act of Parliament or of a public duty or authority, or in respect of a neglect in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority. It is true that negligence is one of the ingredients of the liability to indemnify, but there are several other ingredients of the liability—namely, that the person asking for indemnity has, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, either paid or been compelled by an order to pay the compensation provided by the Act, which may be something quite different from the damages which would follow at common law for an act of negligence. In my view on that ground also, which I gather is the view adopted by my Lord, the case does not come within the words of the Act."

I do not regard the decision in that case as helpful in forming a view on the question now under consideration. The right to contribution between tortfeasors is given by s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935. The procedure applicable is set forth in R.S.C., Ord. 16A—see particularly r. 1, r. 3 and r. 12. That order followed the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 39 (1) (b), which gave power to the court or a judge to grant

"all such relief relating to or connected with the original subject of the cause or matter, claimed in like manner against any other person, whether already a party to the cause or matter or not, who has been duly served with notice in writing of the claim pursuant to rules of court or any order of the court, as might properly have been granted against that person if he had been made a defendant to a cause duly instituted by the same defendant for the like purpose."

Section 39 (2) provides:

"Every person served with any such notice as aforesaid shall thenceforth be deemed a party to the cause or matter with the same rights in respect of his defence against the claim as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by the defendant."

Under Ord. 16A, r. 3, the third party becomes a party to the action with the same rights in respect of his defence against any claim made against him, and otherwise, as if he had been sued by the defendant. From this it follows that a defence under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), is available to a third party. And I would add that s. 31 (1) of that Act provides: "'Action' includes any proceeding in a court of law . . ." I am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: It must seem strange to a private individual that the big contracting firm of George Wimpey & Co., Ltd., the first defendants, can be sued at any time within six years after an accident, whereas the government-controlled British Overseas Airways Corporation, the third parties, can only be sued within one year. This distinction arises because the British Overseas Airways Corporation are a public authority and George Wimpey & Co., Ltd., are not. In June, 1949, a strong committee presided over by LORD TUCKER recommended that there should be no such distinction. It was manifest, they said, that injustice often results to the individual from the one-year limitation for public authorities, and they observed significantly that it is only those who benefit from the one-year limitation who consider that it should continue. Yet nothing has been done to carry out the recommendations of the committee, and more than four years have now elapsed since they made their report. It reminds me of the case we had a little while ago about the hall-marking of gold articles when seventy-three years ago a committee recommended that the law should be consolidated and amended without delay, and yet nothing has so far been done [see Westwood v. Cann ([1952] 2 All E.R. 349)].

In the present case, it is not the injured man who suffers by the distinction. It is the first defendants. Both the third parties and the first defendants were to blame for the accident. The first defendants have been made to pay the full damages to the injured man, and now, when they claim contribution from the third parties, it is said they cannot get it because the injured man did not sue within one year. He did not sue either of them within one year. Nearly two years elapsed before he started an action at all. I do not suppose that he would have sued the third parties even then but for the fact that he was advised (wrongly as it turns out) that they were not a public authority. Acting on that erroneous advice he sued them. He succeeded in showing that they were to blame, but he did not get judgment against them, because they were protected by the one-year limitation. On this account it is said that the first defendants have no right of contribution from the third parties. It was conceded on behalf of the third parties that, if the injured man had not sued the third parties at all, the first defendants could have got contribution. But it is said, as he sued them and failed, the first defendants cannot get contribution. If such be the law, I can only say it is most unsatisfactory. It means that the right of the first defendants to contribution is defeated by something over which they had no control and with which they had nothing to do. It is defeated by the conduct of the injured man, first, in delaying to sue the third parties for more than a year, and, secondly, in thinking that the third parties were not a public authority and not protected by the one-year limitation.

In order to see whether this is indeed the law, it is necessary to construe the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c), which gives the right to contribution. The critical question is: What is the meaning of the word "liable"? There are two rival views. One is that "liable" means "held liable". According to this view a person is not liable for the damage unless and until he has had judgment entered against him. The other view is that "liable" means "responsible in law". According to this view, a person may be liable for the damage even though he has not been sued to judgment.

In my opinion, the ordinary meaning of the word "liable" in a legal context is to denote the fact that a person is responsible at law. Thus, when it is said (as LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., once said (3 Macq. 306) in a leading case, Bartons-hill Coal Co. v. McGuire (7)) that a master is liable for the wrongdoing of his servant, that means that he is responsible for it in a court of law. It does not mean that he has actually been sued for it. Furthermore, a man may be "liable" in this sense even though the remedy against him is suspended or barred for some reason or other. The law of England is familiar with the concept of a liability which exists in the eye of the law, though it may not be enforceable by action. It is, perhaps, more familiar in contract than in tort. Everyone knows that a contract is good even though it may not be enforceable owing to the Statute of Frauds, and that a debt which is statute-barred is still a debt even though the debtor may, if sued, raise the statute of limitations. The same concept applies also in tort. Thus a thief is liable for his tort of conversion (which is also a felony) though he cannot be sued for it until he has been prosecuted: Smith v. Selwyn (8). A diplomat is liable for a tort committed by him, although it is not enforceable against him if he claims diplomatic privilege:

Dickinson v. Del Solar (9) ([1930] 1 K.B. 380). An injured party who has incurred hospital expenses which have not been paid and have become statute-barred can recover them from a tortfeasor: Allen v. Waters & Co. (10), per GODDARD, J. ([1935] 1 K.B. 215). A husband who has been guilty of a tort on his wife is liable in respect of it, though it is enforceable only against his master, not against the husband himself: see Broom v. Morgan (11). In the present case, the judge has found in favour of the plaintiff against the first defendants on the issue of liability, but in their favour on the statute of limitations. A

If the word "liable" in s. 6 (1) (c) is construed in the sense I have mentioned, which I venture to think is its ordinary meaning, no injustice will result at all, whereas if it is construed as meaning "held liable by judgment" much injustice will result. Let me give some illustrations. (i) If "liable" means "held liable", it would follow that no tortfeasor could claim contribution unless he had been sued to judgment in the courts. That would be a most unreasonable interpretation. As a matter of good sense it ought to be open to a tortfeasor to admit his liability and pay for the damage and then claim contribution from any other tortfeasor. It should not be necessary for the first tortfeasor to contest the claim in the courts before he can recover contribution. That would be so obviously a waste of time and money that Parliament cannot have intended it. When he comes to enforce his right of contribution, however, it must be open to the second tortfeasor to say: "You need not have paid, because you were not liable at all." The court then inquires into his liability in this sense, that it sees whether the first tortfeasor was "responsible at law" for the damage. If it finds him to be so, and also the second tortfeasor, it awards him contribution. This was assumed to be the law in Knapp v. Railway Executive (12), and I have no doubt it is correct: see Page v. Burtwell (13), per FARWELL, L.J. ([1908] 2 K.B. 763). B C D

(ii) If "liable" means "held liable", it would put it in the power of the injured party to decide whether one tortfeasor should get contribution from another or not. If the injured party wished to help one of two tortfeasors, all he would have to do would be to execute a deed releasing him, or simply allow the period of limitation to run against him, whereupon it would be clear that that tortfeasor, "if sued", would not be "held liable". Nay more, the injured party could bring a hopeless action against that tortfeasor and allow judgment to be entered for him on the ground of a release or the statute of limitations, whereupon that tortfeasor could say that he had in fact been sued, and had not been "held liable". The same result may be reached without any design on the part of the injured party, but simply by delay, as here, on his part or by an error in point of law. It is impossible to suppose that Parliament contemplated that the right to contribution should depend on such chances. Surely the sensible interpretation is that, if the first tortfeasor brings an action for contribution, the second tortfeasor should be able to resist it on the ground that he was not "liable", i.e., not responsible in law for the damage. But he should not be able to resist it on the ground that, although liable, he escaped for some special reason rendering his liability unenforceable, such as a release, or the statute of limitations. E F G

(iii) When a wife is injured by the negligence of her husband and also the negligence of a stranger (as often happens, I fear, in a motor accident), the wife is entitled to sue the stranger for the whole damage she has suffered, but she cannot sue her husband, because one spouse cannot sue the other for a tort. In point of law, the husband is guilty of a tort, but his wife cannot sue him for it: see Broom v. Morgan (11). Suppose now that the wife makes the stranger pay the whole damages, can the stranger recover contribution from the husband on the ground that the husband was also to blame? One would have thought that in justice he ought to be able to do so, but in law it H depends on the meaning of the word "liable" in s. 6 (1) (c). If "liable" means what I think it does, "responsible at law", the stranger can recover contribution from the husband, as he ought to do. But if it means "held liable" he cannot. I am aware that in two cases it has been assumed that "liable" means "held liable", and the husband has escaped paying any contribution: see Chant v. Read (14) and Drinkwater v. Kimber (15); but the point about the meaning of the word "liable" was not argued, and it is, therefore, I suggest,

A open to re-consideration.

Furthermore, if the word "liable" in the opening words of s. 6 (1) (c) means "responsible at law" (as was assumed in Knapp v. Railway Executive (12)), then it should be given the same meaning in the succeeding words. It is a well-settled rule of construction that the same word occurring in the same document should, prima facie, be given the same meaning whenever it occurs;

B all the more so in the same sentence. The only argument against this interpretation of the word "liable" is the words "if sued". The insertion of those words makes it look as if the legislature used the word "liable" in the sense of "held liable". I think that this is too narrow a view. The legislature clearly intended to be comprehensive. They intended to cover any other tortfeasor, whether sued or not, who was responsible in law for the damage. It would

C be a strange thing if these words, which were intended to have a comprehensive effect, should be interpreted so as to narrow the right to contribution and to make it dependent on the action or inaction of the injured party. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that "liable" does not mean "held liable by judgment". It means "responsible in law" for the damage.

If, however, the word "liable" means "held liable", then I think it plain

D that the words "if sued" must be expanded so as to read "if sued by the injured party at the time when the cause of action arose". If you are to envisage a hypothetical action, then you must envisage one brought in time to be an effective action and not one which is statute-barred. When the words "if sued" are so expanded, then there are two categories of tortfeasors against whom contribution can be claimed: (i) Those who have been sued and held

E liable; (ii) those who would, if sued in time, have been held liable. The third parties fall clearly within the second category of tortfeasors who would, if sued in time, have been held liable. It is no answer for them to say that they were in fact sued out of time. That only means that they are not within the first category of tortfeasors "held liable". It still leaves them inside the second category of those who, if sued in time, would have been held liable. I find

F myself in complete agreement with the reasoning of DONOVAN, J., on this point in Morgan v. Ashmore, Benson, Pease & Co., Ltd. (16).

Applying this interpretation of the statute to the facts of this case, it is quite clear that the first defendants are tortfeasors liable for the damage, and that the third parties are other tortfeasors "liable" for the damage in the sense that they are responsible in law as tortfeasors in respect of it. And, in any

G event, they would, if sued in time, have been "held liable" for it. The right to contribution is, therefore, complete.

One more question, however, arises. Although the first defendants have a right to contribution from the third parties, is their remedy for it barred by the one-year limitation contained in the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1)? This depends on when the cause of action for contribution arises. If it arises at the date of the accident (as BIRKETT, J., held in Merlihan v. A. C. Pope, Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) (1)), then the remedy would be barred, but I do not think that is correct. It seems to me clear that a tortfeasor cannot recover contribution until his liability is ascertained. If he has not been sued and has paid nothing and admitted nothing, he can have no cause of action for contribution, for the simple reason that he may never be called on to pay at all. The damaged plaintiff may go against the other tortfeasor only. Once the liability of the first tortfeasor has, however, been ascertained by judgment against him or admission, then he has a cause of action for contribution against the second tortfeasor. He can obtain a declaration of his right to contribution and a prospective order under which, whenever the first tortfeasor has paid any sum more than his share, he can get it back from the second tortfeasor. A close analogy is the right of one surety to contribution from a co-surety. His right at law did not accrue until he had paid more than his share: Davies v. Humphreys (17); but his right in equity (which now prevails) arises when his liability is ascertained and the statute of limitations then begins to run: Wolmerhausen v. Gullick (3), Robinson v. Harkin (18). In cases where a writ is issued against the first tortfeasor and he serves a third-party notice against the second tortfeasor, the notice is convenient machinery, but it does not mean that he has then a cause of action. His cause of action only arises when judgment is given against him ascertaining his liability. On this footing, it is clear that the remedy of the first defendants against the third parties is not statute-barred, because they put in their claim at once.

What is the actual period of limitation applicable to the right to contribution? At first sight it would appear to be the twelve months provided by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), because the third parties are a public authority and the action is brought "in respect of" neglect in the execution of their public duty. But the decision of this court in Tuckwood v. Rotherham Corpn. (4), in my view, binds us to hold that the words "in respect of" do not cover an action for indemnity where, beside the neglect, there are other ingredients necessary to give rise to the cause of action. The reasoning in that case covers this case also, and I do not think we should depart from it, especially in view of the injunction contained in s. 21 (2) of the Act. The period of limitation is, therefore, not the one year provided by s. 21 (1), but the ordinary period of six years provided by s. 2 (1). In this case, however, it does not matter, because in either case the first defendants brought their claim in time.

My conclusion is, therefore, that the first defendants have a right to contribution from the third parties. That right is not barred by statute, and they should recover. I would be in favour of allowing the appeal accordingly. In conclusion I would just say this. There is an obvious gap in s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935. The legislature did not have in mind the case of tortfeasors who had special defences available against the injured party, such as a public authority with a one-year limitation and a spouse who has immunity from suit. If the courts cannot close this gap, then I hope that Parliament will soon do so. It is fourteen years since the first case in the courts exposed the gap, and subsequent cases have served to show how wide it is.

MORRIS, L.J.: This case affords vivid illustration of the difficulties which can arise where different periods of statutory limitation of action apply to different tortfeasors who are concerned in respect of the same damage. The plaintiff suffered damage on July 28, 1949. When judgment in regard to his claims was delivered on Jan. 29, 1953, the learned judge held that the "blame" for his injuries should be assigned as to two-thirds to the first defendants and as to one-third to the third parties. But judgment had to be entered against the first defendants alone, for the plaintiff had not commenced his action against the third parties

"before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued."

The third parties had pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), and that the claim of the plaintiff related to acts or omissions of the third parties while acting in intended execution of an Act of Parliament. No challenge has been made on appeal as to the correctness of absolving the third parties from liability to the plaintiff. The appeal only concerns the question whether the first defendants are entitled to contribution against the third parties. This question involves problems of great difficulty in regard to the construction of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c). The only claim to contribution which the first defendants can, or do, assert is that which they can derive from the wording of that section. No considerations as to hardship or as to policy are relevant save as involved in any submissions based

- A on the scheme and purpose of the Act. If certain public authorities can feel secure from claims after the lapse of a statutory period and after the safety curtain of time has been thought to have been lowered, it might be said to be contrary to the intention of the legislature if this security can be indirectly assailed. On the other hand, it might be said to be inappropriate that the full burden should be carried by one tortfeasor when another shared his blame.
- B But these and similar competing considerations must be excluded. The words of the section are to be regarded and rights and liabilities depend solely on the result yielded by the perplexing tasks of construction.

- C Prior to the Act of 1935, the first defendants could not have founded a claim to contribution against the third parties. If they have a right to contribution it is a statutory right. The first defendants' third-party notice against the third parties was dated July 6, 1951. It was amended on Mar. 11, 1952, after the plaintiff had joined the third parties as a defendant. In para. 3 of their amended statement of claim against the third parties the first defendants plead:

- D "In the event of the [first] defendants being held liable to the plaintiff in respect of damages or costs, they are entitled pursuant to the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, to, and claim, an indemnity or a contribution . . ."

In para. 6 of the amended defence of the third party to the first defendants' claim it is pleaded:

- E "Further the third party will say that at the time of the said collision, they, their servant or agent on their behalf, were acting in intended execution of the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, and that these third-party proceedings are barred by reason of the provisions of s. 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939."

- F The question as to the applicability of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, to the claim of the first defendants against the third parties becomes involved with the question what rights are given by the Act of 1935 and when they are given. The first defendants' "cause of action" against the third parties is for contribution. Have the first defendants been given a right to contribution? If they have—at what moment did they first possess such right? What is the nature of any such right? Much depends on the meaning of the word "liable" in its context in s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act. The word "liable" is a very familiar one in legal parlance and as a medium of expression is much employed. If
- G someone is said to be liable it is very likely that what is meant is that he is answerable at law, but no rigid or all-embracing definition can be suggested. The word may be employed with different meanings according to the context. In s. 3 of the Act of 1935 it is enacted that, subject to the provisions of the Act,

- H "the husband of a married woman shall not, by reason only of his being her husband, be liable—(a) in respect of any tort committed by her whether before or after the marriage, or in respect of any contract entered into, or debt or obligation incurred, by her before the marriage; or (b) to be sued, or made a party to any legal proceeding brought, in respect of any such tort, contract, debt, or obligation."

The word "liable" seems to have a different meaning according as applied to (a) or to (b). The husband is not to be "liable" for certain torts or contracts, and is not to be even "liable" to be sued.

The wording of s. 6 (1) is as follows:

"Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort (whether a crime or not)—(a) judgment recovered against any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage shall not be a bar to an action against any other person who would, if sued, have been liable as a joint tortfeasor in respect of the same damage."

The words "judgment recovered against any tortfeasor liable" seem to suggest that being held liable is something different from being liable. But the later words "any other person who would, if sued, have been liable" seem to denote that a person is liable who would have been held liable if sued. The meaning of this part of the section is that judgment against one joint tortfeasor does not release another person who could also have been successfully sued as a joint tortfeasor.

The right to recover contribution which is given by s. 6 (1) (c) is given to a "tortfeasor liable in respect of" the damage suffered by some person. It is given against any other tortfeasor (whether a joint or a separate tortfeasor) "who . . . would if sued have been liable in respect of the same damage." The words "would if sued" appear to me to postulate the case of someone who has not been sued. In the case of such a person who has not been sued the inquiry becomes whether he would, if he had been sued, have been "liable". It seems to me that in this context the word "liable" must mean "held liable" or sued to judgment. Contribution may, therefore, be recovered from: (a) another tortfeasor who is liable; or (b) another tortfeasor who has not been sued, but who, if he had been sued, would have been liable. "Liable" under group (b) must mean "held liable", and in the context so it must in group (a). The result is that contribution may be recovered from (a) another tortfeasor who has been held liable to the plaintiff, or (b) from another tortfeasor who has not been sued, but who, if he had been sued, would have been held liable.

Parliament might have gone on to add some other group. There might have been provision to recover contribution from a tortfeasor who has been sued, but who has been sued unsuccessfully, but who might—at some other time—have been sued successfully. But there is no such provision. Whether the omission be deliberate or inadvertent is matter of speculation. I agree with the view expressed by BIRKETT, J., in Merlihan v. A. C. Pope, Ltd. (Pagnello, Third Party) (1) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 451) that it would not be right to read after the word "sued" in the words "or would, if sued, have been" the words "in time".

I do not think that the word "liable" in the first line of s. 6 (1) (c) need be limited to tortfeasors who have been held liable, though this matter is not now directly in issue. In the context at the beginning of para. (c), the word may include one who has properly admitted liability to the person who has suffered damage. He may then recover contribution from another tortfeasor who either (a) has been held liable in respect of the same damage, or (b) has not been sued, but, if he had been sued, would have been held liable. It may be that in this situation the claimant would be more fortunately placed unless (in a case where the other tortfeasor has not been sued) the hypothetical proceedings must be deemed to have been commenced on the date of the admission of liability.

The conclusion which I have expressed makes it unnecessary to decide the question as to the notional date of the hypothetical proceedings in the case of a tortfeasor who has not been sued at all. Thus, if one tortfeasor is sued and held liable, while one who may be a tortfeasor is not sued, do the words "if sued" mean "if he had been sued at the time that the tortfeasor who has been held liable was sued", which is a very reasonable view and one which may avoid some anomalies, or do they mean "if at any time he had been sued"? If the view which I have formed is applied to the facts, the result appears to be as follows. The plaintiff Littlewood on July 28, 1949, suffered damage as the result of a tort. The first defendants never admitted liability, but by the judgment given on Jan. 29, 1953, they were held liable. The first defendants came, therefore, within the opening words of para. (c) of the subsection, i.e., the words "any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage." They could as from then claim to recover contribution. It seems to me that their cause of action then arose. They could not earlier claim to recover contribution, for they were denying their liability to the plaintiff. They could (and did) serve a third-party notice on the third parties, which would give the latter the opportunity to challenge the claim of the plaintiff, but the claim of the first defendants on the third parties would only become effective contingently on the first defendants' being held liable to the plaintiff. I consider, therefore, that the third parties could not defeat the first defendants' claim in limine

- A by asserting that more than twelve months had elapsed since the date of the accident (July 28, 1949) when damage was suffered by the plaintiff. Comparison was made between the present situation and that which exists between surety and co-surety, but the claim made by a surety who has paid is one based in contract and in equity. In Craythorne v. Swinburne (19) LORD ELDON, L.C., said (14 Ves. 164):

C "It has been long settled, that, if there are co-sureties by the same instrument, and the creditor calls upon either of them to pay the principal debt, or any part of it, that surety has a right in this court, either upon a principle of equity, or upon contract, to call upon his co-surety for contribution . . ."

- D The claim for contribution now under consideration is purely statutory and exists in the words of the sub-section or not at all. Tuckwood v. Rotherham Corpn. (4) arose out of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, s. 6 (2), comparable in scope to those of s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935. The language of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (referred to in that case), does not differ significantly from that in the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). Under the Act of 1893 the time is in general computed "next after the act, neglect, or default complained of"; under the Act of 1939 the time is "from the date on which the cause of action accrued". Under the Act of 1939 the time limit is in reference to claims which are

- F " . . . for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty or authority . . ."

The wording of the Act of 1893 is very nearly the same. Though it is sufficient for present purposes to say that the claim for contribution was not defeated by any statutory period of limitation, the reasoning in Tuckwood's case (4) would suggest that the twelve months' period of limitation was not applicable.

- G In M'Gillivray v. Hope (20), which concerned contributions to be paid by former employers to the last employer of a man to whom such last employer had paid workmen's compensation, LORD TOMLIN said ([1935] A.C. 10):

- H "Further, under the English law, where one who is liable to pay a sum of money to another is entitled against a third party to be indemnified in whole or in part against what he has so to pay, he cannot recover on the indemnity against this third party where he himself has made no payment in respect of his own liability . . ."

Though the first defendants could start proceedings against the third parties to deal with the "event of" the first defendants being held liable to the plaintiff, and though such procedure possessed advantages, in my judgment, the first defendants were not obliged to claim against the third parties until they (the first defendants) were held liable to the plaintiff. In a claim against the third parties, the first defendants would first have to prove that they were tortfeasors liable to the plaintiff. They would then have to prove, if my construction of the Act is correct, either that the third parties had been held liable to the plaintiff, or that the third parties, not having been sued, would, if they had been sued, have been held liable. Though, if dealing with this second limb, they would be concerned with the neglect or default of the third parties in the intended execution of an Act of Parliament, the claim of the first defendants would, according to the reasoning in Tuckwood's case (4), be a claim in respect of the statutory right to contribution given by the Act of 1935. Thus, BANKES, L.J., in his judgment in Tuckwood's case (4) said ([1921] 1 K.B. 533):

“The question thus is, is this action claiming the right to the statutory indemnity an action in respect of any alleged neglect in the execution of any such duty? In my opinion it is not. It is true that in order to succeed in the action the plaintiff must establish that the workman would have been entitled to recover damages against the corporation for the negligence of their servant in driving the tramcar. That no doubt is an essential part of his cause of action; but I do not think that it is true to say that the action claiming the right to the statutory indemnity is an action in respect of any alleged neglect in the execution of a duty within the meaning of the language used in the section.”

Both SCRUTTON, L.J., and ATKIN, L.J., agreed with the reasoning expressed by BANKES, L.J. Even if the claim of the first defendants against the third parties was in respect of any neglect or default in the intended execution of an Act of Parliament, the “cause of action”, in my judgment, did not accrue until the first defendants could show that they were tortfeasors liable to the plaintiff. The careful judgment of DONOVAN, J., in Morgan v. Ashmore, Benson, Pease & Co., Ltd. (16), was not available to PARKER, J., before he gave his judgment in the present case. The difficulties of construction are well evidenced by the conflicting judicial opinions which have been formed.

For the reasons which I have given, I consider that the legislature has specified the description of those from whom contribution may be recovered in language which, on the facts of this case, does not enable the first defendants to recover from the third parties. I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

CAVE v. CAPEL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), July 31, 1953.]

Execution—Sheriff—Protection—“Action in respect of seizure and possession of goods”—Withdrawal from possession of goods claimed—Action for trespass by person other than claimant—R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A.

- A execution on the goods of a judgment debtor. At the judgment debtor's address he found a caravan in which resided the plaintiff, the mother of the judgment debtor. After making inquiries as to the ownership of the caravan the sheriff's officer—acting, it was found, reasonably—removed the caravan to a barn belonging to the judgment creditor. The plaintiff, who had locked herself inside the caravan, subsequently left the judgment creditor's premises. Later it was discovered that the caravan did not belong to the judgment debtor, the sheriff was instructed to withdraw from possession, and he in fact withdrew. The plaintiff issued a writ against the sheriff for damages for wrongful imprisonment and trespass to the person, and the sheriff took out a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A, for an order “protecting him from any action in respect of the said seizure and possession of the said goods . . .”
- B
- C

HELD: the act of the sheriff's officer in taking possession of the caravan and his act in removing the plaintiff in the caravan must be regarded as one and the same act, and, therefore, the plaintiff's action was “in respect of the seizure and possession of the goods” within r. 16A, and the sheriff was entitled to an order under the rule.

- D Dictum of SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., in Smith v. Critchfield (1885) (14 Q.B.D. 878), applied.

Per curiam: Order 57, r. 16A, applied to an action such as the present and not only to an action brought by the claimant to the goods.

APPEAL from an order of a master adjourned into open court for judgment.

- F On Oct. 29, 1952, a bailiff, William Hext, acting on behalf of the defendant as sheriff's officer, in pursuance of two warrants was instructed to levy execution on the goods of a certain A. H. Cave in respect of two judgments. On going to the judgment debtor's address the bailiff found no property on which to levy execution except a caravan in which was residing the plaintiff, Mrs. May Finella Cave, the mother of the judgment debtor, who informed the bailiff that the caravan was not her son's property, but refused to say to whom it belonged and declined to leave it. The bailiff made inquiries from the judgment creditor's solicitor, and other persons and came to the conclusion (quite properly, as HIS LORDSHIP found) that it was his duty to levy execution on the caravan. Accordingly, on Oct. 30, 1952, he removed the caravan to the judgment creditor's farm. Mrs. Cave (the plaintiff) had refused to leave the caravan and had locked herself in. At the farm the caravan was put in a barn with the plaintiff still inside it, and the main double doors of the barn were locked, but a side door was left open through which the plaintiff eventually left. On Oct. 31, 1952, notice was given to the bailiff by a Mrs. M. F. Carr or her solicitors that she was the owner of the caravan. Inquiries were made, and the sheriff withdrew from possession. On Apr. 24, 1953, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendant claiming damages for wrongful imprisonment and trespass against the person. The defendant took out a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A, claiming protection under that order. Protection was refused by the master, and the defendant appealed to the judge in chambers.

A. M. Wallace for the defendant.

Lermon for the plaintiff.

ORMEROD, J., stated the facts and continued: The question which I have to consider is whether this action is one in which protection should be given to the sheriff by reason of R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A, which reads as follows:

"When the execution creditor has given notice to the sheriff or his officer that he admits the claim of the claimant, the sheriff may thereupon withdraw from possession of the goods claimed, and may apply for an order protecting him from any action in respect of the said seizure and possession of the said goods, and the judge or master may make any such order as may be just and reasonable in respect of the same . . ."

There is a proviso that the claimant shall receive notice of that application.

The first question which has to be considered is whether this is an action coming within the words of the rule, which are that the sheriff

"may apply for an order protecting him from any action in respect of the said seizure and possession of the said goods."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that this is not an action in respect of either the seizure or possession of the said goods, but is something entirely separate and distinct, and, therefore, does not come within the words of the rule. I find it extremely hard to accept that contention. The trespass which is claimed against the defendant occurred when the bailiff was acting in accordance with the warrant, that is to say, taking possession of the caravan which he believed, and in the circumstances had ground for believing, was the property of the judgment debtor, and, therefore, property on which execution could be levied. In that state of affairs it appears to me that, having regard to the way in which the plaintiff's claim is put and having in mind the plaintiff's actions at the time of the execution, it is impossible to separate the act of the sheriff's officer in levying execution from his act (whether it was a wrongful act or not) in taking the plaintiff in the caravan from the judgment debtor's premises to those of the judgment creditor.

In Smith v. Critchfield (1), which was cited to me during the argument in this appeal, there is a statement of opinion by SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., which was certainly obiter, but which appears to me to carry some considerable weight. That was a case where execution had been levied on the goods of a judgment debtor, but the man who appeared to be the rightful owner of the goods brought an action against the sheriff, not only for wrongfully distraining on the goods, but also for trespass on his property in order to levy execution, and, although the point did not fall to be decided in that case, there was an expression of view by the Master of the Rolls that it was impossible to separate the entry on the premises from the levying of execution, and, therefore, the two matters must be considered as one. The learned Master of the Rolls said (14 Q.B.D. 878):

"It is not, of course, in every case that the judge will protect the sheriff. He will be protected when he has only made an honest mistake in executing the process of the court, and but for such mistake everything that he has done would have been justified by the writ. Then against what is he to be protected? It is contended that he may be protected in respect of one part and not in respect of another part of what is really one simultaneous action done by him under the writ of execution; that he may be protected from an action for wrongfully seizing the goods but not from an action for wrongfully walking into the house to seize them. I do not think this contention can be sustained. The trespass to the house and the trespass to the goods are, as it seems to me, parts of one action which is intended to be done under the writ, and which would have been rightful if the goods had belonged to the execution debtor, but which is in fact wrongful because of the sheriff's mistake as to the property in the goods."

In that case the claim was by the claimant to the goods, and his action was in form a claim, not only for damages for wrongful seizure, but also for trespass on his property. The present, of course, is a claim by someone other than the actual owner of the goods distrained on, but it appears to me that the reasoning applies just as strongly in this case as it applied in that case. In my view, the words:

"The trespass to the house and the trespass to the goods are, as it seems to me, parts of one action"

B apply here in that the trespass to the goods, if there was such a trespass—that is to say, the taking of the goods in execution—and the trespass to the person of the plaintiff (who insisted on remaining in the caravan when the goods were taken away) must be regarded as one and the same action, and, therefore, it would appear on the face of it that this is an action to which the words of the rule apply.

C It was further contended, however, that, even if that were so, the rule would still not apply because, if it be read as a whole and its meaning as a whole be taken, it could be interpreted in the sense that it applied only to actions in respect of the seizure and possession of the goods which were taken by the claimant. It was urged that the proviso to the rule made that clear, because the proviso is to the effect that a claimant "shall receive notice of such intended application", and it was argued that, if the application was an application to

D protect the sheriff against an action by someone other than the claimant, no useful purpose would be served by inserting that proviso. After some consideration I have come to the conclusion that the words of the rule must be taken to mean what on the face of them they do mean, and that the sheriff is entitled to apply for an order protecting him from any action in respect of the seizure, and

E not merely from an action in respect of the seizure which may be brought by the claimant. I see no sufficient reason in the wording of the rule for importing into it those additional words, and, in particular, importing those additional words into a rule which was obviously brought into being for the specific purpose of protecting a sheriff against actions which might be brought against him after he had taken possession of the goods. In these circumstances I have come to

F the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed, and that there should be an order giving the defendant protection under Ord. 57, r. 16A.

ACTON CORPORATION v. MORRIS AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), July 27, 28, 1953.]

Requisition—Duration—Confirmation of requisition by Minister—Extension of period of requisition.

On June 22, 1945, the plaintiffs, a local authority, requisitioned certain premises by virtue of powers delegated to them on the terms of the Ministry of Health Circular No. 2082 by the Minister of Health in pursuance of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51 (5). Circular No. 2082 authorised the requisition of premises for the re-housing of persons rendered homeless by enemy action, and under para. 9 thereof, by reference to the enclosure in Ministry of Health Circular No. 1949, the procedure laid down to make such a requisition effective for more than one month was an application for an extension of time to be granted by or on behalf of the Minister. On July 13, 1945, the plaintiffs sent to the Ministry of Health a document in the following terms: "I . . . , town clerk of Acton, in the exercise of the powers delegated to me under the terms of the Ministry of Health Circular No. 2082 by the Minister of Health and by virtue of reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, took possession of the premises . . . for the purpose of accommodating persons rendered homeless by enemy action". Then followed: "The Minister of Health hereby confirms the taking possession of the premises named . . ." and below was a blank space for a signature followed by: "For senior regional officer, Ministry of Health." On July 19, 1945, the senior regional officer confirmed the requisition. In 1952 the plaintiffs brought an action for possession of the premises, contending that the confirmation by the senior regional officer was equivalent to an extension of the requisition for an indefinite period.

HELD: the documents of July 13 and 19, 1945, were nothing more than a notification by the plaintiffs of the requisition of the premises and a confirmation by the Minister of that requisition and they could not be construed as an application for and the grant of an extension by or on behalf of the Minister; the procedure laid down for extending the period of requisition had not been complied with; and, therefore, the requisition had terminated one month from the date of the taking possession of the premises, and the plaintiffs were no longer entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES at Brentford County Court dated Apr. 17, 1953.

On June 22, 1945, the plaintiffs, a local authority, through their town clerk served a notice of the requisition, "for accommodating persons rendered homeless by enemy action", of premises known as 35 and 37 Kent Road, Acton Green, W.4, in pursuance of powers delegated to them by the Minister of Health under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, made under s. 1 of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939. On July 13, 1945, the town clerk sent to the Ministry of Health a document in the following terms:

"I, Hugo Charles Lockyer, town clerk of Acton, in the exercise of powers delegated to me under the terms of the Ministry of Health Circular No. 2082 by the Minister of Health and by virtue of reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, took possession of the premises set out upon the accompanying schedule for the purpose of accommodating persons rendered homeless by enemy action."

At the bottom of the document were the words:

“The Minister of Health hereby confirms the taking possession of the premises named in the accompanying schedule.”

Below these words was a blank space followed by: “For senior regional officer, Ministry of Health,” and then a note:

A “The Minister of Health may at any time direct that the possession of the premises named in the accompanying schedule shall cease.”

On July 19 the senior regional officer confirmed the requisition. The Ministry of Health Circular No. 1949 which, by reference to Circular No. 2082, extended to the re-housing of persons rendered homeless by enemy action, provided that where (as in the present case) the requisition was limited to one month from the date of taking possession, any necessary application for the extension of the period must be made to the senior regional officer of the Ministry of Health.

B The house, No. 35 Kent Road, had, before it was damaged by bombing, been divided into two flats, one on the ground floor and one on the first floor, and the first defendant, one Morris, had occupied the ground floor. When C the house had been repaired Morris approached the plaintiffs who, in July, 1951, served notice on the then owners that they had given up possession of the ground floor flat. Morris went into occupation of that flat and in 1952 he purchased the entire house. He then let in the second defendant, one Smith, his brother-in-law, and his family to occupy the first floor flat. The plaintiffs D objected to this on the ground that the flat was still in their possession and should be occupied by their own nominee. When they attempted to install their own tenant they were excluded by Morris who had put a new lock on the door of the house to which the plaintiffs had no key.

In an action by the plaintiffs for possession of the flat and damages for trespass the defendants contended that the plaintiffs were no longer in possession since the requisition had ceased one month from the date of the notice and they E had made no application to the Minister for an extension of the time as required by Circular No. 1949, the document dated July 19, 1945, amounting only to a confirmation of the requisition. The county court judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to possession of the flat and made an order for possession.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: There was some question as to the construction of the document of July 13, 1945, but, in my opinion, having regard to the words at the bottom and the blank space, it was a request by the town clerk to the Minister of Health, through the senior regional officer, to confirm the taking possession of the premises named in the schedule. G The Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51, dealt with the taking of possession, or, as it is normally called, the requisitioning, of premises for varying purposes of the war. It is common ground that there was power to delegate the powers which the Minister of Health had as a competent authority within the meaning of the regulation and that he did so delegate his powers for certain H purposes and subject to certain restrictions to local authorities, including the plaintiffs in this action.

The first point taken for the defendants is that the delegated powers were not valid beyond a month, and, therefore, the requisition is now invalid. It will have been noted that the document of July 13, 1945, from the town clerk to the Ministry of Health referred to Circular No. 2082 as the circular under which possession was taken. It is a curious fact that when the plaintiffs amended their pleadings they said that they had taken possession under Circular No. 1857, to which I shall refer. It is conceded that, if they are held to their pleadings, they must fail, because Circular No. 1857 does not authorise the taking of possession for the accommodation of persons rendered homeless by enemy action. We were told that that point was not taken below, and I think it is probably true that, if it had been taken, the learned county court judge would have allowed an amendment. In my view, if it became material, we would allow an amendment. I will proceed to consider the matter on the basis that it is open to the plaintiffs to say that they requisitioned these premises under Circular No. 2082 which was dated July 3, 1940, and covers the present subject-matter. In respect of the procedure with which we are concerned, it is provided by para. 9 (ii) that it should be in accordance with

“the conditions laid down in the enclosure to Circular No. 1949, except para. 3 (ii) and except that the exceptional procedure set out in para. 2 of that enclosure may be regarded as the normal procedure for the purpose of this delegation.”

That is a little complicated. When, however, one turns to Circular No. 1949 one finds that it provides that normally approval by the Minister should be sought in advance of requisition, but it also provides for the exceptional procedure referred to under which requisition may be taken first subject to conditions to which I will refer in a moment. When we come to the procedure, in the enclosure to Circular No. 1949, para. 3 (i) reads:

“The requisitioning power is limited to the taking possession of (a) Houses or other residential buildings, in both cases if unoccupied; (b) Other buildings whether occupied or not.”

Paragraph 3 (ii) is immaterial. By para. 3 (iii):

“The period of occupation of the building is not to extend beyond the period indicated to the clerk by the senior regional officer when consent is given to the requisition; or, in the case of premises requisitioned under the exceptional procedure set out in para. 2, beyond one month. In both cases any necessary application for the extension of the period should be made to the senior regional officer.”

That last sentence contains the words on which this appeal turns. It is argued on behalf of the defendants that in the document of July 13, 1945, submitted by the town clerk to the Minister, there is no application for the extension of the period of one month for any period, and, therefore, the condition necessary to extend the requisition beyond a month has not been complied with. Prima facie, that seems to me to be right. The plaintiffs—and we are moving, I agree, in a technical field—sought to get over the difficulty which those words seem to create by referring to other circulars and to the general background of delegation under reg. 51. I am bound to say for myself that the further one probes into matters other than the directly relevant document, the more difficult does their case become. In Circular No. 1857, which was the admittedly inapplicable circular relied on in the pleadings, there was also a provision that the period of occupation was not to extend beyond one month from the date of taking possession, and then in para. 6 (iii) there are these words: “unless the requisition is confirmed by the Minister”. In that circular, therefore, confirmation was regarded as the appropriate process for extending the time of requisition beyond the month, but, whether that provision was regarded as an inapt use of words or not, it is material to note that it was amended by para. 15 of Circular No. 1949, the procedure under that circular being assimilated to the procedure under Circular No. 2082 with which we are concerned. If one investigates these other matters there is attached to Circular No. 1949 Form C.S.2 to be submitted to the Minister. The form submitted to the Minister on July 13, 1945, by the town clerk, was inaccurately headed "Form C.S.2." It does not set out everything which is set out in Form C.S.2. Form C.S.2, I think, emphasises the view which the defendants put before the court that confirmation is one thing and extension of time is another, because at the bottom of Form C.S.2 will be found these two sentences:

A "The Minister of Health hereby confirms the taking possession of the land and/or premises named above", and

B "The period of occupation must not extend beyond — months from the date of taking possession unless the consent of the Minister is obtained."

Then there are the words:

"Note. The Minister of Health may at any time direct that the possession of the land and/or premises named in this application shall cease."

C In my opinion, this is a case in which the principle to be applied is that those who are exercising special powers to take private property must see that they carry out accurately and in detail the Act of Parliament, or, in this case, the conditions of the requisitions under the circulars and Defence Regulations. Nor is it clear that this is a matter of no substance. All that has happened here is that there was confirmation by the Minister of something which did not require confirmation, namely, taking possession of the premises. There are no words D to suggest that the Minister has been asked to extend the time or that he has done so. For these reasons I think this first point succeeds and that this appeal should be allowed.

If that is right, it is unnecessary to consider the second point which was whether, assuming that the plaintiffs still had the right to use the premises, E they could get an order for possession or damages for trespass as all that the first defendant had done was to put a lock on his own door. It may be that the form of relief was not claimed in precisely the right way. It may be that the right of the local authority which the first defendant infringed was a right of access, but, if that had been the point, probably even at this stage it could have been put right by an amendment asking for the appropriate declaration.

F JENKINS, L.J.: The plaintiffs' claim to possession of No. 35 Kent Road depends on their town clerk's requisition notice dated June 22, 1945, and the confirmation by the senior regional officer of the Ministry of Health of the town clerk's taking possession of the premises, dated July 19, 1945. They claim that those two documents, taken together, constituted a valid requisition of the G premises which at all times thereafter remained, and is still, in force. The defendants contend that the requisition of the premises carried out by means of those documents ceased to have effect at the expiration of one month from the date of the town clerk's notice of requisition, that is to say, one month from June 22, 1945. This question turns on the true construction of those documents and of the circular letters issued by the Minister from time to time H whereby he delegated, pursuant to the authority given him under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, various requisitioning powers to local authorities.

The first of those circulars to which we were referred was Circular No. 1857 dated Aug. 27, 1939. That contains, in para. 6, this provision, headed "Requisitioning powers":

"Local authorities have in many cases already made arrangements for the temporary use of unoccupied buildings for evacuation purposes, and it is not thought that the use of compulsory requisitioning powers will often be necessary. In order, however, to meet cases in which accommodation in unoccupied dwelling-houses or other buildings is urgently required for purposes of the government evacuation scheme and no arrangements with the owners have been found practicable, the Minister has decided to delegate to the clerks of local authorities the requisitioning powers conferred on him by reg. 51 of the Defence Regulations . . . The delegation is subject to the following restrictions: (i) The requisitioning power is limited to the taking possession of (a) Houses or other residential buildings, in both cases if unoccupied; (b) Other buildings whether occupied or not. (ii) The power is limited to the taking of possession of buildings for some purpose directly connected with the government's evacuation scheme under s. 56 of the Civil Defence Act, 1939, as, for example, the accommodation of persons transferred under the scheme or the provision of the accommodation for communal meals, etc., for these persons. (iii) The period of occupation of the building is not to extend beyond one month from the date of taking possession, unless the requisition is confirmed by the Minister."

It will be observed that the purposes to which those requisitioning powers relate are not relevant to the present case, for they were the purposes of, or directly connected with, the government evacuation scheme, and it is common ground that the requisitioning here in question had nothing to do with any such scheme. It is, nevertheless, important to note that under para. 6 (iii) the period of occupation of the building is not to extend beyond one month from the date of taking possession unless the requisition is confirmed by the Minister.

The next circular to which reference should be made is Circular No. 1949 dated Jan. 18, 1940. That circular related primarily to the occupation of premises for first-aid, ambulance, and mortuary purposes and purposes connected with the emergency hospital scheme. Those, again, are purposes not relevant to the present case. But para. 15 of Part 2 of Circular No. 1949 contains the following provision:

"The exercise by clerks to county borough and county district councils of the powers delegated to them by paras. 6 and 7 of Circular No. 1857 dated Aug. 27, 1939, will in future be subject to the conditions laid down in the enclosure to this circular."

The enclosure to the circular says:

"In A.R.P. Department Circular (No. — dated —) and issued by the Minister of Home Security it was announced that the requisitioning powers previously delegated to clerks for various civil defence purposes were, with one exception (the provision of public shelters), made subject to the condition that the prior consent of the regional commissioners should be obtained before possession of land or premises is taken over. The Minister has decided to adopt a similar procedure in relation to the taking possession of premises for purposes connected with the first-aid post, ambulance and mortuary services, and with the government evacuation scheme, and accordingly in future the consent of the department must be obtained before possession is taken."

There is a provision about applications for the purpose of obtaining consent, and para. 2 goes on:

"The only exception to this rule is the case where additional premises are urgently required in extension of or in substitution for existing premises during or immediately following an air-raid. In these circumstances possession may be taken without reference to the department, although the senior regional officer should be informed as soon as possible thereafter."

Paragraph 3 contains limitations on the requisitioning power. The first relates to the character of the premises, and nothing turns on that here. The second also, I think, is immaterial. Paragraph 3 (iii) reads:

A "The period of occupation of the building is not to extend beyond the period indicated to the clerk by the senior regional officer when consent is given to the requisition; or, in the case of premises requisitioned under the exceptional procedure set out in para. 2, beyond one month. In both cases any necessary application for the extension of the period should be made to the senior regional officer."

B Thus, one finds that in the enclosure to Circular No. 1949 a new provision is introduced, to the effect that where the requisition is limited to the period of one month as having been made without prior consent, any necessary application for the extension of the period should be made to the senior regional officer, whereas in Circular No. 1857 the provision was to the effect that the period of occupation of the building was to be limited to one month unless the requisition was confirmed by the Minister.

C Finally, there is Circular No. 2082 which dealt with the subject-matter here in question, that is to say, to put it very broadly, the re-housing of persons rendered homeless by bombing. That contained this delegation of powers in para. 9:

D "The Minister accordingly, in exercise of his power under para. 5 of Defence (General) Regulation 51, hereby extends the powers already delegated to you to cover the taking possession of buildings for some purpose directly connected with the accommodation of refugees from enemy attack or the imminence of enemy action. The exercise of the powers now delegated will be subject to the following conditions, namely,

E (i) The power shall not be exercised in advance of the occasion on which the buildings are required; (ii) the conditions laid down in the enclosure to Circular No. 1949, except para. 3 (ii) and except that the exceptional procedure set out in para. 2 of that enclosure may be regarded as the normal procedure for the purpose of this delegation."

F The result, therefore, was that in cases to which Circular No. 2082 applied it was permissible, as normal procedure, for a local authority to requisition without obtaining the previous consent of the Minister or the regional officer representing the Minister, but in such cases the duration of the requisition was limited to one month and any necessary application for the extension of the period was to be made to the senior regional officer.

G Those being the relevant circulars, I should turn again to the two actual documents in this case. The requisition notice of June 22, 1945, does not expressly refer to Circular No. 2082, but a reference to that circular is implicit in the concluding words "for accommodating persons rendered homeless by enemy action."

H It was, therefore, a requisition under the powers delegated by Circular No. 2082 made without any prior consent from the Minister, and the position, accordingly, was, if I understand the circulars correctly, that the requisition effected by this notice could last only for the period of one month subject to the possibility of its being extended for some further period on an application for that purpose being made to the regional officer. The plaintiffs rely on the senior regional officer's confirmation of July 19, 1945, as equivalent to an extension for an indefinite period. I cannot accept that view. The document to which such confirmation is attached on the face of it contains no more than a notification by the town clerk of what he has done, namely, the taking possession of the premises under Circular No. 2082. Appended as it is to such a document, the confirmation on behalf of the Minister is, on the face of it, no more than a confirmation of that which the town clerk has already done, namely, the effecting of a requisition to be valid for a period of one month. It is said that we should construe this document as recording an extension granted by or on behalf of the Minister, but I cannot construe it as anything more than a confirmation of the existing state of affairs. A

My Lord has pointed out that additional force is given to the defendants' argument on this part of the case by the circumstance that in Circular No. 1857 the word used is "confirmation", whereas Circular No. 2082 refers to "extension". In a matter of construction it is always legitimate to assume that a change of language is intended to produce some difference in the meaning. B Under the relevant circular in the present case the procedure laid down to make a requisition such as this effective for more than one month was an application for an extension to be granted by or on behalf of the Minister. No such application was made, and my conclusion is that no such extension was granted. I appreciate that, so far as the Minister himself was concerned, it would have been within his powers to requisition premises for an indefinite period for any authorised purpose, and I also appreciate that it would have been possible C for him to delegate ad hoc authority to effect such a requisition in any particular case. If that course had been adopted, the result might well have been different, but that course was not adopted. The procedure followed was intended to comply with the provisions of the circulars, and for the reasons I have given I think it failed to do so. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal should be allowed. D My conclusion in regard to the validity and duration of the requisition makes it unnecessary to decide the interesting question whether, even if the requisition had still been in force, any relief could properly have been granted against the first defendant, the owner of the premises, for the acts on his part alleged to have amounted to the exclusion of the plaintiffs from possession.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered and cannot usefully add anything. E

Appeal allowed.

BRIGHT v. BRIGHT.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), July 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 1953.]

Divorce—Desertion—Constructive desertion—Previous suit charging adultery and cruelty dismissed—Allegations in petition alleging desertion same as those raised, or capable of being raised, by earlier petition.

A The wife filed a petition, dated Apr. 21, 1950, for divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery with his half-sister, L.B.T., and cruelty. The allegations of cruelty were, inter alia, that in or about 1927 the husband threatened the wife with a revolver; that in or about 1928 he threw several of the wife's belongings out of the window and threatened to throw her out of the house; and that, in the early part of 1932, he threatened to attack the wife with a knife, broke a finger of her left hand, and punched her in the right eye. The charges were denied by the husband, and on Jan. 22, 1952, the wife's petition was dismissed. The wife then filed a petition, dated Oct. 2, 1952, for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion, alleging, inter alia, that from about 1926 the husband frequently quarrelled with and abused the wife; that in 1927 she had become suspicious that the husband was carrying on an improper association with L.B.T., and that when she asked the husband to see less of L.B.T. their relationship became further strained; that between 1927 and 1930 the husband kept her short of money and frequently told her that he no longer wanted her and wished that she would go; that in April, 1930, when the wife refused to share a bedroom with L.B.T., the husband left the house with L.B.T. to find alternative accommodation; and the wife repeated the three allegations in her former petition relating to the revolver, throwing her belongings out of the window, and breaking her finger, and said that by such conduct the husband had in April, 1932, driven her from the matrimonial home. The husband, by his answer, denied the charge of desertion and pleaded that the wife was estopped per rem judicatam from making any of these allegations. On these preliminary issues,

F HELD: it was necessary in proceedings in the Divorce Division to distinguish between an estoppel as against a party charged with an offence and an estoppel as against a party putting forward a charge against the other party; in the latter event, as here, no interest of the public was infringed by saying that a party was estopped per rem judicatam from repeating allegations that had previously been the subject of judicial determination, and, therefore, the ordinary rules of estoppel applied: Hudson v. Hudson ([1948] 1 All E.R. 773), distinguished; and, accordingly, G (i) since the allegation of adultery had been dismissed in the previous suit the wife could not now allege that she had reasonable grounds for belief in such adultery and the allegations relating to this would be struck out; Allen v. Allen ([1951] 1 All E.R. 724), applied; (ii) the allegations of threats of violence and of actual assault, which repeated the allegations in the previous petition, would also be struck out since the acts alleged either did or did not amount to cruelty, and if, as had been held H in the earlier suit, they did not amount to cruelty, they could not now be relied on as "grave and weighty matters" to support a charge of constructive desertion, for by their very nature the acts either constituted cruelty or amounted to nothing: Dixon v. Dixon ([1953] 1 All E.R. 910) and Foster v. Foster (ante, p. 518), distinguished; Timmins v. Timmins (ante, p. 187), considered; (iii) the allegations that the husband had quarrelled with and abused the wife, had kept her short of money, and had frequently told her that he no longer wanted her and wished that she would go, had not been specifically raised in the previous proceedings, but could and should have been raised in support of the charge of cruelty then made, and, therefore, those allegations would also be struck out: Hoystead v. Taxation Comr. ([1926] A.C. 155), applied; (iv) the remaining allegation, that the husband left the wife in April, 1930, raised a case of simple desertion which had not been investigated in the former suit, and, therefore, would not be struck out, and the wife would have leave to amend her petition to enable her to charge her husband with simple desertion at that date.

PETITION by the wife for dissolution of marriage.

The parties were married in Sierra Leone on Jan. 15, 1911. There were three children of the marriage. The parties were African and were domiciled in Sierra Leone, but they came to England for some time in 1930 and later returned to Sierra Leone. On Apr. 30, 1932, the wife filed in the Supreme Court of Sierra Leone a petition for judicial separation on the ground of the husband's cruelty, but the wife did not proceed and the petition remained on the court file. Ever since April, 1932, the parties had lived separate and apart. In 1942 the wife came to England and had remained in England ever since. The husband, who was a doctor, remained in Sierra Leone. The wife filed a petition dated Apr. 21, 1950, for dissolution of the marriage, in which she alleged that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the petition on the ground that she had been resident in this country for the preceding three years, in accordance with the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (now the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18 (1) (b)). She further alleged that the husband had committed adultery with one L.B.T., his half-sister, and the petition continued:

" 12. That the [husband] has since the celebration of the marriage treated the [wife] with cruelty. 13. That in or about 1913 at Park House, Garrison Street, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] struck the [wife] a violent blow on the thumb with a stick, breaking the skin and causing severe bruising. 14. That in or about 1915, at Park House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] pushed the [wife] violently against the corner of a bed post, and her left eye was thereby severely cut and bruised. 15. That in or about the year 1926, at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] struck the [wife] a violent blow on the head with a shoe. 16. That in or about 1927 at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] drew a revolver from his pocket and threatened to shoot the [wife]. 17. That in or about 1928 the [husband], who frightened the [wife] by the violence of his temper, threw several of her belongings out of the window of the White House, Freetown aforesaid, and threatened to throw her out of the house. 18. That in January, 1932, when the [wife] was living apart from the [husband] at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband], in an angry and threatening manner, entered the said house with some half dozen persons against the will of the [wife] and forced her to run from the house and seek the protection of the police. 19. That in or about the early part of 1932 at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] advanced towards the [wife] with a knife in his hand, threatening to attack her. A violent struggle took place between the [husband] and . . . a nephew by marriage of the [wife], who was present and who came to her assistance. The [husband's] knife was taken from him, but he broke free, seized the [wife] by her left hand and broke her finger by twisting it, he then struck the [wife] a violent blow with his clenched fist in her right eye. 20. That from the early days of the marriage the [husband] caused the [wife] great distress and anxiety by his frequent demands for large sums of money. 21. That the [wife] has by reason of the [husband's] conduct suffered injury and risk of injury to her health."

The husband, by his answer, denied the allegations of adultery and cruelty. The suit was heard by Mr. Commissioner BUSH JAMES, Q.C., who dismissed the petition on Jan. 22, 1952.

By a petition dated Oct. 2, 1952, the wife now sought a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of desertion, and alleged :

" 8. That the [husband] has deserted the [wife] without just cause for a period of three years immediately preceding the presentation of this petition, to wit, from and since about the month of March, 1932. The circumstances of the desertion are set out in paras. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 hereof. 9. That from about the year 1926 the attitude of the [husband] towards the [wife] changed and the [husband] frequently quarrelled with and abused the [wife]. 10. That during the year 1927 the [wife] received a letter from the [husband], who was in England, from which the [wife] became suspicious that the [husband] was carrying on an improper association with his half-sister, [L.B.T.]. 11. That when the [husband] returned to the matrimonial home, the White House, Freetown, Sierra Leone, he refused the [wife's] request that he should see less of the said [L.B.T.], and relations between the [wife] and the [husband] became further strained. 12. That between the years 1927 and 1930 the [husband] habitually kept the [wife] short of money. 13. That between the years 1927 and 1930 at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] frequently told the [wife] that he no longer wanted her and wished that she would go. 14. That in or about the year 1927 at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] threatened the [wife] with a revolver. 15. That in or about the year 1928 at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] threatened to throw the [wife] out of the house, and in fact threw some of her belongings out of a window and told her to go. 16. That in or about the month of April, 1930, at 18, Albany Road, Stroud Green, in the county of London, when the [wife] refused to share a bedroom with the said [L.B.T.], the [husband] refused to stay in the same house with the [wife], and left forthwith to find alternative accommodation with the said [L.B.T.], and the [husband] did not return to the [wife] while they remained in England. 17. That in or about the month of March, 1932, at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, the [husband] threatened the [wife] with a knife, broke one of her fingers by twisting it, and struck her a violent blow on her right eye with his clenched fist. 18. That by his conduct as aforesaid the [husband] evinced an intention to drive the [wife] from the matrimonial home with the object of bringing cohabitation between the [wife] and the [husband] permanently to an end; and that the [wife] was thereby in or about the month of April, 1932, driven from the matrimonial home at the White House, Freetown aforesaid, and has not thereafter returned to cohabitation with the [husband] and her health has been damaged by the [husband's] treatment of her."

This petition was served on the husband in Freetown on Oct. 31, 1952. No appearance was entered by the husband, and on Jan. 23, 1953, application was made by the wife to DAVIES, J., for an expedited hearing as a witness from the Gold Coast, then in England, was intending to return home. The application was granted and the case came as an undefended suit before His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE WHITE, sitting as a commissioner in divorce, who, on Feb. 9, 1953, granted a decree nisi in favour of the wife. Before the decree had been made absolute, the husband filed notice of motion for a re-hearing, in pursuance of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 36 (1). On June 23, 1953, the Divisional Court set aside the decree nisi and ordered a re-hearing. By his answer, dated June 23, 1953, the husband denied desertion, and said that the matters alleged in para. 10 had been litigated before and pronounced on by Mr. Commissioner BUSH JAMES, Q.C.; that the allegations in para. 14, para. 15 and para. 17 were identical in substance with the allegations in para. 16, para. 17 and para. 19, respectively, of the previous petition; and "That the [wife] ought not to be admitted to plead desertion and is estopped from pleading that she had just cause as alleged in . . . her petition on the ground that she is seeking to re-litigate matter which has already been determined in the judgment of Mr. Commissioner BUSH JAMES, Q.C. . . . The merits of the said pleas are res judicata."

This report deals with the preliminary issue of estoppel thus raised, as decided by WILLMER, J., on July 29, 1953.

C. N. Shawcross, Q.C., and R. T. Barnard for the wife.
Simon, Q.C., and Gorst, Q.C., for the husband.

WILLMER, J.: This case arises out of a wife's petition for divorce on the ground of desertion. In its present form, the petition constitutes a plea of constructive desertion, for it is alleged that on a date in April, 1932, the wife by reason of the husband's conduct was driven out of the matrimonial home. I have to deal with two preliminary questions which have been raised on the threshold of the trial. On the one side, the husband contends that the wife is estopped per rem judicatam from raising the allegations which she now

- A seeks to raise to show that the husband was guilty of desertion by driving her out. The reason for that contention is that there was a previous petition by the wife against the husband on the grounds of cruelty and adultery. That petition was heard by Mr. Commissioner BUSH JAMES, Q.C., in January, 1952, and was dismissed. It is contended on behalf of the husband that all the allegations which are now put forward in support of the plea of constructive desertion
- B were either put forward and dismissed in the course of the previous proceedings, or else are such that they could, and ought to, have been put forward as part of the case which was then presented. On those grounds, it is urged that the wife ought not to be allowed to litigate again what amounts to substantially the same case as she sought to put forward on the previous occasion. On the
- C other hand, the wife asks leave to amend her petition by including an alternative plea of simple desertion on a date in April, 1930. It is not, nor I think can it be, suggested, that such a plea would be barred by any estoppel arising out of anything decided in the previous case; but it is urged on behalf of the husband that, if I accede to the husband's application and refuse to allow the wife to put forward her allegations of constructive desertion, I ought not,
- D especially at this very late stage, to allow her to make such a radical amendment of her case. On the other hand, if I allow all, or some, at any rate, of the wife's allegations of constructive desertion to stand, then, as I understood counsel for the husband, it is conceded that it would be difficult to resist the wife's application to amend. It was quite properly pointed out on behalf of the wife that this is an unfortunate way of dealing with an application of this sort.
- E The proper way to deal with it would have been to apply in chambers before trial for an order striking out the offending part, or parts, of the petition, so as to get these questions decided without waiting for the trial, and without incurring the expense of collecting the witnesses and making all the other preparations for trial. However, that course was not taken and, unfortunate
- F as it may be that it was not, I do not think it affects the merits of the application; it only goes to the question of costs. I think it remains true to say that, if the wife is estopped by reason of the judgment in the previous proceedings, it would clearly be wrong for me to allow the present suit to proceed.

- I think it will be convenient if I state my decision on these difficult questions straight away, and then proceed to give the reasons which have guided me to that decision. On the main question I have come to the conclusion that the
- G wife is estopped per rem judicatam from raising any of the allegations in the petition which go to support her plea of constructive desertion. That, as I see it, involves para. 9 to para. 15 of the petition, both inclusive, and also para. 17 and para. 18. It does not, however, so far as I can see, touch para. 16, which alleges that in April, 1930, the husband refused to stay in the same
- H house as the wife and left forthwith to find alternative accommodation. I cannot see that anything was decided in the previous proceedings which would involve any estoppel against the wife in raising that allegation. That is an allegation of a physical separation induced by the act of the husband in April, 1930, and it leads me at once to the amendment asked for by the wife, namely, the amendment to raise the allegation of simple desertion in April, 1930. That corresponds with the allegation in para. 16 of the petition, and as I cannot see that there is any estoppel against that allegation it seems to me that I ought to allow leave to amend in order to allege a simple desertion in April, 1930.

Now for the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] I will endeavour to summarise the objections taken by the husband to the allegations now made. Paragraph 10 and para. 11, which raise allegations of an association between the husband and his half-sister, L.B.T., which, it is said, prompted suspicions in the mind of the wife, are objected to on the ground that it is no longer open to the wife to allege that she had any reasonable grounds for suspicion, having regard to the finding of the learned commissioner that the association complained of was not in fact a guilty association. On that point, the husband relies on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Allen v. Allen (1), which made it clear that, once the court has decided that a charge of adultery has not been proved, it is no longer open to the complaining party to say that he or she had reasonable ground for believing in such adultery. Paragraph 14, para. 15 and para. 17 raise allegations of threats of violence or of actual assault, and it is complained by the husband that they are mere repetitions of allegations made in the previous petition and expressly dealt with by the learned commissioner in his judgment, whereby he found that the allegations made were not proved. He came to the conclusion that nothing which the husband did in the way of threats or assault amounted to cruelty, and, in those circumstances, it is said that the same allegations cannot now be raised in support of a plea of constructive desertion. In support of that contention, I was referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pike v. Pike (2), and particularly to the remarks of HODSON, L.J., and DENNING, L.J. In that case, an attempt was made to set up a case of constructive desertion by alleging acts which, if they were anything at all, were acts of cruelty, and the Court of Appeal decided that a party desiring to put forward such a case must charge cruelty. It will be sufficient if I read two extracts. HODSON, L.J., said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 235):

"I want to make it as clear as I can that when the case sought to be made is in the nature of a case of cruelty, it is not possible to build up a case of constructive desertion by what is really a case of unproved cruelty. That, of course, does not cover the whole area of constructive desertion, for grave and weighty matters might be alleged which are quite different in kind and quite as serious, if not more serious, than cruelty."

Pausing there, it is said that what is there described by HODSON, L.J., is exactly what the wife is trying to do in this case, that is to say, she is trying to build up a case of constructive desertion by what is really a case of unproved cruelty. DENNING, L.J., said (ibid., 236):

"In the circumstances of this case, the husband's conduct was either cruelty or it was not. It was not something different from cruelty. For the wife to justify her refusal to return, the only thing she could rely on would be the husband's cruelty, and in such a case cruelty must be pleaded and proved."

The observations of DENNING, L.J., were developed and explained by him in Timmins v. Timmins (3), when he said (ante, p. 191):

"We were referred to Pike v. Pike (2), and, in view of some comments made on it by DAVIES, J., in Dixon v. Dixon (4), I think I ought to explain some of the things I there said. In considering whether one party has good cause for leaving the other, much depends on whether the conduct complained of is of a 'grave and weighty' character or not. Conduct which is of a grave and weighty character may sometimes fall short of cruelty because it lacks the element of injury to health: as in Russell v. Russell (5) and Edwards v. Edwards (6); or because it lacks the element of intent to injure (as in the case of drunkenness or association with other women); but, nevertheless, it may give good cause for leaving, as the cases which I have cited earlier amply show. On the other hand, conduct which is not 'of a grave and weighty character', and is for that reason not cruelty, does not give good cause for leaving: see Yeatman v. Yeatman (7). It is conduct of that kind to which I referred in Pike v. Pike (2) when I said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 235) that conduct 'less than cruelty' does not justify a spouse in leaving. In the present case, the conduct of the husband was, I think, of a grave and weighty character, and the only reason why it was not cruelty was because there was no intent to injure. It comes, therefore, within the earlier cases to which I referred."

To that quotation I would add that in the present case it is suggested that the conduct complained of comes within the latter class referred to by DENNING, L.J., that is to say, in the present case it is said that the acts relied on by the wife were either acts of cruelty or else they were not grave and weighty matters at all. That being so, since the learned commissioner decided they were not acts of cruelty, they cannot be relied on as grave and weighty matters justifying the allegation of constructive desertion.

I come next to para. 9, para. 12 and para. 13. These relate to matters which appear not to have been specifically raised in the previous proceedings, but it is argued that all the matters alleged could, if true, have been raised in support of the charge of cruelty then made. That being so, it is contended that the court ought not now to entertain them, especially having regard to the general principles relating to estoppel which have been laid down in the decided cases. The locus classicus to which I was referred in this connection is Hoystead v. Taxation Comr. (8). I need not refer to the facts of that case which have no relation to those of the present case, but, in giving the judgment of the Privy Council, LORD SHAW stated the principle in the following oft-quoted words ([1926] A.C. 170):

"It is seen from this citation of authority that if in any court of competent jurisdiction a decision is reached, a party is estopped from questioning it in a new legal proceeding. But the principle also extends to any point, whether of assumption or admission, which was in substance the ratio of and fundamental to the decision. The rule on this subject was set forth in the leading case of Henderson v. Henderson (9) by WIGRAM, V.-C., as follows (3 Hare, 114): 'I believe I state the rule of the court correctly when I say, that where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward, only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time.' This authority has been frequently referred to and followed, and is settled law."

On the principles there stated, it is contended by the husband that these allegations in para. 9, para. 12 and para. 13 of the present petition, although not raised in the previous petition, nevertheless ought not to be allowed to be raised now.

On behalf of the wife it was contended in the first place that in relation to questions of estoppel the principles applied in this court differ materially from those applied in the ordinary civil courts. They differ, it is said, because of the overriding interest which the public has in proceedings in this court, particularly in proceedings which raise questions of status. No one will desire to quarrel with the statement that this court is concerned, as no ordinary civil court is concerned, with the public interest. It is argued that for that reason the ordinary rules of estoppel per rem judicatam do not apply here. In support of that contention, I was referred to some remarks of LANGTON, J., in Winter v. Winter (10). That was a case of an application for re-hearing by a husband, who had allowed an undefended petition by his wife to go through and then changed his mind about it. LANGTON, J., sitting in the Divisional Court, made it clear that the husband personally had no merits whatsoever. The Divisional Court, nevertheless, made an order for a re-hearing of the case, largely because they held that they were concerned, not only with the interests of the unmeritorious husband, but also with the public interest of ensuring that his case was properly investigated and that the wife did not obtain relief to which she was not properly entitled merely because of the absence of the husband.

The facts of Hudson v. Hudson (11) were more like those of the present case. That was a case in which the question was raised whether a husband, against whom a justices' order had been made on the ground of persistent cruelty, was estopped by that order from contesting the same allegations of cruelty when brought in this court in the course of a petition for divorce. It was held that there was no estoppel, notwithstanding the fact that the justices' order had been the subject of an unsuccessful appeal to the Divisional Court who had expressly affirmed it. The decision, I think, is conveniently summed up by the second sentence of the headnote ([1948] P. 293) which says:

"In the Divorce Court the matter is not concluded per rem judicatam; and no doctrine of estoppel can operate against a party so as to abrogate the statutory duty of the court to inquire into the truth of a petition which is properly before it."

From that it is argued that the public interest prevents me from striking out, on the ground of estoppel, these paragraphs of the petition which are now objected to. I think that that argument rests on a misapprehension, and on a failure to distinguish between an estoppel as against a party charged with an offence and an estoppel as against a party putting forward a charge against the opposite party. It is one thing to say that the husband is not estopped from denying charges made by the wife, i.e., that the wife cannot in this court get relief simply because the husband is estopped from denying the charges. In that case the public interest, no doubt, does intervene to see that relief is not improperly obtained by a petitioner merely through some technical rule. But it is quite another thing to say that a petitioner, who is, if I may use the expression, the aggressor, the party bringing the charges, is entitled to persist in repeating allegations which have already been the subject of previous proceedings and have already been determined against him or her, and to do this merely for the purpose of obtaining relief for himself or herself. In such circumstances, as I see it, no interest of the public is infringed by saying that the petitioner is estopped per rem judicatam from repeating allegations that have previously been the subject of judicial determination. On the contrary, there is abundant authority for the proposition that in such cases the doctrine of estoppel applies with its full force in this as in any other court. I do not propose to refer in detail to the wealth of authority on this subject; most of the cases are collected in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 6th ed., p. 185; and the text, which states the law, as far as I can see, in an unexceptionable way, reads (ibid., p. 184):

- A "Charges which have been unsuccessfully put forward and disposed of in one suit, cannot be repeated in a second between the same parties; for not only does the common law doctrine of estoppel apply, but, since in matrimonial causes a wife usually brings her suit at the expense of her husband, a repetition of charges would act as a peculiar hardship. The rule applies not only to the actual point of decision in the previous case, but also to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time."
- B

I refer to a good example in Finney v. Finney (12), which has been approved in Harriman v. Harriman (13), and in Winnan v. Winnan (14). In those circumstances I do not think there is any merit in the first objection which the wife takes, and I hold that the ordinary rules as to estoppel per rem judicatam apply in relation to the allegations contained in this petition.

- The next objection taken is that, notwithstanding that the rules of estoppel may apply, nevertheless there is authority against holding that, where there has been a determination with regard to allegations of cruelty, the petitioner is necessarily estopped from raising the same allegations again in support of a plea of constructive desertion. On this aspect of the case it seems to me the wife has a more formidable argument. I was referred in the first instance to the recent decision of DAVIES, J., in Dixon v. Dixon (4). That was a case which came before the learned judge in chambers on an application to strike out from a petition a plea of constructive desertion on the ground that the allegations put forward in support of it were the same allegations as had been the subject of an unsuccessful petition for cruelty. In other words, on the face of it, the problem before the learned judge in that case was precisely the same as the problem before me now. The difference is that there the learned judge was dealing with the application at the proper time, viz., on a summons in chambers before the trial, whereas I am asked to deal with it at the trial. The summons was adjourned into court, and we, therefore, have the benefit of a report of the judgment. DAVIES, J., in that case felt himself unable to accede to the application, and, consequently, refused to strike out the offending paragraphs. I was invited by the wife to follow the decision of DAVIES, J., in that case, but, for reasons which I will try to explain, it seems to me that the circumstances in Dixon v. Dixon (4) are distinguishable in material particulars from those of the present case. One of the difficulties which DAVIES, J., appears to have felt, and to which he gave expression in the course of his judgment, was the difficulty of reconciling what was said in Pike v. Pike (2), in the passages to which I have already referred, with the decision (also of the Court of Appeal) in Edwards v. Edwards (6). The other circumstance which caused difficulty, and which, I think, was one of the main reasons for his decision, was the fact that in that case the judgment of the learned commissioner who had tried the original petition for cruelty was extremely brief; it did not deal in detail with all the various allegations put forward, and did not in the least make it clear what exactly the learned commissioner was deciding with regard to the various allegations. In those circumstances DAVIES, J., although, I think, obviously feeling sympathy for the application, held that it was impossible to take the drastic course of striking out the allegations in limine, but that the case must be allowed to go to trial. This case which is before me is somewhat different.

For here the judgment of the learned commissioner in the previous petition for cruelty is very full and deals in detail with the various allegations that were raised. In particular, the judgment deals specifically with the allegations as to threats and assaults which are repeated in the present petition. So I do not share the difficulty of DAVIES, J., of not knowing what the learned commissioner in the previous proceedings really decided in relation to the allegations now made. Another matter in respect of which, it seems to me, I have the advantage of DAVIES, J., is that the difficulty of understanding what was meant by the Court of Appeal in Pike v. Pike (2) does not now persist, for since the decision of DAVIES, J., in Dixon v. Dixon (4) Timmins v. Timmins (3), to which I have already referred, has been before the Court of Appeal, and I have had the benefit of the explanation given in Timmins v. Timmins (3) of what had previously been said in Pike v. Pike (2). It may be that if DAVIES, J., had had the advantage, which I have had, of reading what was said in Timmins v. Timmins (3), he might have come to a different conclusion. I do not know, but at any rate, in view of what was there said in the passage to which I have already referred (ante, p. 191), it appears to me that in relation to these allegations of violence or threats of violence the principle applies that either they were acts of cruelty, or, if they were not acts of cruelty, they were not "grave and weighty" matters at all. They cannot be put forward as "grave and weighty" matters other than cruelty on the ground, for instance, that they were not calculated to injure health or did not involve any intent to injure. By their very nature they either come within the class of acts calculated to injure health or intended to injure, or else they do not amount to anything at all; and if they do not amount to anything at all (which, as I see it, is the effect of the judgment of the learned commissioner), then they cannot be relied on as "grave and weighty matters" to support a charge of constructive desertion. At any rate, having the advantage of the decision in Timmins v. Timmins (3), and bearing in mind the great difference between the judgment which is said to raise the estoppel in this case and that which was before DAVIES, J., in Dixon v. Dixon (4), I do not think I can hold myself bound by the decision in Dixon v. Dixon (4).

Another authority strongly relied upon on behalf of the wife was Foster v. Foster (15). That was a case in which there had been two summonses by the wife before different benches of justices. There was an earlier summons before one bench of justices on the ground of persistent cruelty, which the justices dismissed. There was a later summons, which came before a different bench, on the ground of constructive desertion arising partly out of the same circumstances as the previous summons for cruelty, and in that second case, the second bench of justices found in favour of the wife. The question was then taken to the Divisional Court on appeal from the decision of the second bench of justices. The Divisional Court thus had to deal with a case where allegations, which had been the subject of a previous summons for cruelty, were again used to support a summons based on constructive desertion. It was a case about which the Divisional Court clearly felt difficulty. I notice from the dates given at the head of the report that it appears to have occupied the attention of the court for three days. Eventually the Divisional Court came to the conclusion that they could not interfere with the decision of the second bench of justices. There was in that case, in addition to the matters put forward as allegations of cruelty in the earlier case, evidence of certain other acts said to have been done by the husband subsequent to the date of the acts relied on in the first proceedings. The problem before the Divisional Court was not, of course, the same as that which I have to deal with here, viz., whether a party is to be allowed to make the allegations at all. There the allegations had already been made, and evidence given in support of them, in the course

A of the proceedings before the justices. The problem before the Divisional Court was whether there was admissible evidence by which the decision of the justices, the subject of the appeal, could be supported. Their decision was that there was enough, I think I can add just enough, evidence to support the decision of the justices. I think it is made clear from the report that in coming to that decision LORD MERRIMAN, P., and COLLINGWOOD, J., were impressed by the fact that, in addition to the allegations which had been the subject of the previous proceedings for cruelty, there were other allegations of subsequent behaviour on the part of the husband, which were capable of supporting a charge of constructive desertion. If that is right, then clearly Foster v. Foster (15) is distinguishable from the case which I have to decide now, quite apart, of course, from the obvious distinction to which I have already referred, viz., B that the problem to be solved by the Divisional Court was not the same as that which I have to deal with here.

C In the result, I hold that so far as this petition raises the same allegations as those put forward in the previous petition for cruelty the wife is estopped from reiterating those allegations in support of her plea of constructive desertion. That decision governs para. 14, para. 15 and para. 17, which, as I pointed out, are paragraphs reiterating matters which formed the subject of specific allegations and specific findings in the previous case. With regard to para. 9, para. 12 and para. 13, which raise matters not specifically raised in the previous proceedings, it is clear to me that these allegations are all allegations which could well have been made as part of the cruelty case which was then sought to be set up; indeed, one could go further, and say, from experience D of this court, that each of them is of the type commonly raised in almost every cruelty case that comes before this court. In those circumstances, it appears to me that every word that was said in Hoystead v. Taxation Comr. (8), in the passage to which I have already referred, applies with its full force. In my judgment, the wife ought not now to be allowed to raise these allegations, which could have been raised as part of her case of cruelty if they are allegations E of substance. With regard to para. 10 and para. 11 of the petition, as I have said, the learned commissioner found that the association between the husband and his half-sister was not an adulterous association. Actually he went further than that, because in the discussion which followed the conclusion of his judgment he said:

F "I do not think these charges of incestuous adultery should ever have been brought. I think they are wicked."

That is a strong statement by the learned commissioner who tried the case. Having regard to his finding on those charges of adultery, it is no longer open in law for the wife to allege that she has reasonable cause to suspect the husband's association with the woman named. That is the result of Allen v. Allen (1), to which I have already referred. At no time, therefore, subsequent G to January, 1952, when the learned commissioner pronounced his judgment, could the wife rely on that suspicion in support of her plea of constructive desertion. The importance is that this petition, as I have said, was not presented until October, 1952, and, as is well-known, the desertion complained of in a petition for divorce must cover the three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. Having regard to the decision of the learned commissioner in January, 1952, it appears to me that from that time onwards H it was impossible for the wife to rely in support of her allegation of constructive desertion on the suspicion which she says she had about her husband's relationship with the woman named. In those circumstances I do not think it is open to the wife now to complain, as part of her case of constructive desertion, that she suspected that association.

That leaves only para. 8 and para. 16. Paragraph 8 is the subject of the application for amendment to which I have already referred, and I venture to suggest to counsel for the wife that, perhaps, para. 16 requires amendment as well. But, as I said at the outset of this judgment, I cannot see that the wife is in any way estopped, by reason of any finding in the previous proceedings, from alleging that the husband left her in April, 1930. No such allegation was put forward as part of the charge of cruelty which was investigated in the previous proceedings, nor, so far as I know, is it in any way connected with the charge of adultery which was then made. I say that, notwithstanding the fact that in para. 16 the name of the woman named is actually referred to, but it is not referred to in connection with any charge of, or suspicion of, adultery. I can see no ground, therefore, on which I can fairly say that para. 16 ought to be struck out. If that paragraph is to remain, then it seems to me that in order that the pleadings in the case should bear some relation to that which it is desired to prove by evidence, I ought to allow the amendment sought for the purpose of alleging simple desertion in April, 1930. I have not said a word so far on the subject of delay, but I cannot help adverting to the fact that the act of desertion, which it is now desired to allege, is said to have happened twenty-three years ago, and this is not the first opportunity which the wife has had of bringing it forward. It is true that she could not proceed in this country until 1949, but unless I am told I am wrong I should assume she could have proceeded a good deal before that in her own country. In those circumstances it is obvious that the question of delay must arise. I have not dealt with it in what I have said so far, because it seems to me that it comes properly at a later stage of the case; it is one of the things about which the wife will clearly have to be questioned, if the case goes on and she has to give her evidence, and in the end it may be that I shall have to consider whether the delay has been such that, in my discretion, I ought to refuse relief.

[HIS LORDSHIP then heard the evidence and, on July 31, 1953, dismissed the wife's petition.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE PROVINCE OF ALBERTA AND ANOTHER v. HUGGARD ASSETS, LTD., AND ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF CANADA AND OTHERS (INTERVENERS).

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), October 6, 7, 8, 9, 13, 14, 15, 16, 20, 21, 1952, March 24, 1953.]

Privy Council—Canada—Alberta—Crown lands—Grant by Dominion of rights over petroleum and natural gas—Power to impose royalties—Validity of royalties imposed after grant—Transfer of rights in Crown land from Dominion to Province—Dominion Lands Act, 1908 (c. 20), s. 76 (k)—Natural Resources Act [Transfer Agreement Act], 1930 (S.A., 1930 (c. 21)), s. 1, s. 3.

The respondents H.A., Ltd. (the plaintiffs in the action), were the successors in title to rights in respect of petroleum and natural gas in certain Crown lands in Alberta granted by the Crown in August, 1913, in right of the Dominion of Canada, pursuant to Orders in Council of 1911 and 1913. The grant contained, inter alia, the following terms "... to have and to hold the same unto the grantee in fee simple, yielding and paying unto us and our successors such royalty upon the said petroleum and natural gas, if any, from time to time prescribed by regulations of our governor in council, it being hereby declared that this grant is subject in all respects to the provisions of any such regulations with respect of royalty upon the said petroleum and natural gas or any of them, and to such regulations governing petroleum and natural gas as were in force on Sept. 1, 1909 . . ." At the time of the grant there were regulations in force affecting the terms on which the Dominions could dispose of Crown lands, but there was no specific rate of royalty chargeable for petroleum or natural gas. The regulations in force on Sept. 1, 1909, referred to in the grant of August, 1913, were the Consolidated Regulations, 1906, made under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Acts, 1886 to 1892, which provided, by para. 6, for the levying of a variable royalty. At the time of the grant the Dominion Lands Acts, 1886 to 1892, and the regulations thereunder had been repealed or superseded by the Dominion Lands Act, 1908, and the Orders in Council of 1911 and 1913 were made pursuant to s. 76 (k) of the Act of 1908, giving the governor in council power to make orders and regulations concerning the disposal, etc., of Crown land and mineral rights. By the Natural Resources Act [Transfer Agreement Act], 1930, of Alberta the rights and powers in respect of Crown lands, mines and minerals, etc., in Alberta were transferred to the Crown in right of the province, and by Orders in Council made between 1941 and 1948, the province of Alberta purported to impose a royalty on any petroleum or natural gas derived from lands so vested in the province. The respondents thereupon brought an action for, inter alia, a declaration that the province was not entitled to exact any such royalty. On appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada,

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the grant, and, in particular, having regard to the words "from time to time", the Crown was empowered to impose royalties in respect of petroleum and natural gas by regulations made after the date of the grant;

(ii) even assuming that a grant subject to a variable royalty was inconsistent with the requirements of tenure in free and common socage (established for the land in question by a charter of 1670), the terms of grants of land were now governed by the Dominion Lands Acts and the regulations and orders made thereunder, passed subsequent to 1870, which had validated the grant.

Per curiam: The Statute of Tenure, 1660, does not apply to Canada.

(iii) section 78 (k) of the Act of 1908 giving power to the governor in council to "... further make any regulations which are considered necessary to give the provisions of this section full effect" did not preclude the governor from making the orders of 1911 and 1913 embodying the regulations of 1906, even though they had been superseded, and the effect of the orders, read together, was to validate the grant of 1913 including the imposition of royalties, and this right to levy a "variable royalty" was a right which, within s. 3 of the Alberta Transfer Act, 1930, by "contract . . . or other arrangements . . . relating to . . . lands, mines, minerals or royalties" was transferred by s. 1 and s. 3 of the Act from the Crown in right of the Dominion to the Crown in right of the province, and, consequently, the province, by the Orders in Council of 1941-48, was justified in levying the royalties in question.

Mar. 24. LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE delivered the following judgment of the Board. The issue raised on this appeal is, shortly, whether the Crown in right of the Province of Alberta is entitled to levy certain royalties from Huggard Assets, Ltd., respondents in the appeal and plaintiffs in the action, on petroleum and natural gas derived by them from a certain area in that province.

The facts leading up to this litigation, which will have to be unfolded in more detail later, can, with advantage, be stated in brief outline at the outset. The plaintiffs claim an interest in these minerals as successors of a company called the Northern Alberta Exploration Co., Ltd., the original grantees of the area under a grant in the form of a patent dated Aug. 25, 1913. The grantor was the Crown in right of the Dominion. The Crown in right of Alberta succeeded, under the Transfer Agreement Act of 1930, to any right which the Crown in right of the Dominion had theretofore owned in Crown lands, mines and minerals situate in Alberta, and royalties derived therefrom; together with the right to enforce

"any power or right, which, by any contract, lease or other arrangements, or by any Act of the Parliament of Canada relating to any of the lands, mines, minerals or royalties hereby transferred or by any regulation made under any such Act, is reserved " to the Crown in right of the Dominion. These provisions have been described as constituting a "statutory novation", the province stepping into the shoes of the Dominion, and succeeding to its rights. The main issue in the case is whether the Dominion, at the time of the grant in 1913, was entitled to the right to exact royalties, which are now in dispute. The determination of that issue depends on the answer to the two further questions:—(1) What, on its true construction, does the grant of 1913 in its reddendum purport to provide in respect of royalties payable by the grantee? (2) Whatever on its true construction that provision means, is it legally valid and enforceable?

It may be convenient to set out the habendum and reddendum of the grant at this stage:

"... to have and to hold the same unto the grantee in fee simple, yielding and paying unto us and our successors such royalty upon the said petroleum and natural gas, if any, from time to time prescribed by regulations of our governor in council, it being hereby declared that this grant is subject in all respects to the provisions of any such regulations with respect of royalty upon the said petroleum and natural gas or any of them, and to such regulations governing petroleum and natural gas as were in force on Sept. 1, 1909..."

and there follow provisions for forfeiture on failure to pay such royalty. At the time of the grant there were regulations in existence affecting the terms on which the Dominion could dispose of Crown lands, mines and minerals in Alberta, but none of these regulations prescribed a specific rate of royalty chargeable in respect of petroleum or natural gas derived from these sources.

(1) The first question which their Lordships have to decide is whether, in these circumstances, having regard to the terms of the grant, and, in particular, to the words "from time to time", the reddendum purported to entitle the Crown, as grantor—then in right of the Dominion—to levy royalties "prescribed" by a regulation, or a succession of regulations, made after the date of the grant. Their Lordships have considered this question and are clearly of opinion that the answer must be in the affirmative. The grant does purport to confer such a right on the grantor. This was the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada. Any other answer would render the words "from time to time" meaningless. It is true that in Majestic Mines, Ltd. v. A.-G. for Alberta (1), a different conclusion was reached but the crucial words "from time to time" were absent, and clearly the decision might have been the other way if they had been present. (Their Lordships may point out, as some argument was based on the words "if any" as used in the reddendum in the present case, that, in their view, these words plainly qualify the word "royalty" and not "petroleum or natural gas", or "natural gas" only.)

(2) This answer, however, merely disposes of the problem what it was that the grant purported to provide. A more difficult question remains, viz.: whether the grant could validly contain such a provision. This question emerged when, some time after the Transfer Agreement of 1930 had vested Crown lands, mines and minerals (situate in Alberta) and rights and powers in respect of royalties on such lands, etc., in the Crown in right of that province, the province, by various Orders in Council made between 1941 and 1948, purported to impose a royalty on any petroleum and natural gas derived from lands, etc., vested in the province by the Act of 1930. As the result of this imposition the plaintiffs brought the present action and claimed in the prayer to their statement of claim the following relief:

"1. A declaration that the Lieutenant Governor in Council (of Alberta) was not entitled to exact any royalty with respect to petroleum and natural gas produced from the lands. 2. An order rectifying the patent by striking out all references to royalties."

Four points of varying importance may conveniently be noted here: (a) No facts are alleged or were proved which could possibly support a plea of rectification. There was no preceding contract representing the real bargain to which the terms of the grant failed to give effect. This disposes of the second branch of the prayer. (b) The plaintiffs at no stage contended—nor did the defendants—that the grant was wholly invalid. The plaintiffs impugned only the provision as to royalties, wishing this to be deleted and the rest to stand. (c) No point was taken in the statement of claim, or at any stage of the argument till the case was heard before this Board, to the effect that a grant in terms of this reddendum or a royalty levied in accordance therewith could only be authorised by a regulation as opposed to an Order in Council. At every stage until the ultimate appeal an Order in Council was assumed to be as good as a regulation for these purposes. Nevertheless, much of the Board's time was occupied with this argument and with a number of other contentions not raised below. (d) No point was taken by counsel prior to the hearing before this Board, that the English Statute of Tenures, 1660 (12 Car. 2, c. 24), extended to this region of Canada and invalidated any grant of minerals in fee simple on terms which permitted the Crown as grantor to levy a royalty, the existence or quantum of which could be determined from time to time by its own caprice or whim. This last point was, however, raised proprio motu by the Supreme Court of Canada, which, by a majority of four to three, decided the appeal before them largely on it.

It is now time to indicate the course which the proceedings below followed. The Supreme Court of Alberta, Trial Division (McBRIDE, J.), decided for the plaintiffs. It considered that only point (1)—the construction of the reddendum of the grant—was in issue. The learned judge decided—erroneously in their Lordships' view—that the reddendum did not, on its true construction, purport to entitle the Crown as grantor to impose royalties on petroleum and natural gas by regulations to be made in future, none having been imposed thereon by any regulation in force when the grant was made. He did not consider what might be the validity of a provision which did purport to give the Crown such a right: but decided for the plaintiffs on the ground that the Crown did not in the grant even stipulate for the power it claimed later to exercise. The defendants appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court which, the four learned judges being equally divided, dismissed the appeal. There was then a further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. The learned judges (seven in all) were unanimously of opinion that the learned trial judge and the Appellate Division were in error in supposing that the reddendum of the grant did not purport to have a prospective operation. They all thought that, according to its tenor, it empowered the Crown to prescribe royalties in respect of petroleum and natural gas by a regulation posterior to the date of the grant, albeit none were proscribed by any regulation anterior to that date. In this view their Lordships have recorded their concurrence. The Supreme Court, though favourable to the appellant defendants on this point, dismissed the appeal by a majority of four to three, for a different reason: one which, their Lordships were informed, was not raised before them by counsel, and which had certainly been raised by no one in the Trial or Appellate Divisions. The main reason for this decision was that, owing to the supposed application of Charles II's Statute of Tenures, 1660 (12 Car. 2, c. 24), a royalty in the form contended for by the Crown was contrary to law, bad for uncertainty, and void, and that no competent legislation had validated it. They further held that the condition for payment of royalties being bad, the forfeiture clause conditioned on its breach was bad also, and that the grant was valid minus the provision as to royalties. Such is a bare summary of the three Canadian decisions on which the appeal came before this Board. The ratio on which the Supreme Court of Canada reached its conclusions, albeit by a bare majority, must be most carefully weighed, and a more precise account of it given; for so far it has only been adumbrated. But before doing so, their Lordships observe that it may prove convenient to describe a royalty which the grantor claims to be entitled to impose for the first time after the contract or grant, at any figure he chooses, or to vary from time to time at his uncontrolled discretion, as a "variable royalty". It will also make for brevity to refer to the areas which came to be called after 1670 "Prince Rupert's Land" and the "North Western Territories", simply as "Rupert's Land".

The argument in support of the proposition that the grant could not validly provide for a "variable royalty" in this sense of the term may be summarised under the following heads:—(1) A royalty is akin to rent if not a species of it. A rent must be "certain": and a rent variable at the whim of the lessor is uncertain. So, therefore, is a royalty similarly variable: and unenforceable independently of any argument founded on the statute of King Charles II. (2) The Statute of Tenures, 1660, applies to Canada or that part of it called Rupert's Land, which was vested in the Dominion in 1870 and from which, in 1905, Alberta (including the mineral lands in question) was carved out. This statute, by cll. 2 and 4, abolishes grants in fee of land on tenures (such as the old English tenure by knight service) for which the consideration consisted at one time of uncertain services, or of payments by way of composition for such services which reflected in their quantum or in the method of their determination the uncertainty of the services themselves. Clause 4 provided that "all tenures hereafter to be created by the King's Majesty . . . Upon any . . . grants . . . of any estate of inheritance at the common law shall be in free and common socage, and shall be adjudged to be in free and common socage only, and not by knight service or in capite, and shall be discharged of all wardship value and forfeiture of marriage, livery, primer seisin, ousterlemain", and certain other burdens incident to tenure by knight service. Clause 4 relates to estates to be created "hereafter". Clauses 1 and 2 abolish knight service tenure and its characteristic burdens (which in those clauses were described as including "escuage") in respect of existing estates, and convert them also into tenure by free and common socage, free from those burdens for the future. The hall-mark, it was said, in LITTLETON, COKE ON LITTLETON, and BLACKSTONE, of tenure by "free and common socage" was, and is, that any services, or cash composition in lieu thereof, must be "certain": and, so the argument continued, since a "variable royalty" could not be described as "certain" in any sense of the word, ergo "a variable royalty" was prohibited by the statute. (3) It was further contended that, whether or not the Act of 1660 applied to Rupert's Land with the results described in (2) above, in any case the charter, by which in 1670 Charles II granted Rupert's Land to the Hudson's Bay Company expressly included a term providing for the prevalence of free and common socage as the standard basis of tenure of land therein. The same result, it was suggested, could be reached if Rupert's Land was a "settled" colony (as it has been since held to be: Walker v. Walker (2): Board v. Board (3)) even if there were no such provision in the charter, for it is well established that settlers import into a settled colony the common and statute law of their country as they existed at the time of settlement, and so far as applicable to the settled territory. But the terms of the charter would seem to make resort to this rule superfluous so far as the establishment of socage tenure is concerned. All these three arguments, even if otherwise sound, are liable to be met by two answers:—(i) that a “variable” royalty is consistent with “free and common socage”, or (ii) that, if it is not, Dominion legislation has displaced the requirement of such socage tenure and validated a form or forms of tenure which are inconsistent with it. The second of the three arguments—that based on the Act of 1660—may, in addition to these possible objections, be exposed to a third: namely, that the statute of Charles II never applied to Canada; or to the material part of Canada, namely, “Rupert’s Land”.

Their Lordships proceed to consider each of these three arguments in turn: in the first instance in abstraction from the possible effect of any “validating” legislation. (1) They do not consider that the first of the arguments in question is established. There may well be an analogy between royalties in respect of a grant, and rent in respect of a lease, and it may well be that rents must be in some sense of the word “certain”. But what does “certain” mean in this connection? What is an “uncertain” rent? A rent, payable in year one, the amount of which is to depend on events which cannot happen till year three, would seem to be in any sense of the word, “uncertain” and bad. The tenant could never tell till year three how much rent he was liable to pay in year one; consequently, neither he nor his lessor could know for how much, if anything, the latter could in year one distrain. This is an extreme case. Short of it, it is clear that a fluctuating rent is not, as such, necessarily “uncertain”—certainly not if it is mathematically calculable, so as to attract the operation of the maxim “certum est quod certum reddi potest”. The only decided case cited to the Board in which a rent was held “uncertain” is the old case of Parker v. Harris (4), the report of which is both laconic and obscure. It would seem that what was “uncertain” there was not the quantum of the rent but the times at which it was to be payable. It is said in the present case that the royalty is “uncertain” because its amount depends on the whim, from time to time, of the grantor. It seems doubtful whether this quality is fatal. In this very case, the charter of 1670 provided for a royalty which, in some sense, depends on the whim of the grantor, the King. He is to receive two elks and two black beavers every time he visits the territories in question. No one can tell whether he will visit the territory at all; nor if he does, how often: yet his unpredictable election to visit it never, seldom, or repeatedly, determines the number of elks and beavers to be “yielded up”. In these circumstances, their Lordships are not satisfied that this contention is made out. But, whether sound or unsound, it would still (like the other two) fall to the ground if adequate “validating legislation” were proved. (2) The majority of the Supreme Court, as has been stated, based their decision, in the main, on the Statute of Tenures, 1660. Their reasoning assumes that this statute applied to Canada, or at least to “Rupert’s Land”. The Act has no express “extent” clause. An Act of the Imperial Parliament today, unless it provides otherwise, applies to the whole of the United Kingdom and to nothing outside the United Kingdom: not even to the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, let alone to a remote overseas colony or possession. In 1660 there was, of course, no United Kingdom. The Acts of Union of 1706 (with Scotland) and of 1800 (with Ireland) were still in the womb of time. True, it happened that since

- the accession to the English throne of James I—already then King of Scotland—the same person was the Sovereign of both England and Scotland, just as later, the same person was to occupy the British and the Hanoverian throne. But that coincidence of sovereignties is beside the present purpose. Their Lordships are unaware that there was, in 1660, any technical rule of draftsmanship governing the geographical area to which an English Act of Parliament was presumed to apply where its terms were silent on that point. The question whether such an Act applied outside England (which, since 1536, has by Act of Parliament included Wales) must depend in such circumstances on the intention of its framers, to be deduced from the nature of its subject-matter and substantive provisions. It would, presumably, have no such external application if its subject-matter were beyond question of merely insular and domestic import. Their Lordships, if it were necessary to decide the point, would incline to the view that the Act of 1660 was of purely local application: that it applied to England only. Its main objects were two: (i) to abolish certain oppressive incidents of feudal military tenure, “wardships”, “marriages” “primer seisin”, “ousterlemain” and the like. To effect this it was necessary to abolish the military or knight service tenures themselves—the soil from which those incidents sprang. Their sacrifice must involve the King in financial loss, for which he was to be compensated under the terms of the Act (cl. 15 to 27) by certain duties on strong liquors, for instance, beer, cider, perry and aqua vitæ; some home produced, some imported. It seems to their Lordships strained to suppose that such an Act, recording a compromise between the King of England and his people, the main object of which was the abolition of certain peculiarities of our insular medieval land tenure, was intended to apply to a vast tract of country thousands of miles away which was only inhabited at the time by a few Indians and half castes: people who had never smarted under wardships, marriage and primer seisin, and had almost certainly never heard of them. It seems to their Lordships that these and the other provisions of the Act—notwithstanding that it provides that “free and common socage” should prevail in future, and abolishes tenure by “escuage”—were not intended to apply outside England and Wales; to which, along with Berwick-on-Tweed, the machinery for collecting the compensatory duties is expressly confined (cl. 47). Their Lordships have dwelt on this point somewhat at length because the judgments of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada are so largely founded on it. Having regard, however, to the conclusions they have reached on other points, it is almost academic, because apart from the rule governing settled colonies, the charter of 1670, under which the Hudson’s Bay Company was granted Rupert’s Land, provides expressly for tenure of that land in “free and common socage and not in capite or by knightes service.” That being so, two questions remain:—A. Were the terms of the grant which is in question in this case—a grant subject to a “variable royalty”—inconsistent with and in breach of the requirements of tenure in “free and common socage”? B. If yes, were those requirements still valid when the grant was made in 1913, or had legislation, regulations or orders passed in the meantime so far modified them as to validate the grant?
- H A. The first of these questions is open to doubt; for, as their Lordships have observed, in the charter itself the consideration moving from the tenant—the royalty—is as to its amount largely at the discretion of the grantor, the King of England. If he chooses never to visit the area, no royalty is payable at all: and this would seem to argue that a considerable degree of “uncertainty” in the consideration moving from the tenant is compatible with “free and common socage”, notwithstanding the dicta of LITTLETON, COKE and BLACKSTONE, to the contrary. One instance given by LITTLETON (COKE ON LITTLETON, 96A) of a tenure on "certain" services is where the tenure depends on the tenant shearing all sheep on the grantor's land: a service which can clearly be made more or less burdensome according as the grantor chooses to have on his land few or many sheep. LITTLETON himself describes this as a "certainty in uncertainty". Rather than plunge into the jungle of learned disagreement which surrounds what is, or is not, involved in free and common socage, their Lordships will assume, without deciding, that it is inconsistent with the terms of the 1913 grant.

B. On that assumption, the residual question is whether competent legislation has validated the grant. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that it has done so. There can be no question that the Dominion Parliament was competent at all material times, after 1870, by clear enactment, to repeal or vary any law as to land tenure prevailing in Rupert's Land before that region was in that year vested in the Dominion, even if this meant introducing forms of tenure unknown in the past to English law, or forbidden by it. The question is not whether the Dominion possessed the necessary power, but whether, in fact, it exercised it. The legislature of a new country with a small population and vast possibilities of development might well favour an elastic policy in its efforts to attract settlers, and be the less inclined to submit indefinitely to the fetters of English feudal tradition in such matters as land tenure. By a complex of legislation between 1868 and 1870, into the details of which their Lordships do not think it necessary to enter, the Hudson's Bay Company surrendered its grant of Rupert's Land for £300,000 and on June 23, 1870, that region was admitted to the Dominion. The charter of 1670, under which it had been granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, expressly provided, as has been seen, that tenure should be in "free and common socage". Interim legislation (e.g., the Act of 1869 (Dom.), 32 & 33 Vict. c. 3) provided that all laws in force in Rupert's Land at the time of its admission should (unless contrary to the British North America Act, 1867) remain in force till altered. An Imperial Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 28), "to remove doubts", confirmed all Dominion statutes relating to this transaction and gave power to the Dominion inter alia to make provision for the "peace order and good government . . . of any territory not yet for the time being included in any province". (Which would aptly describe that part of Rupert's Land which later became Alberta.) Subsequent Dominion Acts followed containing similar provisions, e.g., Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, c. 62 (which itself reproduced similar provisions in an Act of 1886 and even earlier legislation), and by s. 12 enacted as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, the laws of England relating to civil and criminal matters, as the same existed on July 15, 1870, shall be in force in the territories, in so far as the same are applicable to the territories, and in so far as the same have not been, or are not hereafter, as regards the territories, repealed, altered, varied, modified, or affected by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom or of the Parliament of Canada, applicable to the territories, or by any ordinance of the territories."

This provision was in force at the time of the disputed grant of 1913. It can hardly be said that tenure by socage was, in 1870, a part of the "laws of England" inapplicable to Rupert's Land, since this tenure had been in force in that tract under the terms of its charter, for exactly two centuries before its transfer to the Dominion. Nevertheless, the question remains whether, by competent legislation subsequent to the transfer, this part of the "laws of England" had been "repealed, altered, varied, or modified" in such a way as to validate the present grant. Such validating provisions, if they exist, must be sought mainly, if not entirely, in the successive "Dominion Lands Acts" and regulations or orders made thereunder. The Dominion Lands Act in force at the time of the 1913 grant was c. 20 of the statutes of 1908. Before referring to its terms it may, however, be helpful to refer to an earlier statute, the Dominion Lands Act, 1886 (R.S.C. 1886 c. 54). Section 47 of that Act reads as follows:

"Lands containing coal or other minerals, whether in surveyed or unsurveyed territory, shall not be subject to the provisions of this Act respecting sale or homestead entry, but shall be disposed of in such manner and on such terms and conditions as are, from time to time, fixed by the governor in council, by regulations made in that behalf", and was reproduced by s. 47 of the Dominion Lands Act, 1892, with the addition of a proviso which does not affect the present case. The Act of 1886 further provided by s. 90:

"The governor in council may . . . (h) Make such orders as are deemed necessary from time to time to carry out the provisions of this Act according to their true intent, or to meet any cases which arise, and for which no provision is made in this Act; and further make and declare any regulations which are considered necessary to give the provisions in this clause contained full effect; and, from time to time, alter or revoke any order or orders or any regulations made in respect of the said provisions, and make others in their stead."

Their Lordships pause to note two points in relation to these provisions of the Act of 1886:—(1) section 47 gives the governor in council powers as wide as are readily imaginable as to the "disposal" of coal and other minerals by regulation. He can impose any terms he, "from time to time," fancies: and employ any method of disposal. If this provision had stood unmodified at the time of the grant, and a regulation had been made giving effect to it, it would, in their Lordships' view, have authorised the grant, notwithstanding any inconsistency between the terms of the grant and technical socage tenure. (2) Side by side with this power, in s. 90 (h) there is a power to make "orders"—in certain special cases, e.g., "casus omissi". These two parallel powers are somewhat sharply distinguished; and the distinction persists in the Act of 1908, to which reference should next be made. Before, however, going to that statute, it is proper to note that regulations under the Act of 1886 (as amended in 1892) were made between 1901 and December, 1906, inclusive, in which month they were consolidated. They will be referred to as "the 1906 regulations" and their tenor explored later, so far as relevant.

The sections of the Act of 1908 corresponding to those cited from the Act of 1886, and dealing respectively with "regulations" and "orders", are s. 37, and s. 76 (k) of the later Act. Section 37 is as follows:

"Lands containing salt, petroleum, natural gas, coal, gold, silver, copper, iron or other minerals may be sold or leased under regulations made by the governor in council: and these regulations may provide for the disposal of mining rights underneath lands acquired or held as agricultural, grazing or hay lands, or any other lands held as to the surface only, but provision shall be made for the protection and compensation of the holders of the surface rights, in so far as they may be affected under these regulations."

Section 76 reads:

"The governor in council may . . . (k) make such orders as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act, according to their true intent, or to meet any cases which arise, and for which no provision is made in this Act; and further make any regulations which are considered necessary to give the provisions of this section full effect; ”

Thus, this Act maintains the distinction between regulations and orders, which seemingly are intended to serve different purposes; and the distinction, in this Act of 1908, is emphasised by s. 77 thereof, which reads as follows:

“ Every regulation made by the governor in council, in virtue of the provisions of this Act, and every order made by the governor in council authorising the sale of any land or the granting of any interest therein, shall have force and effect only after it has been published for four consecutive weeks in the Canada Gazette, and all such orders or regulations shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within the first fifteen days of the session next after the date thereof, and such regulations shall remain in force until the day immediately succeeding the day of prorogation of that session of Parliament, and no longer, unless during that session they are approved by resolution of both Houses of Parliament.”

This section provides that while both regulations and orders shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within fifteen days of the session next after their date, regulations (though not, apparently, orders) shall become inoperative on the day succeeding the prorogation of the session of Parliament unless during the session approved by a confirmatory resolution. Orders are seemingly not now defeasible for want of such a resolution: though it will be observed that the corresponding section of the Act of 1886—s. 91—while providing for similar formalities, does not distinguish between the effect of not complying with them in the case of a regulation on the one hand, and an order, on the other. As against this, attention should be called to a difference between the language of s. 37 of the Act of 1908 and s. 47 of the Act of 1886, which would seem, if it is significant, to limit the almost despotic powers of disposal vested in the governor in council by the latter provision. For where s. 47 spoke of “disposal” of lands, etc., “in such manner and on such terms and conditions as are, from time to time, fixed by the governor in council”, by “regulations”, s. 37 provides simply that such lands, etc., “may be sold or leased under regulations made by him”. On the other hand, if this change of language does impliedly narrow the powers of the governor in council under the Act of 1908 when proceeding by regulations, there is no corresponding limitation in that Act in his powers to proceed by order. On the contrary, an order (though, no doubt, it can be superseded by a later order) cannot, like a regulation, lapse for want of a confirmatory resolution, and would seem to be capable of dealing with cases uncovered, or not adequately dealt with, by any regulation.

As regards “regulations”, the position is complex and obscure. But the instrument, by virtue of which the grant of 1913 purported to be made, was an Order in Council, or rather two such orders, dated May 31, 1911, and Mar. 21, 1913, respectively, and not a regulation. The point that a grant in these terms could not be made under orders but only under some regulation, and that no such regulation at the material time existed, was not taken until the case was argued before this Board.

The points, therefore, remaining are:—(1) Did these orders, if themselves valid, purport to authorise a grant in the terms of that of Aug. 25, 1913? (2) Were the orders which purported to be made under s. 76 (k) of the Act of 1908 a valid exercise of the powers conferred by that sub-section? Or should the sub-section be read as not authorising any order which runs counter to tenure by “free and common socage”?

Before grappling with these questions, it may be pertinent to ask for what reason the Acts of 1886 and 1908 provided that some things could be done by regulations and some by order. That this was done deliberately admits of no doubt. The only question is "why?" Their Lordships can only suppose the explanation to be that a regulation normally (though, perhaps, not quite necessarily) applies uniform treatment to every one, or to all members of some group or class. There is one and the same "rule" ("regula") for all. On the other hand, there may be special cases which the rule did not contemplate ("casus omissi", are expressly instanced in the Acts), or to which, owing to special circumstances, it cannot apply without hardship, or without violating the spirit—"the true intent"—of the Act; and the object of the "order-making" power is to enable the Crown to make special and equitable provision ad hoc for such cases. If anything is clear it is that this case was a very special one, not covered by ordinary rules; and was so considered and treated by those who, on behalf of the Crown in right of the Dominion, made the two orders and issued the grant or patent.

What do the two orders provide? Their Lordships, while holding they should be read together, will deal with them, in the first instance, seriatim. I. The first order, dated May 31, 1911, opens with a reference to regulations assumed to be obsolete or rescinded: "the late regulations": and refers to them in its last paragraph once more as "the old regulations". These are the regulations made under the 1886 and 1892 Acts, between 1901 and 1906 inclusive, and referred to above as "the 1906 regulations" because they were issued in a consolidated form in December of 1906. These consolidated regulations had provided (by para. 1) for the "reservation" in suitable cases for purposes of prospecting for petroleum of an area of 1,920 acres, in favour of an applicant for such reservation, of land in, inter alia, the Province of Alberta. They further provided (para. 5 of the consolidation) that "if oil in paying quantities should be discovered by the prospector" . . . an area not exceeding 640 acres of land, including the oil well, would be sold to the person making such discovery at the rate of $1 per acre, and the remainder of the reserved area, viz.: 1,280 acres, would be sold at the rate of $3 per acre. Paragraph 6 provided that "a royalty at such a rate as may from time to time be specified by Order in Council will also be levied and collected on the sales of the petroleum . . ."

Paragraph 8 provided that the patent which might "be issued for petroleum lands" would be made subject to the payment of the above royalty; and that the patent might be declared null and void for default in the payment of such royalty. The order of May 31, 1911, when it refers to these regulations as the "late" or "old" petroleum regulations, assumes them to have been rescinded. This may be either because they were made under the 1886-92 Dominion Lands Acts and not under that of 1908; or more probably because in 1910 there had been made new regulations purporting to rescind the 1906 regulations, and to substitute a power of leasing for a power of sale, lease or other disposal. These last regulations were not included in the appendix of exhibits, and were only produced in the course of the argument before the Board as the result of cables to Canada. It seems doubtful, in the circumstances, whether any notice should be paid to them at all, particularly as the Board was informed that they were void, or had lapsed for failure to be laid before the two Houses of Parliament, or, having been so laid, to obtain the necessary confirmatory resolution. Let it, however, be assumed in the respondents' favour that the 1906 regulations were validly rescinded. Then what was their position? There was, in their Lordships' view, nothing to prevent the Minister from proposing, or the governor in council from making, an Order in Council, under the powers conferred by s. 76 (k) of the Act of 1908 dealing with a special case of hardship by providing that it would be governed by the rescinded 1906 regulations if the equity of the case appeared to him so to require. And this is what, in fact, the Orders in Council of May 31, 1911, and Mar. 21, 1913, professed to do. The facts leading up to both orders must here be reviewed more closely:—A “reservation” had been made under the old “1906 regulations” in favour of a Mr. Bennetto on Jan. 1, 1906, of a tract of land in Alberta, which may be called “tract X”. Bennetto had done prospecting work on that tract, which was continued by his assigns, the Northern Alberta Exploration Company, the assignors to the respondents. Oil had been discovered, but not in “paying quantities”, hence no right of sale had been acquired by any one. Meanwhile the “reservation” was due to expire on June 17, 1911. The Northern Alberta Company asked for a renewal of the reservation. The order recites that large expenditure had been incurred by Bennetto and the company, and provides that the reservation of petroleum and gas rights should be extended in favour of the company for two years from June 17, 1911: but that it should apply to land other than, though overlapping with, the land originally covered by the reservations. This may be called “tract Y”. This substitution was necessitated by the acquisition by bona fide squatters of a large area of riverain territory covering part of the surface of “tract X”—the original reservation. The order of 1911 finished by reciting and giving effect to the following recommendation:

“Should oil or natural gas be discovered in paying quantities within the period of one year from June 17, 1911, the Minister also recommends that he be authorised to sell to the company, under the provisions of the old petroleum regulations, all the lands contained within the entire area above mentioned both as regards the surface and petroleum and natural gas rights, and that if oil in paying quantities is discovered after the expiration of the first year, but before June 17, 1913, he be authorised to sell to the company the petroleum and natural gas rights under the entire area reserved and the surface rights of that portion lying between the southerly boundary of the McMurray Settlement and Horse Creek.”

II. The second Order in Council—that of Mar. 21, 1913, recites these facts and the provisions of the Order in Council of 1911, in particular its final paragraph which has just been quoted. It does not record, and presumably it was not the fact, that within one year, or even nearly two years of June 17, 1911, oil or natural gas “in paying quantities” had been discovered in the substituted area; but it does record that valuable prospecting work had been done by Bennetto and the Northern Alberta Company, and that at least $75,000 had been expended by them by October, 1912. The Order in Council ended by providing as follows:

“That in view of the very large expenditure which the Northern Alberta Exploration Co., Ltd., has incurred for the purpose of demonstrating the existence or otherwise of petroleum in the McMurray field, which demonstration must be of very great public benefit, and in view of the fact that the location first reserved for the application was lost to him through the encroachment of squatters, the Minister recommends that the above company be permitted to purchase the petroleum and natural gas rights under the entire area reserved for them by the Order in Council dated May 31, 1911, together with the available surface rights thereof, at the rate of $3.00 an acre, subject, however, to such rights as may be established under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act and the regulations, by any persons in a position to show that they have in the meantime squatted upon these lands.”

If these two orders are read together, their effect, if they are intra vires the statute of 1908, is to authorise the grant which followed on Aug. 25, 1913, both as regards the price of the land and “under rights” sold and as regards royalties. The price under the grant appears to have been $3 an acre both for the surface (1,296 acres) and the mineral rights (1,320 acres). If the Order in Council of 1911 had stood alone, the price would have been $1 as to part and $3 as to another part, for the order of 1911 imports the 1906 regulations and that is what they provide. But the Order in Council of 1913 alters this rate to $3 over-all: and the grant is so far within the authority conferred by the two orders read together. A more important matter in this appeal is that the grant contained, as part of its terms, what has been described as a "variable royalty". The Order in Council of 1911 imports, in this regard, also the terms of the "old" regulations: they are called the "regulations in force on Sept. 1, 1909", but these are the same as the "1906 regulations" and these authorise (in the regulation of May 31, 1901, or para. 6 of the consolidating regulation of 1906) the levy of royalties on petroleum sold "at such a rate as may from time to time be specified by Order in Council". It matters not in their Lordships' view whether by the years 1911-13 these regulations had been rescinded or not, or whether the Acts of 1886 to 1892 under which the 1906 regulations had been made, had been repealed or superseded by the 1908 Dominion Lands Act, or whether, while the 1906 regulations were operative, the levy of such royalties under them was to be contingent on a sale which was itself to be contingent on the discovery of petroleum in paying quantities. Under s. 76 (k) of the Act of 1908, the Crown in right of the Dominion had, in their Lordships' opinion, power to deal with a case such as this by applying to it certain of the terms (those as to royalties) of a superseded regulation. This was a special case. Oil and gas had not been discovered in paying quantities but research and expenditure, attended with much benefit to the public, had been carried out and incurred by the prospectors, the predecessors in title of the respondent company. Hence, they were allowed to acquire the land and rights in question without complying with any regulation (assuming one to exist) but were compelled to submit to liability in future to a royalty not prescribed by any regulation in force at the time of the grant. Their Lordships do not consider that, in dealing with such special or hard cases under s. 76 (k), it was intended that the discretion of the Crown should be fettered or controlled by incidents of English feudal land tenure. It had been expressly enacted that the Dominion Parliament could repeal, vary or modify any English law prevailing before 1870 in territories such as Rupert's Land, and territories like Alberta which might be carved out of it. In providing, as it did, in s. 76 (k) of the Act of 1908, for a discretionary power to deal with hard or anomalous cases the legislature was, as it seems to their Lordships, arrogating to itself the right to infringe the requirements of "free and common socage", so far as the end in view required. Where the justice of the individual case required it, it seems to their Lordships unreasonable (unless the language of the material enactments forces them to such a conclusion) to hold that the Crown's liberty to deal with such cases was intended to be exercised only within the limits set by a rigid respect for the obscure and debated frontiers of historical socage tenure. If this conclusion is justified, it follows that the grant of 1913 was valid not only in other respects, but in respect of the variable and prospective royalties reserved to the Crown in right of the Dominion. Those rights have now been transferred to Alberta. In 1930 the "Transfer Agreement Acts" were passed in identical terms by the legislatures of Alberta (Statutes of Alberta, 1930, c. 21), of the Dominion (Statutes of Canada, 1930, c. 3), and of the Imperial Parliament (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 26). Section 1 of the Alberta Act is as follows:

"In order that the province may be in the same position as the original provinces of Confederation are in virtue of s. 109 of the British North America Act, 1867, the interest of the Crown in all Crown lands, mines, minerals (precious and base) and royalties derived therefrom within the province, and all sums due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties, shall, from and after the coming into force of this agreement and subject as therein otherwise provided, belong to the province, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the Crown in the same, and the said lands, mines, minerals and royalties shall be administered by the province for the purposes thereof, subject, until the legislature of the province otherwise provides, to the provisions of any Act of the Parliament of Canada relating to such administration; any payment received by Canada in respect of any such lands, mines, minerals or royalties before the coming into force of this agreement shall continue to belong to Canada whether paid in advance or otherwise it being the intention that, except as herein otherwise specially provided, Canada shall not be liable to account to the province for any payment made in respect of any of the said lands, mines, minerals or royalties before the coming into force of this agreement, and that the province shall not be liable to account to Canada for any such payment made thereafter."

Section 3 of the Act is as follows:

"Any power or right, which, by any such contract, lease or other arrangements, or by any Act of the Parliament of Canada relating to any of the lands, mines, minerals or royalties hereby transferred or by any regulation made under any such Act, is reserved to the governor in council or to the Minister of the Interior or any other officer of the government of Canada, may be exercised by such officer of the Government of the province as may be specified by the legislature thereof from time to time, and until otherwise directed, may be exercised by the Provincial Secretary of the province."

The right to levy a "variable" royalty on these lands was a "right" which within s. 3 by "contract . . . or other arrangements . . . relating to . . . lands, mines, minerals or royalties" was originally reserved to the Crown in right of the Dominion, and by s. 1 and s. 3 was, in 1930, transferred from the Crown in right of the Dominion to the Crown in right of the Province of Alberta, which, accordingly, was justified through its lieutenant-governor in council, in levying by the various Orders in Council of 1941-48, the royalties complained of by the plaintiffs-respondents in the present case.

Their Lordships, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed and the action dismissed. Each party must pay their costs of the proceedings throughout.

Appeal allowed.

The respondents (plaintiffs in the action) were grantees or lessees of mineral lands and mining rights in the province of Alberta. The grants and leases in question were made by the Crown in right of the Dominion by virtue of Orders in Council and regulations made under the Dominion Lands Acts. In 1930, by three concurrent enactments, of the province of Alberta, of the Dominion and of the Imperial Parliament, statutory force was given to a "transfer agreement" concluded in the previous year by which the mineral lands and rights situate in certain provinces (including the province of Alberta) and which were previously vested in the Dominion were transferred to the province, the province, by s. 2 of the Alberta Act, undertaking to carry out according to its terms every contract to purchase or lease any Crown lands, mines and minerals made with the Crown in right of the Dominion before 1930 and "... not to affect or alter any term of any such contract to purchase, lease or other arrangement by legislation or otherwise ..." The royalties payable by the respondents under the original grants and leases to the Crown in right of the Dominion on coal mined amounted to seven cents per ton on land granted and five cents per ton on land leased. In 1948 the province passed the Provincial Lands Act of Alberta, s. 8 of which provided that "Notwithstanding the terms and provisions of any certificate of title ... or lease which conveys coal or the right to mine ... the same, where the payment of a royalty has been reserved to the Crown in the right of the Dominion or in the right of the province ..." there should be payable an increased royalty of ten cents per ton of coal from land leased and fifteen cents per ton from land granted. In an action by the respondents for a declaration (a) that s. 8 did not apply to their leases and lands, and (b) that s. 8 was ultra vires, HELD : section 8 was in conflict with s. 2 of the Transfer Agreement Act, 1930, and was wholly ultra vires, and null and void for all purposes.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, dated Aug. 8, 1951.

The respondents were grantees or lessees of mineral lands and mining rights in the province of Alberta (or in territories from which, in 1905, that province was carved out). The grants and leases in question were originally made by the Crown in right of the Dominion, in which, in 1870, the parent territories had been vested. They were made under powers conferred by a series of Dominion statutes called the Dominion Lands Acts, and by regulations and Orders in Council made from time to time in pursuance of those Acts. In 1930, by three concurrent enactments of the province of Alberta (c. 21, Statutes of Alberta, 1930), the Dominion (c. 3 of the Statutes of Canada, 1930), and the Imperial Parliament (the British North America Act, 1930), triple statutory force was given to a so-called "transfer agreement" concluded in the preceding year. By this agreement, which was in the nature of a novation, the mineral lands and rights situate in certain provinces and theretofore vested in the Dominion, were transferred by the Dominion to those provinces, including the province of Alberta, and the transferee provinces undertook to carry out according to its terms every contract to purchase or lease any Crown lands, mines and minerals made with the Crown in right of the Dominion before 1930. In 1948 the province of Alberta purported to pass a statute, the Provincial Lands Act, 1948 (c. 36, Statutes of Alberta, 1948), s. 8 of which fixed the royalties payable under such leases at ten cents per ton on coal mined, and, in the case of grants in fee simple, at fifteen cents per ton on coal mined

"Notwithstanding the terms and provisions of any . . . agreement for sale, or lease . . . where the payment of a royalty has been reserved to the Crown in the right of the Dominion or in the right of the province . . ."

The various mineral grants and leases held by the respondents were ranged in certain categories of each of which a "type" was conveniently set out in the agreed statement of facts. Thus, there were grant type I, grant type II, lease type I, lease type II, and lease type III. The respondents, in their amended statement of claim, claimed (a) a declaration that s. 8 of the Provincial Lands Act, 1948, did not apply to their leases and lands, and (b) a declaration that s. 8 was ultra vires. The Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta awarded a declaration in the terms of (a) of the prayer, viz., that s. 8 did not apply to any of those five types of transaction. The trial judge (McLAURIN, J.) did not expressly make the declaration prayed for under (b), but it appeared that he made the declaration under (a) because he considered that the impeached provision was in conflict with the 1930 legislation, and consequently, ultra vires and void. The Appellate Division dismissed the appeal, but their reasoning was slightly different as it turned largely on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Huggard Assets, Ltd. v. A.-G. for Alberta & Minister of Lands & Mines for Alberta (1), from which decision an appeal had since been allowed by the Board.

Mar. 24. LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE delivered the following judgment of the Board. This is an appeal by the defendants in the action from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, affirming a judgment of the Trial Division of that court. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts as set out above and continued:] Their Lordships proceed to set forth in detail the relevant statutory provisions and the effect of their interaction. Sections 1 and 2 of the Transfer Agreement Act of 1930 are as follows:

"1. In order that the province may be in the same position as the original provinces of confederation are in virtue of s. 109 of the British

A North America Act, 1867, the interest of the Crown in all Crown lands, mines, minerals (precious and base) and royalties derived therefrom within the province, and all sums due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties, shall, from and after the coming into force of this agreement and subject as therein otherwise provided, belong to the province, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the Crown in the same, and the said lands, mines, minerals and royalties shall be administered by the province for the purposes thereof, subject, until the legislature of the provinces otherwise provides, to the provisions of any Act of the Parliament of Canada relating to such administration; any payment received by Canada in respect of any such lands, mines, minerals or royalties before the coming into force of this agreement shall continue to belong to Canada, whether paid in advance or otherwise, it being the intention that, except as herein otherwise specially provided, Canada shall not be liable to account to the province for any payment made in respect of any of the said lands, mines, minerals, or royalties before the coming into force of this agreement, and that the province shall not be liable to account to Canada for any such payment made thereafter. 2. The province will carry out in accordance with the terms thereof every contract to purchase or lease any Crown lands, mines or minerals and every other arrangement whereby any person has become entitled to any interest therein as against the Crown, and further agrees not to affect or alter any term of any such contract to purchase, lease or other arrangement by legislation or otherwise, except either with the consent of all the parties thereto other than Canada or in so far as any legislation may apply generally to all similar agreements relating to lands, mines or minerals in the province or to interests therein, irrespective of who may be the parties thereto."

Section 8 of the Alberta Act of 1948 is as follows:—

E "44.c. Notwithstanding the terms and provisions of any certificate of title, agreement for sale, or lease which conveys coal or the right to mine, win, work or excavate the same, where the payment of a royalty has been reserved to the Crown in the right of the Dominion or in the right of the province, there shall be payable to the Minister on, from and after Apr. 1, 1948, (a) a royalty of ten cents per ton on any coal mined or excavated from any land, the title to which is held under lease from the Crown in the right of the Dominion or in the right of the province; (b) a royalty of fifteen cents per ton on any coal mined or excavated from any land, the title to which is held in fee simple, or under an agreement for sale from the Crown in the right of the Dominion."

F

G It may be said with sufficient accuracy for the present purpose, that the royalties imposed by s. 8 of the Act of 1948 in every case exceeded (indeed roughly doubled) the royalties payable under the terms of the typical grants and leases in question. Under the terms of these instruments seven cents a ton were payable in respect of grants, and five cents a ton in respect of leases. At the time when each of the "typical" grants and leases were made, these were, according to the "agreed statement of facts", the rates of royalty specifically authorised by the regulations in force at the time: subject to the qualification that in grant type I no specific royalty at so many cents per ton is provided for, but "a royalty at such rate per ton . . . as may from time to time be specified by our governor in council." H Having regard, however, to the view which their Lordships take of the validity of s. 8 of the statute of 1948 the detailed terms of the five types of grant and lease are not important. That view may be stated succinctly in advance of the reasoning which appears to their Lordships to support it. It is that s. 8 is in conflict with s. 2 of the Transfer Agreement Act, is wholly ultra vires, and null and void for all purposes.

Section 2 of the Act of 1930, or Acts, falls into two compartments: (1) a substantive provision extending up to the words "by legislation or otherwise"; and (2) a proviso, beginning with the word "except" and occupying the rest of the section. The question whether s. 8 of the Act of 1948 conflicts with this provision, and, if so, to what extent, depends on the true construction of each of these portions of s. 2 of the Transfer Agreement Act. It will be convenient to deal with those portions separately and seriatim. As to the first portion of s. 2, whereby the province agrees to "carry out . . . every contract to purchase or lease any Crown lands, mines or minerals and every other arrangement whereby any person has become entitled to any interest therein as against the Crown, and further agrees not to affect or alter any term of any such contract to purchase, lease or other arrangement by legislation or otherwise":

the appellant has argued that the contracts, etc., here referred to are limited to executory agreements or arrangements, and do not include conveyances or grants which, it is said, absorb and merge the contracts which lead up to them; but where a conveyance—and even a lease is a conveyance—has been executed, but is subject to outstanding obligations of an executory nature, such as an obligation to pay royalties or rent, their Lordships entertain no doubt that such a state of affairs is covered by the words "contract to purchase or lease Crown lands . . . and every other arrangement. . . ." If, therefore, the section ended there—before the exception or proviso which occupies the last five lines of the section—it would be in flat contradiction of s. 8 of the Alberta Act of 1948. Section 2 of the Act of 1930, which has the force, inter alia, of Imperial legislation, provides that the terms of pre-1930 Dominion leases and grants shall be scrupulously honoured by the province after the transfer of mineral rights to the latter. Section 8 of the Provincial Act of 1948 is a naked assertion that the terms of such instruments can be wholly disregarded. This, and nothing less, is what the word "notwithstanding" in its context, necessarily implies. Unless, therefore, there is something in the exception to s. 2 of the Act of 1930 to save s. 8 of that of 1948, s. 8 is ultra vires the Act of 1930, and the only question would be whether it is void in whole or only in part.

Before, however, embarking on that question their Lordships must consider the effect of the "exception" within one or other limbs of which the appellant contends that s. 8 falls, and by so falling is saved. (1) One limb excepts cases where all the parties, other than Canada, consent. This can be disregarded, for by cl. 13 of the agreed statement of facts it is admitted that there was no such consent. (2) A second limb of the exception excuses compliance with the enacting words in so far as the exempting legislation "may apply generally to all similar agreements relating to lands, mines or minerals in the province or to interests therein, irrespective of who may be the parties thereto".

It is contended by the appellant that s. 8 of the Act of 1948 is legislation "applying generally", etc. This contention cannot, in their Lordships' view, be sustained. Section 8, assuming it to apply to "all similar agreements", is not legislation "applying generally" to such agreements "irrespective of who may be parties thereto"; for it only applies to agreements to which the Crown (in right whether of the Dominion or a province) is a party: it does not apply when the agreement is between a private grantor or lessor—such as the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Hudson's Bay Company—and a private grantee or lessee: a distinction recognised and applied in cf., Anthony v. A.-G. of Alberta (2). The objection that the scope of an exception is presumed not to exceed, or broaden, the scope of the substantive provision to which it is an exception, gives way when the words used in the excepting provision are sufficiently clear, as their Lordships consider that, in this passage, they are. It follows that s. 8 of the Act of 1948 is ultra vires s. 2 of the Act of 1930, and is invalid; and the next question is whether it is void in whole; or severable; valid in part and void in part. It is suggested that it is valid in part, namely, that part which refers to "contracts", etc., made by the Crown in right of the province, though not in respect of that part which refers to contracts made by the Dominion. Their Lordships are of opinion that it is wholly ultra vires and wholly void. The test is very clearly laid down by VISCOUNT HALDANE in the Grain Futures case (A.-G. for Manitoba v. A.-G. for Canada (3)) ([1925] A.C. 568):

"If, therefore, the statute seeks to impose on the brokers and agents and the miscellaneous group of factors and elevator companies who may fall within its provisions, a tax which is in reality indirect within the definition which has been established, the task of separating out these cases of such persons and corporations from others in which there is a legitimate imposition of direct taxation, is a matter of such complication that it is impracticable for a court of law to make the exhaustive partition required. In other words, if the statute is ultra vires as regards the first class of cases, it has to be pronounced to be ultra vires altogether. Their Lordships agree with DUFF, J., in his view that if the Act is inoperative as regards brokers, agents and others, it is not possible for any court to presume that the legislature intended to pass it in what may prove to be a highly truncated form."

If these tests, especially that embodied in the last four lines, be applied, it is plain that s. 8 is wholly void, notwithstanding that if the portion which relates to royalties reserved on coal from land leased by the Crown in right of the province stood alone, it might be valid. If the latter provision stood alone and the rest were excised, the clause would be not only truncated but reduced to a shadow.

Their Lordships have not been asked for a declaration as to the validity vel non of the five typical transactions but only for declarations (1) that s. 8 of the Alberta statute does not apply, and (2) that it is ultra vires. Their Lordships are of opinion that it is ultra vires.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed, but that the order of the trial judge should be varied by substituting declaration (b) for declaration (a). The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN v. CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO. AND OTHERS (INTERVENERS).

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Simon, Lord Oaksey, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), May 4, 5, 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, July 6, 1953.]

Privy Council—Canada—Saskatchewan—Business tax—Exemption of property from taxation—Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Validity of Saskatchewan Act, 1905 (S.C.) (c. 42), s. 24—City Act, 1947 (S.S.) (c. 43).

By s. 16 of a contract executed on Oct. 21, 1880, between the Canadian government and the contractors who were to constitute the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which contract was scheduled to, and approved and ratified by, an Act of the Canadian Parliament of 1881 (44 Vict. c. 1): "The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, work shops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any province hereafter to be established, or by any municipal corporation therein . . ." In 1905 the province of Saskatchewan was established by the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, of the Dominion Parliament which was passed pursuant to the powers contained in the British North America Act, 1871, s. 2 of which provided, inter alia, for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of any newly established province. Section 24 of the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, provided: "The powers hereby granted to the said province shall be exercised subject to the provisions of s. 16 of the contract set forth in the schedule to c. 1 of the statutes of 1881, being an Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company". The province of Saskatchewan sought to make the respondent company liable to the "business tax" imposed by the City Act, 1947, of Saskatchewan.

HELD: (i) the words "peace, order and good government" in s. 2 of the British North America Act, 1871, were of very wide import, and a legislature empowered to pass laws for such purposes had a very wide discretion; the powers of taxation granted by that Act to new provinces were not confined to those granted by the Canadian Parliament in the British North America Act, 1867, s. 92 (2), to the original four provinces of Canada, and there was no set pattern of "a province" in the Act of 1867, which was bound to be followed in creating the new province of Saskatchewan; and, therefore, s. 24 of the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, imposing a limitation on the province's powers of taxation, was validly enacted.

Reference re Constitutional Validity of Section 17 of the Alberta Act ([1927] S.C.R. 364), approved.

(ii) the business tax was imposed on the owner of things which he was using in his business; where the measure of the tax was the extent of the taxpayer's property used in his business, and that property, when so used, was "forever free from taxation", the tax so measured could not be regarded as something lying outside the exemption; and, therefore, the exemption in s. 16 of the contract operated to relieve the respondent company from the tax.

July 6. VISCOUNT SIMON read the following judgment of the Board. This is an appeal by special leave from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, dated Nov. 20, 1950, allowing in part an appeal by the respondent from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan, dated Jan. 29, 1949.

B The Court of Appeal had before it four questions referred to it by an order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, dated Nov. 16, 1948, pursuant to the Constitutional Questions Act (c. 72 of the Revised Statutes of Saskatchewan, 1940). These questions involved consideration of the interpretation of cl. 16 of a contract executed on Oct. 21, 1880, between the Canadian government and contractors who were to constitute the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The contract
C provided for the construction, operation and maintenance of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The respondent company was created under the authority of a statute of Canada enacted in 1881 (44 Vict. c. 1), to which the contract was scheduled, and cl. 1 of the statute approved and ratified the contract. Clause 16 of the contract is as follows:

D "The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, work shops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any province hereafter to be established, or by any municipal corporation therein; and the lands of the company, in the E North-West Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown."

The Province of Saskatchewan was established in 1905 by the Saskatchewan Act of the Dominion Parliament (4 & 5 Edw. 7, c. 42) and s. 24 of that Act reads as follows:

F "The powers hereby granted to the said province shall be exercised subject to the provisions of s. 16 of the contract set forth in the schedule to c. 1 of the statutes of 1881, being an Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company."

G The Order in Council granting special leave to appeal limited the appeal to the following questions: (a) as to the validity of the limitation on the powers of the province contained in s. 24 of the Saskatchewan Act, 1905; and (b) whether the exemption granted in s. 16 of the contract covers the form of local taxation known as "business tax".

H As to (a), the appellant contends that the Parliament of Canada, in passing the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, and thereby creating the new province of Saskatchewan and including it in the Union, had no power to provide that the provincial legislature, when making laws in relation to direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of revenue for provincial purposes, or in relation to municipal institutions in the province, should exercise those powers "subject to the provisions of s. 16 of the contract", but that the effective taxing powers of the legislature of the new province remain as extensive as the powers conferred by s. 92 (2) of the British North America Act, 1867, on the legislature of each of the provinces originally included in the Federation. This amounts to saying that s. 24 of the Saskatchewan Act should be disregarded as being ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada.

As to (b), the appellant contends that if effect is to be given to s. 24, and to the provisions of s. 16 of the said contract, which thus provide a certain exemption from taxation by the new province, or by any municipal corporation therein, the result is, nevertheless, to leave the respondent company liable to "business tax" under the City Act, 1947, of the province.

Their Lordships will first deal with the former of the two questions above formulated. It is obvious that, if this first question is answered in favour of the appellant, the second question becomes immaterial, for if the provincial powers of taxation possessed by the province of Saskatchewan are as wide as those contained in s. 92 without the fetter imposed by s. 16 of the contract and s. 24 of the Saskatchewan Act, it is immaterial how s. 16 is construed and applied, and the business tax which has been enacted by the Saskatchewan legislature will be imposed on the respondent company in common with all other persons and enterprises carrying on business within the province. This first question could only be raised on appeal to the Privy Council inasmuch as it had already been in effect decided in a sense adverse to the appellant's contention in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, delivered by NEWCOMBE, J., on behalf of the court, in the Reference re Constitutional Validity of Section 17 of the Alberta Act (1). The appellant contended before the Board that NEWCOMBE, J.'s judgment leading to this conclusion in the Alberta reference was wrong, and their Lordships were, therefore, invited to dissent from the view of NEWCOMBE, J., and to hold that s. 24 of the Saskatchewan Act has no effect. Although the British North America Act, 1867, provided for a federation of four provinces only, viz., Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the statesmen who were responsible for framing the Act contemplated from the beginning the enlargement of the federal area so as to include the whole of what is now Canada. To the west of the area included in the original federation lay an immense territory stretching to the Rocky Mountains and beyond to the Pacific. The area immediately to the west (which had originally been granted to the Hudson's Bay Company by the charter of 1670) was known as Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories, and between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean lay the colony of British Columbia, which already had a separate legislature. Consequently, s. 146 of the Act made provision for the admission into the union of territories not at first included within the boundaries of Canada. The section provided as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, on addresses from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada, and from the Houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the Union, and on address from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory, or either of them, into the Union, on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act; and the provisions of any Order in Council in that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

British Columbia entered the Union in 1871 on the terms and conditions scheduled to the Order in Council of May 16, 1871, for British Columbia was a "settled" colony and thus required no statutory provision to create it an additional province of Canada. Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories had become part of Canada pursuant to the Rupert's Land Act, 1868, which authorised the surrender of the land of the Hudson's Bay Company to the Crown, and which further gave power by Order in Council on address from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada to admit the surrendered territory into the Dominion of Canada. The project of a trans-continental railway which would connect the Pacific coast with the railways in the east of Canada had long been in the minds of Canadian statesmen, and more than one effort had been made to realise the project and attract finance for such a railway. If it could be created, it would not only contribute to the development of trade, but would bind all parts of the Canadian continent together. But in order that the project should be achieved by creating a company, it was necessary to offer investors terms which would attract their support for a railway which would have to traverse immense areas of wild and thinly populated country and would involve the carrying of its track by steep gradients over the Rocky Mountains. It was among the terms and conditions insisted on by British Columbia for its admission into the Union that the government of the Dominion should assume

A “ the obligation of causing a railway to be constructed, connecting the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada ”.

(See first recital in the preamble of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1881.) Section 16 of the contract, which was ratified by that Act, was one of the inducements, and other clauses of the contract provided that the government of the Dominion should make a grant to the company of the lands required for the

C road-bed and the other sites necessary for the convenient and effective construction and working of the railway, that materials of construction should be admitted free of duty, and that there should be granted to the company blocks of land on each side of the railway, which would, of course, increase in value when the railway was made and worked. It is to be observed that s. 146 of the British North America Act, which authorised the inclusion of Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territories into the Union, did not, in terms, authorise the creation of new provinces out of these areas when admitted. Notwithstanding this, the Manitoba Act, 1870, of the Canadian Parliament (33 Vict. c. 3), provided for the creation and constitution of the province of Manitoba, which was carved out of these territories as soon as they were admitted into the Union. Doubts appear to have been entertained respecting the powers of the Parliament of Canada to establish such provinces, and, consequently, the United Kingdom Parliament enacted the British North America Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 28), which, by s. 5, confirmed the Manitoba Act, and by s. 2 provided as follows:

E “ The Parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order, and good government of such province, and for its representation in the said Parliament.”

F It is to be noted that the province of Manitoba thus created was not an exact replica of the provinces created in 1867, but the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, so far as generally applicable to the provinces previously composing the Dominion were to apply to the province of Manitoba “ except so far as the same may be varied by this Act ” (s. 2). Examples of such variation may be found in s. 22, s. 23 and s. 27 of the Manitoba Act. It was under these powers conferred by the Act of 1871 that the Parliament of Canada enacted the Saskatchewan Act in 1905 and included in it s. 24, which has already been set out. It will be observed that s. 16 of the contract of 1880 did not promise any exemption from taxation by the original provinces, for they had taxing powers under s. 92, which could not be cut down by the Dominion. The exemption provided for was “ from taxation by the Dominion, or by any province hereafter to be established ”, and hence, when the province of Saskatchewan was carved out of Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories, s. 24 was inserted by the Parliament of Canada in an effort to keep faith with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The question, therefore, which their Lordships have first to decide is whether s. 24 is validly enacted. The contention of counsel for the intervener representing Alberta, supported with energy and ingenuity by counsel for the intervener representing Manitoba, was that the Dominion Parliament was given no power by the Imperial Act of 1871 to limit the right of the new province of Saskatchewan to tax under the terms of s. 92. They contended that the authority which the Act of 1871 gave to the Dominion Parliament to carve out of the added territory "a province" was an authority to create a province with powers identical with those of the provinces already created by the Act of 1867, and that no fetter on the power of taxation of the new province was permitted. To this, counsel for the respondent railway company replied that even in the Act of 1867 the powers of taxation conferred on the four original provinces was not uniform; for example, although indirect taxation was a dominion subject (s. 91 (3)), yet, by s. 124, the right was conferred on the province of New Brunswick to levy lumber dues. And other examples could be given. There was thus no set pattern of "a province" in the Act of 1867, which was bound to be followed in creating the new province of Saskatchewan. The development of the added territories in 1871 had not advanced so far as the development of either the old provinces or of Manitoba, so that it may very well have been thought necessary to give the Dominion Parliament freedom of action in the creation of new provinces, not only as to the time of their creation but also as to the extent of powers of taxation which should be conferred on them.

Section 2 of the Act of 1871 empowers the Parliament of Canada, at the time when it establishes new provinces in the added territories, to make provision—(a) for the constitution and administration of any such province; (b) for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of any such province; and (c) for its representation in the Dominion Parliament. The words "peace, order and good government" are words of very wide import and a legislature empowered to pass laws for such purposes had a very wide discretion. But counsel for the appellant and for the intervener representing Manitoba emphasised the distinction between s. 4 of the Act of 1871, which enabled the Parliament of Canada to provide from time to time for peace, order and good government in territories not included in a province, and s. 2, which only enabled them to provide for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of a province at the time when it was established. Section 2, they argued, enabled the Canadian Parliament to define the machinery for the passing of laws, but not to prescribe what laws might be passed by the province. The prescription, they contended, had been done for good and all by s. 92 of the Act of 1867. But their Lordships would observe that if this argument was well founded, the words in s. 2 of the Act of 1871 "for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government" would be superfluous. The power to make provision for the "constitution" of the new province would be sufficient to enable the Parliament of Canada to provide a restriction on the normal range of taxing power exercised by the provincial legislature. The words under discussion being words of general import, their Lordships do not feel justified in placing on them the narrower meaning for which counsel for the appellant and the intervener representing Manitoba contend.

The appellant further relied on the phrase "subject to the provisions of this Act" in s. 146 of the Act of 1867, and contended that this phrase implied a structure of provinces analogous to the original provinces. But so far as the lands comprising Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories are concerned, s. 146 was exhausted when they were admitted to the Union, as they were by the Rupert's Land Act, 1868. It appears to their Lordships that s. 146 is, therefore, irrelevant to the issue they have to decide.

The appellant also relied on s. 3 of the British North America Act, 1886, which directed that the Act of 1867 and the Act of 1871 should be construed together. The expression "province", it was said, must, therefore, be given throughout the meaning attached to it in the Act of 1867, and this involved that every province must have full s. 92 powers. With great respect, this argument seems to involve a complete non sequitur. Every province created or to be created must, of course, be a province in the Dominion of Canada, but the Act of 1867 contained no such definition of province as would involve any conflict between that Act and the Act of 1871. There is no complete equality of powers

A between the four original provinces. The Manitoba Act, 1870, shows that an Act constituting a province might depart from the strict 1867 pattern. No doubt, one reason for the passing of the Act of 1871 was to remove any doubt as to the validity of the Manitoba Act, but it is noteworthy that a section on the lines of s. 2 of the Manitoba Act recognising variations has been introduced into

B all the documents creating a province since that date—see para. 10 of the schedule to the British Columbia Order in Council of May 16, 1871, the resolution relating to Prince Edward Island scheduled to the Prince Edward Island Order in Council of June 26, 1873, s. 3 of the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, s. 3 of the Alberta Act, 1905, and s. 3 of the terms of the Union between Canada and Newfoundland scheduled to the British North America Act, 1949. From the time that the

C North-West Territory was admitted into the Dominion, the Parliament of Canada had the widest powers of legislation under s. 5 of the Rupert's Land Act, 1868. It might have caused great inconvenience if the Parliament of Canada, when carving new provinces out of the added areas, could not make such deviation from s. 92 as was necessary to make effective acts done under the powers conferred on it by s. 5 of the Rupert's Land Act, 1868, and s. 4 of the Act of 1871. These considerations support the conclusion of the Supreme Court in the Alberta

D reference (1), and their Lordships are not prepared to differ from it.

Counsel for the appellant advanced two alternative grounds for upholding s. 24 of the Saskatchewan Act, claiming (i) that it was validated by the second paragraph of s. 2 of the Act of 1886, and (ii) that s. 16 of the agreement when approved by the Dominion Act of 1881 was part of inter-provincial railway legislation, and, therefore, within Dominion competence under s. 91 (29), and s. 92 (10) of the Act of 1867, and that s. 24, which was only included to make s. 16 effective, must also be regarded as such railway legislation within the competence of the Dominion Parliament. Their Lordships, without pronouncing on the validity of either of these arguments, prefer to rest their conclusion on the other grounds already stated.

F There remains the question whether the language of s. 16 is such as to prohibit the imposition of "business tax" on the respondent company. Notwithstanding that the exemption provided by the clause is conferred on the physical property there mentioned, all taxes are exacted from and paid by persons, and the question comes to be whether the respondent company, as the owner and user of the properties mentioned, is free from taxation in respect of them. Counsel for the interveners representing Alberta and Manitoba argue that the business tax imposed by the City Act, 1947, of Saskatchewan, was imposed on persons and companies carrying on a business and not on their property, or on their ownership or user of property. On this view, the provision that the liability to business tax of a taxpayer was measured by the floor-space or area which he used while carrying on his business was nothing more than a "yard-stick" to ascertain the amount for which the taxpayer was liable under the tax. There are, no doubt,

G many instances in which it is important to distinguish between the nature of the tax imposed and the measure of the amount of tax to be paid. For example, British income tax is imposed on the income of the taxpayer in the year of charge, but the amount of tax is measured by reference to income in an earlier year. But where the measure of the tax is the extent of the taxpayer's property used in his business, and this property when so used is "forever free from the exemption. Their Lordships agree with the view of the majority of the Supreme Court that, in the present instance, the tax in question is imposed on the owner of things which he is using in his business. As KELLOCK, J., observed ([1950] S.C.R. 218):

H taxation" the tax so measured cannot be regarded as something lying outside

"It would be an extraordinary result if the proper interpretation of this exemption were to be said to be that while taxes imposed upon the owner in respect of his ownership of these things fall within the exemption, nevertheless taxes imposed upon the owner in respect of his use of the same items do not."

LOCKE, J., stated the contention thus (ibid., 244):

"The position adopted on behalf of the province of Saskatchewan put bluntly is this: that while neither the physical property defined by cl. 1 nor the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in respect of its ownership of that property is liable to taxation, so-called business taxes may be levied upon the company in respect of its business of operating it. While the language of cl. 16 is that the property shall be 'forever free from taxation' by any province thereafter to be established, it is said that to tax the company in respect to the use of the property (itself a term of the exemption), is not to tax the property and that that alone is prohibited."

That learned judge went on to observe (ibid., 246):

"Clause 16 of the contract does not grant an absolute exemption of the stations, station grounds, buildings and other property referred to but only such as are used for the construction and working of the railway and, in my opinion, if buildings which fell within the description ceased to be used by the owner or operator of the property for such purposes the exemption would be lost. Since, therefore, it is the buildings, station grounds, yards and other property when used for these purposes which are declared to be forever free from taxation by the Dominion or by any province thereafter to be established, I think it cannot be said that a tax upon the owner in respect of the use of the property for the purpose of working the railway is not squarely within the exemption. To construe the clause otherwise is to say that the properties mentioned are exempt from all taxation when used for the defined purpose, but if they are so used that the owner may be taxed in respect of that use. I am unable so to construe the clause."

Their Lordships agree with this construction of the clause and have reached the conclusion that the exemption operates to relieve the respondent company from the tax.

In the course of the argument the decision in Halifax Corpn. v. Fairbanks' Estate (2) was more than once referred to. That decision contains sentences which, detached from their context, were prayed in aid to reinforce the case for the respondents. But the point at issue in that case was different, viz., whether the "business tax" there involved was a direct tax, and was, moreover, so complicated by provisions for treating the owner of property let to the Crown as notionally the occupier, that their Lordships prefer not to rest their conclusions on it. It is unnecessary to say more than that the case does nothing to impair or qualify those conclusions.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs.

By the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board's regulations all cargo discharged from a vessel in the port of Liverpool was to be received by a licensed master porter who was responsible for its delivery to the consignee. On Thursday, Nov. 20, 1947, a vessel berthed in the port with a cargo which included a large quantity of bagged chestnuts, some of which were consigned to the plaintiffs and the remainder to W. and S., respectively, each of the consignees being produce merchants. The various consignments were of different quantities and distinguished by different marks, each consisted of a different number of bags, and the bags of the different consignments differed in weight. On Friday, Nov. 21, when the hatches were taken off, the master porter employed to receive the cargo found that during the voyage some of the bags in each consignment had burst and chestnuts from the different consignments had become intermixed, some of them being badly damaged. He showed the consignees the state of the chestnuts in the hold and asked them what they wished to be done. The plaintiffs wanted their insurers to inspect the damage before they gave their reply, but W. and S., who urgently required their consignments for the Christmas market, wished to take delivery of their respective shares, supplying their own labour and their own bags to re-bag their proportions of the loose chestnuts. The master porter did not weigh all the loose chestnuts when they came into his possession. The cargo was discharged on Friday and Saturday, and by noon on Saturday the respective consignees had taken delivery of all the sound bags. During Saturday afternoon and Sunday the workmen employed by W. and S. were given access to the mixed loose chestnuts and allowed to re-bag a quantity. On Monday the master porter weighed the re-packed bags and allowed W. and S. to take so many as would, together with the sound bags already delivered to them, make the total weight of chestnuts received by each of them amount, approximately, to four hundredweights less than the total bill of lading weight of the consignment to each. On the same day the plaintiffs decided to supply bags and have their share of the loose chestnuts re-bagged, and this was done on Tuesday. Finding that the total amount of chestnuts received by them fell short of their consignment weight by over four tons and included a quantity of badly damaged chestnuts, the plaintiffs claimed damages against the master porter for the loss suffered by them owing to his failure to deliver to them a proportionate share of the loose chestnuts.

HELD: (i) it was not unreasonable of the plaintiffs to require their insurers to survey the damage before giving instructions in regard to the disposal of the goods, nor was the delay from Friday to Monday unreasonable; and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not guilty of any breach of duty owed to the master porter such as would discharge him from the performance of any duty owed by him to the plaintiffs.

(ii) as the mixed loose chestnuts included some from each of the consignments, the consignees became tenants in common of the loose chestnuts.

Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (1868) (L.R. 3 C.P. 427), and dictum of LORD MOULTON in Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack & Branfoot S.S. Co., Ltd. ([1913] A.C. 695), applied.

(iii) the relationship between the consignees and the master porter did not arise in contract, as the master porter's services were imposed on the consignees by the statutes creating the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board and by the board's regulations, the consignees having no choice in the matter and no control over the master porter, and, therefore, the obligations of the master porter to the consignees, as tenants in common, were not the same as they would have been if the tenants in common had voluntarily joined in delivering the mixed loose chestnuts to him as bailee for all three, and he was not deprived of the right or duty to apportion; the master porter was under a legal duty to act fairly between the consignees, and, as the shipowner was compelled by the board's regulations to deliver the cargo to the master porter instead of to the consignees, the master porter was under an obligation to distribute the goods which came into his hands among the consignees in the same way as it would have been the shipowner's duty to do if he himself had made the delivery; in the circumstances it would have been the shipowner's duty to apportion the mixed loose chestnuts rateably between the consignees, and, therefore, it was the master porter's duty to do the same and he was in breach of his duty in failing to give the plaintiffs their fair share; although the evidence fell short of establishing a custom of the port of Liverpool, the obligation to apportion, which the law imposed on the master porter, appeared reasonable to those with knowledge of the trade; if the master porter adopted a reasonable formula for the apportionment, he would not be liable for breach of duty even if some other formula would have produced a fairer and more accurate result.

(iv) the Mersey Docks (Corporation Purchase) Act, 1861, s. 23 and s. 24, did not impose an absolute obligation on the master porter to weigh all goods which he received, but, if it was necessary for him to weigh all the loose chestnuts before they were delivered to the consignees so as to apportion them fairly, he should have done so, notwithstanding that, under the board's bye-laws, he was not entitled to make any extra charge for weighing.

(v) a fair method of apportionment would have been to divide the mixed loose chestnuts among the consignees in proportion to the differences between the total weight of the chestnuts, whether contained in sound or damaged bags, which could be recognised as forming part of each consignment, and the bill of lading weight of that consignment, and the master porter was liable in damages to the plaintiffs for the value of the amount by which the loose chestnuts which they received fell short of what they should have received on this apportionment.

ACTION for damages.

The plaintiff company, which carried on business as a produce merchant, was the consignee of a large consignment of bagged chestnuts shipped from Naples to Liverpool in m.v. Ravenspoint. Two other produce merchants were also consignees of bagged chestnuts in the same ship. The defendant company was the master porter employed under the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board's regulations to receive the cargo from the ship and be responsible for its delivery to the consignees. During the voyage many of the bags in each consignment had burst and chestnuts from the three consignments had become intermixed. The defendant company delivered the sound bags to their respective consignees and asked them what they wanted done with the mixed loose chestnuts. The plaintiff company wished to consult its insurers before deciding, while the other two consignees wished to take delivery of their proportions of the loose chestnuts as soon as possible. Without first weighing all the mixed loose chestnuts, the defendant company allowed each of the consignees other than the plaintiff company to re-bag and take delivery of so much as would, together with the sound bags already received by each, amount to four hundredweights less than the total consignment to each. The plaintiff company having decided to take delivery of its share of the loose chestnuts, what remained were re-bagged on its behalf, but the total amount of chestnuts which it received was more than four tons short of the weight of the consignment and the plaintiff company claimed damages from the defendant company, as the master porter, for the loss suffered. The plaintiff company contended, inter alia (a) that the master porter, as agent for each of the consignees and as bailee of the chestnuts for each of the consignees, was under a duty to divide the intermixed chestnuts between the three consignees in proportion to the bill of lading weights of each consignment; (b) that it was an implied term of the contract between each consignee and the master porter that the master porter should allocate the mixed loose chestnuts in due proportion; and (c) that a similar duty to apportion rested on the master porter by the custom of the port of Liverpool. The plaintiff company also relied on alleged breaches of the Mersey Docks (Corporation Purchase) Act, 1861, s. 23, and of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board's bye-laws relating to master porters.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11. GLYN-JONES, J., read the following judgment. On Thursday, Nov. 20, 1947, the motor vessel Ravenspoint berthed in the port of Liverpool with a mixed cargo including a quantity of chestnuts, some of which were consigned to the plaintiff company. The regulations of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board require that all cargo discharged from a vessel in the port shall be received by a licensed master porter who is responsible for the delivery thereof to the consignees. The defendant company carries on business as a stevedore, is licensed by the harbour board as a master porter, and was employed as a stevedore to unload the cargo from the Ravenspoint and as a master porter to receive the cargo notionally at the ship's rail. In its capacity as master porter the company employed a Mr. Roberts as clerk-in-charge or "counter-off", and among his duties was that of keeping certain records in a book called a "manifest book". This book was prepared before the unloading of the ship began by entering therein particulars, taken from the ship's manifest of bills of lading, of each consignment of goods comprised in the cargo, the entry being completed, as cargo was handled, by the addition of particulars of the quantities received and delivered to the respective consignees or bills of lading holders. The manifest book used by Mr. Roberts on the unloading of the Ravenspoint has been put in and it has been agreed between counsel that I may treat the entries in his book as prima facie evidence of the facts which these entries purport to record. I am, therefore, enabled to find, although I have not seen any of the relevant bills of lading, that according to the bills the chestnuts in the vessel were consigned as follows: (i) nine hundred bags, marked PUCA, of a total weight of twenty-six tons, eleven hundredweights, one quarter, and twenty-four pounds, to the plaintiff company, the average weight of each bag, assuming the bill of lading to be correct, being sixty-six pounds; (ii) eight hundred bags, marked CAMEL/W, of a total weight of nineteen tons, thirteen hundredweights, two quarters, and twenty pounds, to E. A. Woodall and Co.,

Ltd., the average weight of each bag, on the same assumption, being fifty-five pounds; (iii) (a) four hundred bags, marked CAMEL/JS, of a total weight of nine tons, sixteen hundredweights, three quarters, and ten pounds, to Mr. J. A. Sloan, the average weight of each bag being fifty-five pounds; (iii) (b) two hundred bags, marked DITTA COMM.GDI LORENZO CASANDRINO CASTAGNE A.A., of a total weight of nine tons, sixteen hundredweights, three quarters, and ten pounds, also to Mr. Sloan, the average weight of each bag in this case being 110 pounds. By these findings I do not purport to find as facts that the number of bags entered in the bills of lading was actually loaded or that each consignment, when loaded, was of the weight or marks entered, but only that the entries in the book are correctly extracted from the bills.

When the hatches were taken off the Ravenspoint on the morning of Friday, Nov. 21, it was seen that the chestnuts had suffered damage during the voyage. The bags had become damp and stained so that in some cases the marks were undecipherable or difficult to decipher and many of the bags, some from each consignment though not an equal proportion in each, had burst so that there was in the hold a quantity of loose chestnuts. Mr. Roberts called together the representatives of the consignees on the quay, showed them the state of the chestnuts, and asked them to say what they wished to have done, for it was obvious, not only that part of the consignments had become mixed, but also that by the time the chestnuts were unloaded there would be a loss since some of the chestnuts were already damaged and more would be damaged or lost by the bursting of bags in the course of unloading. The evidence before me was that the usual practice in the port of Liverpool when such an event occurs has been for each consignee to supply suitable bags to the master porter or pay for bags procured by him, and the master porter at the expense of the consignees then re-bags the "mixed loose", as it is called, and apports it rateably between the consignees. The word "rateably" requires further definition, but I defer to a later stage in this judgment mention of the difficulties which may arise in deciding on the proportions into which the "mixed loose" should be divided.

In the present case the plaintiff company was represented on the quay by Mr. Goodman of Arbuckle Smith and Co., Ltd., forwarding agents, and it was to him that Mr. Roberts showed the state of the chestnuts in the hold. Mr. Goodman reported the damage to Mr. Fuller, a director and the manager of the plaintiff company, and he in turn informed his insurers, whom he asked to send a surveyor as soon as possible, but the insurers told Mr. Fuller that the earliest time at which the surveyor could attend was the following Monday, Nov. 24. On Friday, Nov. 21, Mr. Roberts requested all three consignees to tell him whether or not they agreed to his having the "mixed loose" chestnuts re-bagged by his men and, if so, to supply or agree to pay for the necessary bags and labour. Mr. Goodman, on Mr. Fuller's instructions, said that he could not give any answer until after the surveyor had inspected the damage, as Mr. Fuller thought it imprudent to have his consignment handled until after the insurers had seen it. Meanwhile the representatives of the other two consignees, Woodall and Co., Ltd., and Sloan, who had either managed to get the chestnuts surveyed at once or had dispensed with inspection by a surveyor, were pressing Mr. Roberts to be allowed to take delivery of their respective shares of the chestnuts—and not unreasonably, for the chestnuts were urgently required for the Christmas market. Each of them declined to supply bags to the master porter or to pay the master porter's charges for re-bagging, and each decided to bring bags and employ its own or his own labour to re-bag its or his proportion of the loose chestnuts.

During Friday and Saturday the work of discharging the cargo from the hold went on. Any bags bearing decipherable marks and in apparently sound condition were stacked or piled on the quay according to marks, and the “mixed loose” was piled separately. It was said that an attempt was made to stack the sound or apparently sound bags belonging to each consignee in the form of a hollow square, or well, into which could be put loose chestnuts coming from bags which burst in the course of unloading but could be identified as belonging to a particular consignee. I do not think it was practicable to do that with any certainty. A good many bags burst while being handled and their contents or some of their contents became part of the “mixed loose”

A in one or more piles on the quay. By midday on Saturday the respective consignees had taken delivery of all the bags which seemed to them to be in sound condition. These bags were not weighed, but the manifest book attributes a total weight to the quantities so delivered on the assumption that each bag was of the average weight obtained by dividing the total weight of each consignment by the number of bags in each. On this footing the gross weights

B of the quantities of chestnuts contained in these apparently sound bags, duly delivered to the respective consignees, were as follows: to the plaintiff company thirty-five bags containing one ton, two quarters, nineteen pounds; to Woodalls 370 bags containing nine tons, two hundredweights, twenty-one pounds; to Sloans, from their first consignment, which I call (iii) (a), two hundred bags

C containing four tons, eighteen hundredweights, one quarter, nineteen pounds, and from their second consignment, viz. (iii) (b), 173 bags containing eight tons, ten hundredweights, one quarter, two pounds. This distribution having been made, the differences between the consignment weights and the weights actually delivered to each consignee were as follows: to the plaintiff company twenty-five tons, ten hundredweights, three quarters, five pounds; (ii) to Woodalls, ten

D tons, eleven hundredweights, one quarter, twenty-seven pounds; and (iii) to Sloan, on both his consignments, six tons, four hundredweights, three quarters, twenty-seven pounds.

During Saturday afternoon and Sunday workmen employed by Woodalls and by Sloan were given access to the remaining chestnuts, which consisted, in part, of bags recognisable as belonging to a particular consignment, but

E damaged, from many or, perhaps, most of which some of the contents had escaped, and, in part, of the “mixed loose” chestnuts. These men during those two days, on behalf of their respective employers, re-packed into fresh bags the contents of any damaged or unsound, but identifiable, bags and also quantities of the “mixed loose”. On Monday Woodalls and Sloan began to take delivery of re-packed bags of chestnuts and these bags were weighed by

F the master porter on the instructions of the shipowners’ agents, Messrs. MacAndrew and Co., who were, presumably, acting in expectation of claims for loss. Mr. Roberts, the counter-off, kept a note of these weights and added them to the assessed weights of the sound bags previously delivered, and when, on this reckoning, there had been delivered to Woodalls and Sloan chestnuts amounting to about four hundredweights less in each case than the total bill

G of lading weight of the consignment to each, he stopped each of them from re-bagging or taking delivery of any more. The delivery of re-bagged chestnuts to Sloan was completed on Monday, Nov. 24, and to Woodalls by Tuesday, Nov. 25.

Meantime, on the morning of Monday, Nov. 24, Mr. Fuller had gone to the quay with his insurers’ surveyor, who, after seeing the chestnuts, authorised him

H to have his share re-bagged and to take delivery of them. Thereupon Mr. Fuller told a representative of the defendant company that he would supply bags and that he wanted his chestnuts re-bagged. During Monday Mr. Fuller instructed Arbuckle Smith and Co., Ltd., to procure suitable bags and deliver them to the defendant company and this was done. On Tuesday the work of re-bagging the chestnuts for the plaintiff company began, but as it went on it became apparent that the difference between the total weight of chestnuts received by the plaintiff company and the consignment weight in the relevant bill of lading would be far greater than the difference between the weights of the chestnuts delivered to the other two consignees and their respective bill of lading consignment weights, and so it proved, for the total weight received by the plaintiff company fell short of the consignment weight by four tons, three hundredweights, four pounds. The chestnuts which the plaintiff company received included most of those which had been the worst damaged by sweat and contamination. In the circumstances Mr. Fuller felt, not unnaturally, that his company had not received its fair share of the chestnuts, and, accordingly, the company has brought this action claiming damages from the master porter. The amount claimed is comparatively small—some £290 odd—but the defendant company desired that the liability of a master porter in such circumstances should be defined by the court, as there had never before arisen in the port of Liverpool a case in which one of the consignees sought to place on the master porter the responsibility for making on his own initiative an apportionment of the “mixed loose”. The contentions of the parties are as follows. By para. 5 of the statement of claim the plaintiff company say, in effect, (a) that it was the duty of the master porter, arising from his relationship to each of the consignees as agent for each and as bailee of the chestnuts for and on behalf of each, to divide the intermixed chestnuts between the three consignees in proportion to the bill of lading weights of each consignment; (b) that it was an implied term of the contract between each consignee and the master porter that the master porter should allocate the “mixed loose” chestnuts in due proportion calculated as in (a); and (c) that by the custom of the port of Liverpool a like duty rested on the master porter to apportion the “mixed loose”. The same paragraph sets out what, it is said, would have been the correct proportions in which these chestnuts should have been distributed. Paragraph 6 adds causes of action based on breaches of statutory duty, and the duties relied on are said to be imposed by the Mersey Docks (Corporation Purchase) Act, 1861, s. 23, and by the bye-laws of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board relating to master porters. It was argued that s. 23 of the Act of 1861 imposes on the master porter a duty to weigh all cargo coming into his hands, and that, if the master porter had weighed the whole of the chestnuts and had also weighed the “mixed loose”, he would not have made the mistake of delivering to the two consignees other than the plaintiff company so much more than their fair share of the “mixed loose”. Counsel for the plaintiff company pointed to bye-law 2 (3) as the relevant bye-law. He contended that, for the cargo with which the master porter was dealing, it was necessary for him to perform the following operations set out in bye-law 2 (3) (a) and (b), viz., under sub-para. (a), sorting or selecting goods to bill of lading mark, examining for external damage and separating goods accordingly, weighing, watching, delivering and re-filling, all of which the master porter was bound to do without any charge; and, under sub-para. (b), cooping or mending when required by the consignee of goods and under his direction, for which operation the master porter might make an additional charge. As I understood the contention of counsel for the plaintiff company, it was this. The master porter could have called on the three consignees to direct him to deal properly with this cargo by re-bagging the chestnuts so that a fair delivery would be possible, and that would have given him the right to make a charge under bye-law 2 (3) (b). By para. 7 the statement of claim charges the master porter with conversion of so much of the goods as ought to have been delivered to the plaintiff company but was wrongly delivered to the other consignees. The defence, apart from the formal traverses, denies (a) that the master porter was under any duty to apportion the “mixed loose”, (b) that he was under any of the statutory duties alleged or was in breach of any of them, and (c) the alleged conversion. It goes on to assert that the plaintiff company received all the chestnuts to which it was entitled, that the share it received was a proportionate share, and that it received all the chestnuts which had been consigned to it. Finally, the defence alleges that, if the plaintiff company did not receive its proportionate share or had suffered any loss, the blame rests solely on the plaintiff company itself by reason of its failure on Friday, Nov. 21, or Saturday, Nov. 22, to give instructions for the chestnuts to be re-bagged.

A I think it will be convenient to deal at once with the last contention. Either the master porter owed a duty to the plaintiff company to see that it received a due proportion of the "mixed loose" chestnuts landed or he did not. If he did owe such a duty and has not performed it, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff company, by failing to give instructions until the morning of Nov. 24 as to what was to be done with its chestnuts, did not forfeit its rights to the performance by the master porter of his duty. It was not unreasonable of the plaintiff company to wait until the insurers had surveyed the damage before giving instructions as to the disposal of the goods. The delay from Friday until Monday was not unreasonable in the circumstances and I cannot find that the plaintiff company was guilty of any breach of duty owed to the master porter such as could or would discharge him from performance or further performance of the duty owed by him to the plaintiff company.

C The next question is: What was the master porter's duty? It is clear, I think, that the "mixed loose" must have included some chestnuts from each of the consignments. Counsel agreed that the consignees became tenants in common of that "mixed loose". I think that I may properly accept that pleading without myself discussing in this judgment the principle of commixtio or all the learning which is to be found in the arguments and judgments or speeches in such cases as Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (1), Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack & Branfoot S.S. Co., Ltd. (2) and other authorities. D The master porter, then, was in possession of an unidentifiable mass of "mixed loose" of which the three consignees were tenants in common. Counsel for the plaintiff company contended that in such circumstances the master porter was in the position of a trustee of the "mixed loose" for each of the consignees to the extent of the consignee's respective proportion thereof, and that he must equitably apportion the "mixed loose" between all the consignees, doing to the best of his power equal justice to each as would be done by a court of equity. Counsel for the plaintiff company made reference to the proof on which an average adjuster would distribute a loss between the various parties, and he referred me to HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 13, F title "Equity", at p. 84. The contention of counsel for the defendant company, on the other hand, was that the master porter was a bailee and that the bailee of goods for tenants in common has in law neither the right nor the duty to apportion the goods between the tenants in common, and that, should one of the tenants in common demand of the bailee the delivery up of the whole of the goods, the bailee is compelled in law to deliver them up, leaving the other tenants in common to pursue whatever remedy they may have against him who G has taken the whole of the goods. This principle, said counsel, applies by operation of law as soon as a bailment is established, and any party seeking to impose by implication of law any additional obligation on the bailee must fail unless he proves that the implication is necessary to give business efficacy to the bailment.

H I am not sure that there is any such universal rule as that for which counsel for the defendant company contends. In my view, the obligations of a bailee depend on all the circumstances of the bailment, and, while it may be true in many or even most cases of a bailment by tenants in common that any one of the joint bailors may demand delivery up to himself alone of the whole of the goods bailed, it is not necessarily true in all cases where a bailee is found in possession of goods belonging to tenants in common. The contention of counsel for the defendant company is, I think, that the obligations of the master porter are the same as they would have been if the three tenants in common had voluntarily joined in delivering the "mixed loose" to the master porter as bailee for all three. There is a form of contract of bailment between the three of them jointly, on the one hand, and the master porter, on the other. Assuming counsel to be right in saying that thereupon, in the absence of an express term in the contract to the contrary, any of the joint bailors could lawfully have required the bailee to deliver up the whole of the goods to himself, it does not follow, in my opinion, that the same rule applies where the bailment—if, indeed, this can accurately be called a bailment—does not arise from the contracts at all, but is imposed on the parties by operation of law, and I do not think that the relation between the master porter and the plaintiffs in this case does arise from the contract. In the port of Liverpool the consignee has no choice whether or not a master porter is to be employed, nor, usually, any right to choose which master porter shall be employed, nor can he exercise any control over the master porter's duties or charges which are prescribed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board's regulations. It is, theoretically, conceivable that a consignee might arrive at the docks expecting to take delivery of goods from the shipowner at the ship's rail only to find his goods in the hands of a master porter of whom he had never heard. There can be no contract without agreement, express or implied, and I see no ground for basing the relations between master porter and consignee on any agreement between them. The master porter's services are imposed on the consignee by the statutes creating the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board and by the board's regulations. On this footing counsel for the defendant company next contends that, since the language of the relevant statutes or bye-laws does not provide expressly that the master porter's duty includes the apportioning of the "mixed loose", it is impossible to imply words in the statutes creating such an obligation. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff company says that the fact that the relationship between the master porter and the consignee is created by statute does not prevent the court from implying into that relationship an obligation on the master porter to deal fairly between the consignees whose goods have come into his hands. It seems to me that, if the statute compels the shipowner to deliver the cargo to the master porter rather than to the consignee direct, then in respect of the goods which actually come into his hands the master porter ought to be under an obligation to distribute them among the consignees in the same way as it would have been the shipowner's duty to do if he himself had made the delivery. In this case, on the authorities, I think that it would have been the shipowner's duty to apportion the "mixed loose" rateably between the consignees, or, at any rate, between those consignees who had elected to treat themselves as tenants in common, and for them to receive their rateable proportion, whatever it was, of the "mixed loose".

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the law does impose on the master porter a duty to act fairly between all the consignees whose goods come into his hands, and, in particular, that it was in this case the master porter's duty to apportion the "mixed loose" chestnuts between the three consignees. I think the duty may be said to be a statutory duty or to arise quasi ex contractu so as to be comparable in a sense to the duty to pay over money had and received to the use of another. If the master porter is not under such a duty, it appears to follow that the first consignee to reach the quayside could, presumably, have collected the whole of the "mixed loose", even though the quantity exceeded his total consignment, and, if all three arrived simultaneously, it would, presumably, be the duty of the master porter to keep the ring while the three consignees scrambled for the chestnuts on the quay like Westminster boys for the pancake on Shrove Tuesday. I observe in passing that practically every witness, including those called by counsel for the defendant company to prove the contrary, and, in particular, Mr. Roberts himself, conceded that

A he thought it was the duty of the master porter to apportion. In my opinion, all this evidence falls short of establishing a custom of the port, but it does show that the obligation to apportion, which, I think, the law imposes on the master porter, appears reasonable to those with knowledge of the trade. Mr. Roberts says that, if the consignees had agreed to pay the cost of re-bagging, he would have taken it on himself to apportion. The difficulty in this case has arisen because the three consignees failed for once to agree that the master porter should re-bag the loose chestnuts. This created an unusual situation in which Mr. Roberts did his best to apportion the chestnuts by stopping Woodalls' and Sloan's workmen when he thought that they had had enough, although he thinks, now that he knows the facts, that they had too much. In difficult circumstances I do not blame Mr. Roberts for having misjudged the weight of scattered piles of loose chestnuts, but I think the duty on the master porter is to make a fair apportionment—fair in the sense hereinafter defined—and, if the apportionment is, in fact, unfair, the master porter must, I think, take the responsibility.

B

C That leads me to the question what would be a fair apportionment. Counsel for the defendant company contended that the master porter was not, and could not be, possessed of sufficient information to enable him to say what would be a fair apportionment. He pointed out that the whole or most of the loss might have arisen because the weight of chestnuts originally loaded fell below the consignment weights and that, if so, it may have been the plaintiff company's consignment alone which was of short weight, or that, since the bags in the plaintiff company's consignment were the most damaged, the greater loss had rightly fallen on the plaintiff company, and that, on the evidence, the plaintiff company had not discharged the burden of proving that it had not received its fair share. These and similar difficulties are not new. They are referred to in SCRUTTON ON CHARTERPARTIES, 15th ed., p. 331. LORD MOULTON, in his speech in Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack & Branfoot S.S. Co., Ltd. (2), said ([1913] A.C. 694):

D

E " . . . I do not think it a matter of difficulty to define the legal consequences of the goods of 'A.' becoming indistinguishably and inseparably mixed with the goods of 'B.' If the mixing has arisen from the fault of 'B.', 'A.' can claim the goods. He is guilty of no wrongful act, and therefore the possession by him of his own goods cannot be interfered with, and if by the wrongful act of 'B.' that possession necessarily implies the possession of the intruding goods of 'B.' he is entitled to it (2 KENT'S COMMENTARIES, 10th ed., 465). But if the mixing has taken place by accident or other cause, for which neither of the owners is responsible, a different state of things arises. Neither owner has done anything to forfeit his right to the possession of his own property, and if neither party is willing to abandon that right the only equitable solution of the difficulty, and the one accepted by the law, is that 'A.' and 'B.' become owners in common of the mixed property. Farther than this I do not think that it is safe to go. That the whole matter is far from being within the domain of settled law is shown by the divergence of opinions as to the relative shares of the participating parties in the case of an accidental commixtio. BLACKBURN, J., in Buckley v. Gross (3) (following KENT'S COMMENTARIES) considers that they would be tenants in common in equal shares. In Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (1) they were judged to possess the mixed mass in proportion to the probable amounts of their contributions to it. The fact is that the conclusions of the courts in such cases, though influenced by certain fundamental principles, have been little more than instances of cutting the Gordian knot—reasonable adjustments of the rights of parties in cases where complete justice was impracticable of attainment. I doubt whether even the fundamental principles enunciated above would be strictly adhered to in extreme cases where they would lead to substantial injustice."

F

G

I think it follows that a formula must be devised which, so far as possible, takes into account the circumstances of the particular case. I am far from saying that in every case or in this case there is only one formula which is fair. The assessment can be made only within fairly wide limits, and, in my opinion, the master porter does not finally determine the rights of the parties, for, presumably, it would still be open to a consignee who could prove that he had not received the goods consigned to him to bring an action in an appropriate case against the other consignee or consignees, or, it may be, against the shipowner, or, possibly, against the consignor, but, if the master porter had adopted a reasonable formula, I do not think any court would hold him guilty of a breach of duty even though it was of opinion that some other formula would have produced a more fair or more accurate result. In devising that formula certain assumptions have to be made, as is pointed out in the passage which I have already cited from SCRUTTON ON CHARTERPARTIES. In this case Mr. Roberts assumed that the bill of lading weights of the consignments of Woodalls and Sloan were correct, or, at least, that those weights should be the basis on which he would decide, as he did, what weight of chestnuts each of them should be allowed to take away. I do not think that it now lies in the master porter's mouth to say, as counsel for the defendant company said, that the same assumption should not be made in assessing the plaintiff company's share. Counsel says that, at the time when Woodalls and Sloan demanded to be allowed to take delivery of their goods, the master porter had not sufficient data to enable him to make any better apportionment than he did, and he would have rendered himself liable to actions for damages for loss of future markets if he had refused to give delivery to Woodalls and to Sloan. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff company says that the only information which the master porter needed was the total weight of the chestnuts and the weight of the "mixed loose", and that it was not only his right but his duty to weigh them, and, if he did not know the weights, it was his own fault. Counsel referred me to the Mersey Docks (Corporation Purchase) Act, 1861, s. 23 and s. 24. In my opinion, these sections do not impose an absolute obligation on the master porter to weigh all goods which he receives, but they do impose on him a duty, which he owes as well to the consignee as to the board, to weigh correctly and, having weighed accurately, to record the weights of all such cargoes as in the circumstances of any given case he may have been required to weigh. Bye-law 2 (3) (a) of the board's bye-laws relating to master porters makes it clear that, if weighing is necessary, he must weigh without any extra charge. This view is confirmed by the entry in the scale of charges in a booklet put before me which shows that the charges authorised to be made by the master porter for the landing of chestnuts in bags include the cost of weighing each bag separately. I do not think that the master porter was under a duty to supply bags if the consignee refused to pay for them, but he could have weighed the chestnuts in the hampers in which they were unloaded or in other containers and tared the containers. I am of the opinion that, if it was necessary for him to do so to apportion the chestnuts fairly, then he should have done so. If, as counsel for the defendant company contended, the master porter was under no obligation to weigh unless expressly required by one of the parties to do so, he need not have weighed the quantities actually delivered, although, in fact, he did so, apparently on the instructions of the shipowner. But if the master porter had not weighed the chestnuts which he actually delivered, he would have deprived every consignee, so far as I can see, of any information concerning the total weights for chestnuts unloaded or the quantities delivered to the other consignees, and thus deprived each consignee of the opportunity to find out whether or not he had received his fair share of chestnuts. Counsel for the defendant company further said that to weigh the "mixed loose" would have been costly, so as to make the transaction unprofitable for the master porter. I dare say it would, but master porters, like almost everyone else exercising any profession or trade, must take the rough with the smooth and must not expect to be guaranteed a profit on every transaction. If a master porter finds the business unprofitable, he should give it up or else persuade the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to increase his charges.

A I have next to select a method of apportionment which I think fair. As between these three consignees no injustice is done, in my opinion, by assuming for this purpose that the consignment weights were correct, but I reject the contention of counsel for the plaintiff company that, having found the weight of the "mixed loose", the master porter should have apportioned it in proportion to the consignment weights, because it does not follow that each consignment contributed in equal or near equal proportion to the loss. For example, Sloan
B received no fewer than 173 sound bags out of two hundred in his second consignment, and it is clear that the contribution of this consignment to the loss was proportionately less than that of the others. What should have been done, I think, was to divide the "mixed loose" in proportion to the differences between the total weight of the chestnuts—whether contained in sound or in damaged bags—
C which could be recognised as forming part of each consignment and the bill of lading weight of that consignment. I am satisfied that, if this had been done, the plaintiff company would have received a greater share, and it follows that, in my opinion, the master porter, in breach of his duty, failed to give the plaintiff company its fair share.

I must next seek to assess the damage suffered in consequence by the plaintiff company. I cannot now re-apportion the "mixed loose" because I do not know
D how much of the re-bagged chestnuts delivered to each consignee came from damaged but identifiable bags and how much from the "mixed loose", but I think that the plaintiff company's loss can be assessed with substantial accuracy by re-apportioning on the same principle the whole amount of the chestnuts which were re-bagged. [His LORDSHIP found that there were enough re-bagged chestnuts to make up, approximately, nine-tenths of the shortages of each con-
E signment, and assessed the value of the chestnuts which should have been, but were not, delivered to the plaintiff company at £175. He continued:] The conclusion at which I have arrived renders it unnecessary to discuss the question whether or not there was a conversion by the defendant company of any specific goods which could have been shown to be the property of the plaintiff company and I do not think I need express any opinion on that issue.

CITY OF WINNIPEG v. CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Simon, Lord Oaksey, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), May 13, 14, 18, 19, July 14, 1953.]

Privy Council—Canada—Manitoba—Business tax—Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Deed of covenant giving exemption from taxation—Validity.

On or about Oct. 21, 1880, a syndicate entered into a contract with the then Minister of Railways and Canals in Canada for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the incorporation of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the respondent company. This contract was approved and ratified by an Act of the Parliament of Canada (44 Vict. c. 1), and pursuant to this Act, letters patent incorporating the company were sealed on Feb. 16, 1881, cl. 4 of which charter provided: "All the franchises and powers necessary or useful to the company to enable them to carry out, perform, enforce, use, and avail themselves of, every condition, stipulation, obligation, duty, right, remedy, privilege, and advantage agreed upon, contained or described in the said contract, are hereby conferred upon the company . . ." The appellant, the city of Winnipeg, was anxious to secure that the principal workshops and stockyards of the respondent company for the province of Manitoba should be situated in the city of Winnipeg, and, for this purpose, entered into an agreement with the respondent company, which was evidenced by bye-law No. 148 of the appellant, passed on Sept. 5, 1881. This bye-law provided, inter alia, that the respondent company should execute a bond and covenant that they would "establish and build within the limits of the city of Winnipeg, their principal workshops for the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway within the province of Manitoba, and the branches thereof radiating from Winnipeg . . . and for ever continue the same within the said city of Winnipeg", and that, on the fulfilment of these conditions, all the property owned by the company within the limits of the city of Winnipeg for railway purposes, or in connection therewith, should be for ever free and exempt from all municipal taxes, rates and levies, and assessments of every nature and kind. On Oct. 10, 1881, the respondent company executed a bond and covenant in fulfilment of the bye-law, and the workshops and stockyards were duly erected.

On Feb. 23, 1948, the appellant purported to repeal bye-law No. 148, and notified the respondent company that the lands and buildings owned by the respondent company in the city of Winnipeg for railway purposes, or in connection therewith, had been assessed for realty tax and business tax. The respondent company claimed that all its property in the city of Winnipeg was for ever exempt from all municipal taxes, rates and levies and assessments of every nature and kind, and, in particular, from any real property tax or business tax.

HELD: (i) clause 4 of the charter of Feb. 16, 1881, appeared to be couched in the widest possible terms, and empowered the respondent company to enter into the deed of covenant of Oct. 10, 1881, which did not infringe the principle that a company cannot contract not to use or carry out its chartered powers; the arrangement pursuant to which the deed of covenant was executed was incidental to those things which the legislature had authorised and ought not to be held by judicial construction to be ultra vires and, therefore, the exemption conferred on the respondent company by bye-law No. 148 was binding on the appellant.

Dicta of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in A.-G. v. Great Eastern Ry. Co. (1880) (5 App. Cas. 478), applied.

(ii) on the facts, there was no material distinction between the exemption from taxation granted by bye-law No. 148 and the exemption from taxation in A.-G. for Saskatchewan v. Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. (ante, p. 970), whereby the exemption granted by cl. 16 of the contract recited in its charter of incorporation relieved the respondent company of liability from the business tax referred to in the Saskatchewan City Act, 1947, and, therefore, the exemption from taxation granted by bye-law No. 148 granted relief from business tax.

July 14. LORD COHEN delivered the following judgment of the Board.
 By notices given respectively in the months of March and June, 1948, the E appellant notified the respondent company that the appellant had assessed the lands and buildings owned by the respondent company in the city of Winnipeg for railway purposes, or in connection therewith, for realty tax and business tax respectively. Immediately after the service of the first of such notices the respondent company commenced proceedings against the appellant, and after receipt of the second notice amended its statement of claim. By the amended
 F document the respondent company claimed that all its property then owned or thereafter to be owned by it in the city of Winnipeg was for ever exempt from all municipal taxes, rates and levies and assessments of every nature and kind, and, in particular, from any real property tax or business tax in respect of such property. It based its claim on an alleged agreement, the terms of which were set out in City of Winnipeg Bye-law No. 148, dated Sept. 5, 1881, as amended
 G by City of Winnipeg Bye-law No. 195, dated Oct. 30, 1882. A number of issues were raised in the action and were decided in favour of the respondent company by the trial judge, WILLIAMS, C.J., on Oct. 7, 1949. The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal for Manitoba, and on Apr. 17, 1950, that court varied the judgment of the trial judge by holding, among other things, that the respondent company was liable for business tax. Both parties then gave notice
 H of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the respondent company seeking a restoration of the judgment of the trial judge, and the appellant seeking a reversal of that part of the order of the trial judge which had been affirmed by the Court of Appeal. On Oct. 22, 1951, the Supreme Court restored the order of the trial judge. The appellant then applied to this Board for leave to appeal and on July 18, 1952, leave was granted, but the appeal was limited to two questions: (1) Whether a deed of covenant dated Oct. 10, 1881, and executed by the respondent company in pursuance of the agreement mentioned in bye-law 148 was ultra vires the respondent company with the result that the exemption from taxation conferred on the respondent company by bye-law 148 never became effective; and (2) whether, if perpetual exemption from taxation is conferred by the said bye-law, such exemption does or does not extend to the business tax.

To determine these issues it is necessary to have in mind the circumstances in which the respondent company was incorporated and to refer briefly to certain incidents in its history. On or about Oct. 21, 1880, a syndicate entered into a contract with the then Minister of Railways and Canals in Canada for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the incorporation of a company to be called the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The said agreement provided among other things: (1) (by cl. 7) that the said company should for ever maintain, work and run the Canadian Pacific Railway; (2) (by cl. 21) that the said company should be incorporated with sufficient powers to enable them to carry out the contract and that the contract should only be binding in the event of an Act of incorporation being granted to the said company in the form thereto appended as sched. A; (3) (by cl. 22) that the Railway Act of 1879, in so far as the same might be applicable to the undertaking referred to in the contract, and in so far as not inconsistent therewith or inconsistent with, or contrary to, the provisions of the Act of incorporation to be granted to the said company, should apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway. No statute was passed incorporating the company, but the Parliament of Canada passed an Act, 44 Vict. c. 1, approving and ratifying the above-mentioned contract. Section 2 of this Act provided as follows:

“For the purpose of incorporating the persons mentioned in the said contract, and those who shall be associated with them in the undertaking, and of granting to them the powers necessary to enable them to carry out the said contract according to the terms thereof, the governor may grant to them in conformity with the said contract, under the corporate name of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a charter conferring upon them the franchises, privileges and powers embodied in the schedule to the said contract and to this Act appended, and such charter, being published in the CANADA GAZETTE, with any Order or Orders in Council relating to it, shall have force and effect as if it were an Act of the Parliament of Canada, and shall be held to be an Act of incorporation within the meaning of the said contract.”

Pursuant to this Act, letters patent incorporating the respondent company were sealed on Feb. 16, 1881. Clause 4 of this charter was in the following terms:

“All the franchises and powers necessary or useful to the company to enable them to carry out, perform, enforce, use, and avail themselves of, every condition, stipulation, obligation, duty, right, remedy, privilege, and advantage agreed upon, contained or described in the said contract, are hereby conferred upon the company. And the enactment of the special provisions hereinafter contained shall not be held to impair or derogate from the generality of the franchises and powers so hereby conferred upon them.”

It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the special provisions therein referred to, but it should be mentioned that they contain a provision in the terms mutatis mutandis of cl. 22 of the agreement, thus making applicable the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879. The appellant was anxious to secure that the principal workshops and stockyards of the respondent company for the province of Manitoba should be situated in the city of Winnipeg and entered into an agreement with the respondent company to this end. The agreement is evidenced by bye-law No. 148 of the appellant which was passed on Sept. 5, 1881. The bye-law recited, among other things, that it was desirable that the principal workshops and stockyards should be situated as aforesaid and that, in consideration of the premises, it was expedient for the appellant to lend its aid to the respondent company by granting the respondent company by way of bonus debentures of the city as therein mentioned and by exempting the property then owned or thereafter to be owned by the respondent company for railway purposes within the city from taxation for ever. The operative part of the bye-law authorised the issue of the debentures to the respondent company when the respondent company should have performed certain conditions, two of which were in the following terms:

"3. The said Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall, immediately after the ratification of this bye-law as aforesaid, make, execute and deliver to the mayor and council of the city of Winnipeg a bond and covenant under their corporate seal, that the said company shall with all convenient and reasonable dispatch establish and build within the limits of the city of Winnipeg their principal workshops for the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway within the province of Manitoba, and the branches thereof radiating from Winnipeg within the limits of the said province, and for ever continue the same within the said city of Winnipeg. 4. And by such bond and covenant the said company shall bind themselves as soon as they conveniently can to procure and erect within the city of Winnipeg, large and commodious stock or cattle yards, suitable and appropriate for the central business of their main line of railway and the several branches thereof."

The bye-law went on to provide, in cl. 8, that, on the fulfilment by the respondent company of the conditions aforesaid, all property then owned or thereafter to be owned by the respondent company within the limits of the city of Winnipeg for railway purposes, or in connection therewith, should be for ever free and exempt from all municipal taxes, rates and levies, and assessments of every nature and kind.

On Oct. 10, 1881, the respondent executed a bond and covenant which, if intra vires, is admitted to be a fulfilment of the conditions of the bye-law. On Oct. 30, 1882, the appellant passed bye-law No. 195 amending bye-law No. 148, but the alterations thus effected are not material to the issues now before the Board. Doubts appear to have arisen as to whether bye-laws 148 and 195 were intra vires the appellant, and, therefore, in 1883, on the petition of the appellant, an Act of the legislature of Manitoba was enacted expressly declaring these bye-laws valid. Their Lordships pause here to observe that this Act merely precludes any suggestion that the bye-laws in question were invalid and does not affect the construction of the agreement referred to therein: cf. Ontario Power Co. of Niagara Falls v. Stamford Corpn. (1) ([1916] 1 A.C. 534). The workshops and stockyards were erected and it was not suggested before this Board that they had not been duly erected and maintained in accordance with the provisions of the deed of covenant.

From 1881 until 1900, when the Railway Taxation Act of Manitoba came into force (Statutes of Manitoba, 63 & 64 Vict. c. 57), the appellant, were it not for the exemption provision contained in the said bye-law, would have been free to tax the respondent company's property in the city of Winnipeg owned for railway purposes or in connection therewith. The appellant did not, during that period, demand any taxes in respect of such property, except that it made an unsuccessful attempt in 1894 to collect school taxes. In each of the years 1890 to 1894, both inclusive, the appellant purported to assess certain lands of the respondent company for school taxes. In 1894 the appellant commenced action in the Court of Queen's Bench for Manitoba to recover the amount of such taxes. The litigation went to the Supreme Court of Canada which held that the Act of 1883 validating bye-law 148 made valid the exemption clause, and that the school taxes in question came within the exemption (Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. City of Winnipeg (2)). A petition of the city for leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee was refused (King's Order, July 24, 1901).

By the Railway Taxation Act mentioned above a provincial tax was imposed on the gross earnings of railway companies operating any line within the province. The railroad companies paying such taxes were to be exempt from all municipal taxation within the province. This exemption was suspended in 1947. On Feb. 23, 1948, the appellant purported to repeal bye-laws 148 and 195, and in March and June issued the notices to which their Lordships have already referred.

With this short statement of the history of the matter in mind their Lordships turn to the issues now before the Board. The respondent company alleges that it was within its power to enter into the deed of covenant dated Oct. 10, 1881, either (a) because, being incorporated by royal charter, it had, to use the language of the trial judge, "all the powers possessed by a corporation at common law", or (b) because it had power to execute the said deed of covenant under the very wide powers conferred by cl. 4 of its charter of incorporation.

The appellant argued that the respondent company had not the powers of a corporation at common law, since the power of the governor-in-council to constitute a railway company by letters patent under the great seal had been abrogated by s. 3 of the Canada Joint Stock Companies Act, 1877, and the respondent company, therefore, owed its incorporation to the express power conferred on the governor by the Canadian Statute, 44 Vict. c. 1.

The trial judge rejected this argument, and in the Court of Appeal, MCPHERSON, C.J., COYNE, J., and ADAMSON, J., agreed with him, but RICHARDS, J., and DYSART, J., took the opposite view. In the Supreme Court, ESTEY, J. (with whom CARTWRIGHT, J., concurred) agreed with the trial judge, but KELLOCK, J., took the opposite view. LOCKE, J., and KERWIN, J. (with whom RINFRET, C.J., TASCHEREAU, J., and FAUTEUX, J., concurred) did not find it necessary to determine the point since they were satisfied that the enumerated powers to be found in the charter were sufficient to authorise the respondent company to enter into the deed of covenant. There is thus a considerable divergence of opinion in the courts of Canada on the first ground on which the respondent company sought to justify its entry into the deed of covenant. Their Lordships do not find it necessary to resolve this divergence since they are satisfied that the trial judge, the majority in the Court of Appeal for Manitoba, and the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada were right in holding that the enumerated powers in the charter of incorporation justified the respondent company in entering into the deed of covenant dated Oct. 10, 1881. The correctness of this finding depends on the proper construction of the charter and, in particular, of cl. 4 thereof, which confers on the respondent company:

"All the franchises and powers necessary or useful to the company to enable them to carry out, perform, enforce, use, and avail themselves of, every condition, stipulation, obligation, duty, right, remedy, privilege, and advantage agreed upon, contained or described in the said contract."

This clause appears to be couched in the widest possible terms and counsel for the appellant does not dispute that it would have justified the respondent company in erecting main workshops and stockyards in Manitoba and in entering into agreements with that end in view. Nor could he dispute that it was in the interest of the respondent company to secure, if it could, the immunity from taxation granted by cl. 8 of bye-law 148; but he pointed out that under the agreement recited in its charter of incorporation the respondent company had contracted "for ever efficiently to maintain and use the Canadian Pacific Railway". He argued that it could not be certain in 1881 that at some future period it might not be necessary, or at any rate advisable, to move the main workshops in Manitoba to some other place than the city of Winnipeg. Therefore, said counsel, it must be ultra vires the respondent company to enter into an agreement for ever to maintain its main workshops within the city of Winnipeg. He based this argument mainly on the line of authorities which establishes that a company cannot contract not to use or carry out its chartered powers: see Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald (3); Montreal Park & Island Ry. Co. v. Chateauguay & Northern Ry. Co. (4) per DAVIES, J. (35 S.C.R. 57).

 A Their Lordships are unable to see that the deed of covenant of Oct. 10, 1881, infringes this principle. They agree with LOCKE, J., when he says ([1952] 1 S.C.R. 485):

“Thus, there was conferred upon the company by s. 4 of the letters patent all the powers necessary or useful to enable it to discharge its obligations under the contract. It was, in my opinion, for the railway company to determine the location of its principal workshops for the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway within Manitoba and the branches radiating from Winnipeg and that these workshops should be continued in such location as it should determine and to conclude as favourable a bargain as could be negotiated with the city or municipality where these were to be located. By the fall of 1881 the directors of the company had evidently reached the conclusion that Winnipeg, by virtue of its location, was to be the principal city in the province of Manitoba and, thus, the most suitable place from which branch lines such as the line running south to Morris and westerly through the Pembina Mountains areas, should have their eastern terminus. The company was not asked by the city in exchange for the promised tax exemption and the grant of the debentures to maintain its only railway workshops for the main line in Manitoba in Winnipeg, but merely the principal workshops: others might be constructed elsewhere in the province.”

Their Lordships also agree with LOCKE, J., that the observations of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in A.-G. v. Great Eastern Ry. Co. (5) are in point. LORD
 E SELBORNE says (5 App. Cas. 478):

“I assume that your Lordships will not now recede from anything that was determined in the Ashbury Railway Carriage & Iron Co. v. Riche (6); it appears to me to be important that the doctrine of ultra vires, as it was explained in that case, should be maintained. But I agree with JAMES, L.J., that this doctrine ought to be reasonably, and not unreasonably,
 F understood and applied, and that whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the legislature has authorised, ought not (unless expressly prohibited) to be held, by judicial construction, to be ultra vires.”

In the present case their Lordships are satisfied that the arrangement pursuant to which the deed of covenant of Oct. 10, 1881, was executed was so incidental
 G and, indeed, was “useful” to the respondent company within the meaning of cl. 4 of their charter and was within their power.

Counsel for the appellant sought to narrow the effect of cl. 4 of the charter by a reference to the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, which, by cl. 17 of the charter, is made applicable to the undertaking of the respondent company so far as not inconsistent with, or contrary to, the provisions of the charter.

H Their Lordships are unable to find anything in the provisions of that Act to which their attention was directed justifying such a restriction. Moreover, cl. 4 contained an express provision that the powers thereby conferred were not to be impaired by any of the special provisions thereafter contained. Their Lordships cannot part with this branch of the case without referring to the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario in Whitby v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. (7), where a contract by a railway company, a predecessor in title in respect of part of the system of the defendant company, to erect and maintain for ever the chief workshops of the company at Whitby was held to be beyond the powers given to that railway company by its statute of incorporation. Their Lordships do not question the correctness of the actual decision that the contract in question did not bind the Grand Trunk Railway Company since, as pointed out by ARMOUR, C.J.O., there is great difficulty in holding that the agreement, if valid, was enforceable against the company, defendant to that action. Apart from that point, however, their Lordships agree with KERWIN, J., that the decision, if correct, can only be supported on the terms of the enactments conferring the particular powers then in question. A

The exemption from taxation granted to the respondent company by bye-law 148 is, therefore, binding on the city, but the question remains whether that exemption grants relief from business tax. The trial judge held that it did, but his decision on this point was reversed by the Court of Appeal for Manitoba. Before the matter came to the Supreme Court of Canada that court had delivered its judgment in Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. A.-G. for Saskatchewan (8), to the effect that the exemption granted by cl. 16 of the contract recited in its charter of incorporation relieved the respondent company of liability from the business tax referred to in the Saskatchewan City Act, 1947. That business tax differed from the business tax imposed by the city of Winnipeg in that the yard-stick by which the liability was measured was floor space in the case of the Saskatchewan tax, whereas in the case of the city of Winnipeg it was rental value. This difference is, however, immaterial since the Supreme Court decided that the exemption applied whether the yard-stick was floor space or rental value and the parties did not argue before this Board that in this respect the Supreme Court were in error. Counsel for the appellant who argued this part of the case did not address their Lordships at length since the hearing of this appeal followed immediately on the hearing of the appeal in the Saskatchewan case (8). He adopted the argument of counsel for the respondent in that case and pointed out that the terms of the exemption in bye-law 148 differed from that in cl. 16 of the agreement recited in the charter in that the bye-law exempted only property then owned or which might thereafter be owned by the respondent company, whereas cl. 16 exempted property required and used for the construction and working of the railway. He agreed, however, that there was no suggestion that any of the property in respect of which the respondent company was now seeking exemption from business tax was not owned by the respondent company. Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that the Supreme Court of Canada were right in thinking that, on the facts before them, there was no material distinction between the two exemptions. Their Lordships have already given their reasons for thinking that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Saskatchewan case (8) was correct (ante, p. 970) and they need not repeat them. B C D E F

Their Lordships would, however, observe that the wording of bye-law 148 is in one respect wider than the wording of cl. 16, in that it grants exemption not only from taxation but also from rates and levies and assessments of every nature and kind. There is, therefore, some support for the view expressed by MCPHERSON, C.J., in the Court of Appeal for Manitoba that an additional reason for holding that the exemption in bye-law 148 covered business tax was that the bye-law prohibited the city from making the assessment necessary before the amount of the tax could be ascertained. G

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellant must pay the respondent company's costs of the appeal. H
Appeal dismissed.

WARREN v. WARREN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Mr. Commissioner Grazebrook, Q.C.), July 27, 31, 1953.]

Divorce—Insanity—Detention as incurable patient for five years preceding presentation of petition—Special report and certificate—Words of declaration instead of certification—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 1 (1) (d)—Lunacy Act, 1890 (c. 5), s. 38 (4) (as substituted by Lunacy Act, 1891 (c. 65), s. 7)—Mental Treatment Rules, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1071), r. 2 (2) and schedule.

By the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 38 (4), as substituted by the Lunacy Act, 1891, s. 7, a reception order which expires at the end of one year after its date can be extended if a special report with a certificate is sent to the Board of Control. The Mental Treatment Rules, 1948, schedule, Form 20 (formerly the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, schedule, Form 27) set out the form of the special report and certificate, in which appear the words: "I [the medical officer of the institution] hereby certify that he [the patient] is still of unsound mind . . ."

By a reception order dated June 17, 1947, the husband was admitted into a mental hospital. A special report and certificate, dated May 24, 1948, was sent to the Board of Control, but the words: "I hereby declare" were used instead of the words: "I hereby certify". Two further reports and certificates, dated May 23, 1949, and May 21, 1951, were sent to the Board of Control, and in these the words: "I hereby certify" were used.

In 1952 the wife petitioned for dissolution of the marriage on the ground that the husband was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition within s. 1 (1) (d) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. The husband, by his guardian ad litem, contended that since the special report and certificate dated May 24, 1948, were not in the proper form, the reception order had expired, and, therefore, that he had not been continuously under care and treatment for five years.

HELD: the word "declare" was merely in substitution for, and could be regarded as equivalent to, the word "certify", and so the special report and certificate dated May 24, 1948, were in appropriate form, and the reception order had continued in operation; the husband had, therefore, been continuously under care and treatment for the requisite period, and a decree could be granted.

PETITION by the wife for dissolution of the marriage.

The parties were married on Sept. 28, 1930. On June 17, 1947, the husband was found wandering at large, and by virtue of a reception order of that date he was admitted into a mental hospital where he had remained ever since. To continue the operation of the reception order under the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 38 (4), as substituted by the Lunacy Act, 1891, s. 7, a special report and certificate was issued and dated May 24, 1948, in which the words: "I hereby declare that he is still of unsound mind" were used instead of the words: "I hereby certify, etc.", the words set out in the appropriate form in the schedule to the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930. Two subsequent special reports and certificates contained the words: "I hereby certify". The wife filed a petition for divorce, dated Nov. 26, 1952, on the ground that the husband was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The wife also prayed for the exercise of the court's discretion in her favour. The husband, by his guardian ad litem, in answer to the petition denied the wife's allegations on the ground that the special report and certificate dated May 24, 1948, was incorrectly made out so that the reception order dated June 17, 1947, had expired at the end of one year from that date.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31. MR. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK, Q.C., stated the facts and continued: The petition is brought under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1 (1) (d), and under s. 1 (2) of that Act it is stated:

"For the purposes of this section a person of unsound mind shall be deemed to be under care and treatment—(a) while he is detained in pursuance of any order or inquisition under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930 . . . and not otherwise."

By the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 38 (4), as substituted by the Lunacy Act, 1891, s. 7:

"A reception order shall remain in force for a year after the date by this Act or by an order of the Board of Control appointed for it to expire, and thereafter for two years and thereafter for three years, and after the end of such periods of one, two, and three years for successive periods of five years, if not more than one month nor less than seven days before the expiration of the period at the end of which, as fixed by this Act or by an order of the Board of Control under sub-s. (2), the order would expire, and of each subsequent period of one, two, three, and five years respectively a special report of the medical officer of the institution or of the medical attendant of the single patient as to the mental and bodily condition of the patient with a certificate under his hand certifying that the patient is still of unsound mind and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment is sent to the Board of Control."

By the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, r. 2 (2), the forms to be used were set out in the schedule. Form 27 was the appropriate form and indicated the matters that were to appear in the special report and certificate, the last clause of that form being in these terms:

"I hereby certify that he is still of unsound mind, and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment."

That has to be signed by the medical officer.

A In this case the special report and certificate, which is dated May 24, 1948, and signed by the medical officer, contains all the matters required and indicated in the schedule, but the final clause is as follows:

"I hereby declare that he is still of unsound mind, and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment."

B That is to say, the word "declare" appears in the printed form instead of the word "certify" which appears in the form in the schedule. In the next special report and certificate dated May 23, 1949, it is interesting to note that the word "declare" is struck out and the word "certify" is typed in and initialled by the medical officer signing that form; and in the next special report and certificate, dated May 21, 1951, there appear for the first time, so far as this case and as this institution are concerned, in the printed form, the words: "I hereby certify". From the printing at the foot of these forms it appears that the first two forms were printed in 1947 and that the last form was printed in 1949, so that those in the institution apparently had in mind at some time that the printed form which had been used at this institution was wrong in that "declare" appeared instead of "certify". It has been argued that "declare" does not mean the same as "certify" and that, therefore, the special report and certificate of May 24, 1948, not being in the proper form, the reception order came to an end at the expiration of the year; that the husband was not continuing to be kept in the institution under the original reception order; and that, therefore, the case brought by the wife must fail as the husband was not under care and treatment.

D In the cases to which I was referred there was not a vast amount of assistance on this particular matter, so far as I could find. In Re Shuttleworth (1), in so far as it can be said to have some bearing on this case, the headnote reads (9 Q.B. 651):

E "Under stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100 . . . sched. (C) [relating to the medical certificate then required] a medical certificate is sufficient which states, as grounds for the opinion that the party is insane, 'that she labours under delusions of various kinds;' and 'that she is dirty and indecent in the extreme.' A medical practitioner, signing the certificate, instead of the words 'from the following fact or facts,' inserted, 'from the conversation I have had this day with the said' lunatic. Held sufficient, without more."

F The court there held that, although the contents of the certificate were not in the form according to the schedule, they were sufficient. In R. v. Minster (Inhabitants) (2) it is stated in the headnote (14 Q.B. 349):

G "It is no valid objection to an order of maintenance made, under stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126, s. 62 . . . that the medical certificate, annexed to the order for removal to the asylum, varies from the form in sched. (E), No. 1 of stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126, in not stating the place of abode of the person signing it, or that he was a fellow or licentiate of the College of Physicians or a graduate in medicine, or a member of the College of Surgeons, or an apothecary authorised by the Apothecaries' Company."

H In that case the fact that the certificate was not in the form required was held to be no valid objection.

R. v. Pinder. Re Greenwood (3) again related to the form of the medical certificate, and it was decided that s. 4 of the statute 16 & 17 Vict., c. 96, which enacted that no person (not a pauper) was to be received as a lunatic into any licensed house or hospital without the medical certificate, according to the form in sched. (A) No. 2, of two persons, being physicians, surgeons, or apothecaries, was not merely directory, but compulsory. In that case it appeared on the return to a habeas corpus that the certificates under which the person had been received into a private asylum as a lunatic omitted to state the name of the street and number of the house where the examination took place, in accordance with the form in sched. (A) No. 2; and it further appeared by affidavit that the examination did in fact take place in a certain house in a certain street, and that the alleged lunatic was not dangerous either to the public or himself. In the circumstances it was held that the certificates were defective in a material particular, and the lunatic was ordered to be discharged from confinement. COLERIDGE, J., said (24 L.J.Q.B. 151):

"When from this enactment we turn to the schedules referred to, we find them full of minute particulars, manifestly framed with anxious carefulness, as if to secure some important object. It would seem dangerous to enter into a comparison of these, and to class some as material which must be observed, and some as immaterial which may be disregarded . . . It should be remembered, this is not a case of the sufficiency of an equivalent phrase; if it were, different considerations might arise; but here, that which the statute requires has been wholly omitted, and nothing substituted in its place. I come to the conclusion, then, upon principle, that the certificate is defective in a particular which I have no right to consider is immaterial."

I was also referred to Murray v. Murray (4). In that case a wife, incurably of unsound mind, was in 1935 discharged relieved, but not recovered, from a mental hospital under s. 25 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, for the purpose of her being detained at an institution technically a "workhouse" within the meaning of that Act, but the further statutory requirement under the same section that the medical superintendent of the latter institution should issue a certificate to a certain effect was not complied with. In 1939 the husband petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground that the wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been under care and treatment for at least five years continuously immediately preceding the presentation of the petition within the meaning of s. 2 (d) and s. 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, having been under detention continuously in the two institutions since 1923. It was held that the detention in the "workhouse" was not justified, owing to the lack of any certificate by the medical officer of that institution, and that the petition, therefore, failed. SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., stated ([1940] 4 All E.R. 253):

"Periodical certificates are required in order to keep a reception order in force under the Lunacy Act, 1891, s. 7, which substitutes a new sub-s. (4) for the original sub-s. (4) of s. 38 of the Act of 1890. That sub-section requires that at stated intervals, beginning with a year and running up to five years, there must be a special report of the medical officer of the institution as to the mental and bodily condition of the patient, with a certificate certifying that the patient is still of unsound mind and a proper person to be detained. Unless that report and those certificates are given, the reception order automatically expires. That is one of the safeguards which the legislature has laid down for the benefit and protection of persons detained under reception orders, and one would not expect to find that the Act would allow any case to exist where a person detained as an alleged lunatic could be detained indefinitely without the necessity of periodical reports and certificates. In the present case, the reports and certificates required by that sub-section were duly given, and the date of the expiration of the first five-yearly period would have been July 17, 1935—that is to say, about a month after the transfer to Leavesden."

Then he goes on to deal with the facts of that case.

In the present case I have to consider whether the use of the word "declare" instead of "certify" is sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Act. In arriving at a conclusion I derive assistance from Re Greenwood (3) where there was a total omission of the requirements in the medical certificate, and COLERIDGE, J., as I have already read from his judgment, stated (24 L.J.Q.B. 152):

"It should be remembered, this is not a case of the sufficiency of an equivalent phrase; if it were, different considerations might arise . . ."

In the present case I consider that the word "declare" is merely in substitution for, and can be regarded as equivalent to, the word "certify". In those circumstances, I hold that the special report and certificate of May 24, 1948, was in appropriate form and that, therefore, the wife has proved not only that the husband is incurably of unsound mind but that he has been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. (after the court had dismissed the appeal): I am not referring to the drafting of the Case here, but I do want the attention of practitioners and magistrates' clerks directed to the fact that the form of Case Stated is now prescribed by Form No. 119 of the Magistrates' Courts (Forms) Rules, 1952. I have been oppressed for a long time with the unnecessary recitals which are always put into Cases, by which we are told that some person is dissatisfied with the justices' decision and are referred to the provisions of statutes and so forth. Therefore, I have settled a form in which Cases should be stated, which has been accepted by the Rules Making Committee, and will be found to omit a great deal of the unnecessary recitals to which I have referred, consequently reducing the costs. I hope that practitioners and magistrates' clerks will remember that there is this form now prescribed, and will use it.

GORE-BOOTH v. GORE-BOOTH.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), June 22, 23, 1953.]

Divorce—Insanity—Guardian ad litem—“Person of unsound mind”—Need to apply for appointment of guardian—No appearance by person of unsound mind after service of petition—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 64 (9).

On Oct. 5, 1951, the husband was received into a mental hospital as a temporary patient. On Apr. 7, 1952, the wife filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty. The petition, accompanied by the memorandum of appearance in duplicate, the form of acknowledgment of service, and the notice of petition, was served on the husband personally in the mental hospital. The husband refused to complete the form of acknowledgment of service and entered no appearance. On May 6, 1952, the wife's solicitors wrote a letter to the medical superintendent in answer to which the latter replied on May 17, 1952: "I think it is most unfortunate that at this stage he should have the stress and strain of dealing with a legal matter . . . I should be most grateful if you could postpone taking any action in the matter for, say, six months, when I hope that [the husband] will be able to deal with the matter himself. Certainly as long as he is in hospital I think it would be inadvisable for him to deal with the matter . . ." On July 31, 1952, the petition was heard undefended, and a decree nisi made in favour of the wife. On an application by the husband for a re-hearing, HELD: rule 64 (9) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, which provided that "where a petition . . . has been served on . . . a person of unsound mind and no appearance has been entered . . . by or on behalf of the . . . person of unsound mind" the petitioner should apply for the appointment of a guardian ad litem, was mandatory, and, as there was sufficient information in the letter of the medical superintendent of May 17, 1952, to necessitate an application under r. 64 (9), the decree would be set aside.

Stanga v. Stanga (1953) (Feb. 18, not reported) (in which a Divisional Court of the Divorce Division held that r. 64 (9) was mandatory in the case of service on an infant), applied.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES RULES, 1950, r. 64, see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 10, p. 226.

Case referred to:

(1) Stanga v. Stanga (Feb. 18, 1953), Unreported.

MOTION for re-hearing of divorce suit.

The parties were married on Aug. 14, 1948, and there were two children of the marriage. On Oct. 5, 1951, the husband was received into St. Patrick's Hospital, Dublin, as a temporary patient under the Mental Treatment Act, 1945, a statute of the legislature of Eire. On Mar. 20, 1952, the husband was transferred to the convalescent branch of the hospital, namely, St. Edmondsbury, Lucan, Dublin. On Apr. 7, 1952, the wife filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty, relying for the purpose of jurisdiction on the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18 (1) (b). On Apr. 16 an agent of the wife's solicitors served on the husband personally at St. Edmondsbury the petition together with the memorandum of appearance in duplicate and the form of acknowledgment of service. On Apr. 22 the agent served on the husband personally the notice of petition. The husband refused to complete the form of acknowledgment of service. On May 6, 1952, the wife's solicitors wrote to the medical superintendent at St. Edmondsbury saying, inter alia:

"We are very loth to take steps for the action to be set down for trial in the undefended list until we have satisfied ourselves that [the husband] understands that his wife has taken proceedings for divorce, and that unless he forthwith takes some action in the matter the case will be heard by the court in his absence. Might we trouble you to let us know whether, bearing in mind his recent mental illness, you have any reason to suppose that he has not understood the nature and purport of the documents that were recently served on him."

A On May 17, 1952, the medical superintendent replied, inter alia:

"I think it is most unfortunate that at this stage he should have the stress and strain of dealing with a legal matter . . . I should be most grateful if you could postpone taking any action in the matter for, say, six months, when I hope that [the husband] will be able to deal with the matter himself. Certainly as long as he is in hospital I think it would be inadvisable for him to deal with the matter . . ."

B On June 21 the husband left the hospital. On July 31 the petition was heard undefended by Mr. Commissioner FLOWERS, Q.C., who granted a decree nisi in favour of the wife. On Aug. 17 the husband entered an appearance and filed a notice of motion (largely drafted by himself) applying for a re-hearing under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 36, on the grounds:

C " (i) Illness when the petition was supposed to be heard, and, therefore, of inability to file a defence; (ii) that the petition was not supposedly properly served; and (iii) that the matter be re-heard, application being made for restoration (sic) of conjugal rights."

D On Nov. 3 the motion came before the Divisional Court (LORD MERRIMAN, P., and DAVIES, J.), but the husband did not appear and the motion was adjourned in the hope that the Official Solicitor might be able to look after the husband's affairs. On Jan. 16, 1953, the medical superintendent wrote in answer to the Official Solicitor, inter alia:

E "During the period Apr. 16-22, 1952, I consider that [the husband] was a person of unsound mind in the sense that he was not capable of (i) making up his mind rationally whether or not he wished his marriage dissolved and (ii) of conducting his defence to his wife's petition unaided or properly instructing solicitors so to do."

The motion was now restored for hearing.

F Comyn for the Official Solicitor, as guardian ad litem for the husband.
Melford Stevenson, Q.C., and Victor Williams for the wife.

G LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the facts and continued: It is plain that the illness to which the husband refers in his notice of motion was mental illness, and when he speaks of the papers being "not supposedly properly served" he is referring to the fact that personal service was effected on him when he was in a branch of a mental hospital in Eire. It is that which he says constituted his inability to file a defence, and he has applied to be able to file an answer or cross-petition for restitution of conjugal rights. The substance of the matter is that he has not had an opportunity, in accordance with the proper procedure of this Division, to put his case before the court.

H The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, r. 64, which is headed "Infants and Persons of Unsound Mind", governs procedure in these matters. The relevant sub-rules read:

"(5) Where in any [matrimonial] cause any document is required to be served and the person on whom service is to be effected is of unsound mind, then, unless otherwise directed, that document shall, if the Official Solicitor has consented to act as guardian ad litem, be served on him and shall, in any other case, be served upon the person with whom the person of unsound mind resides or under whose care he is, and service so effected shall be deemed good service upon the person of unsound mind . . . (9) Where a petition or answer has been served on a person who is an infant or a person of unsound mind and no appearance has been entered in the cause by or on behalf of the infant or person of unsound mind . . . the party at whose instance the petition . . . was served shall, before proceeding further with the cause, apply for an order that some proper person be assigned guardian of the . . . person of unsound mind by whom he may appear and defend or intervene in the proceedings."

The cardinal issue, therefore, is whether at the material time the husband was, within the meaning of this rule, a person of unsound mind. If so, it is clear, and, indeed, there is no dispute about it, that the service effected was an improper and unauthorised service. I would like to say in passing that it is evident that the solicitors for the wife wished and intended the service to be effected in some way through the authorities of the place at which the husband was—(I am using the most non-committal phrases)—but that for some reason which has not been made apparent their instructions to the agent who was to effect service were not carried out. He effected service on the husband personally, and on a later occasion tried to get him to sign an acknowledgment of service, which he refused to do. It is not necessary, in my opinion, for us to consider whether, in the circumstances which afterwards happened, that by itself would be fatal to the service. Suffice it to say that it was admitted that it was a bad service if the husband could be properly described within the rule as a person of unsound mind. The second step is, if anything, more important, because whether or not he was served in the technical sense of the word, it is clear that at no material time has he entered an appearance. Therefore, if he was a person of unsound mind, it was the duty of those representing the wife, if the Official Solicitor or some other guardian had not already been appointed, to apply for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the express purpose of enabling him to appear and defend the proceedings. I say no more than that it has been held in this court, in the corresponding case of an infant, that sub-r. (9) is mandatory, and that non-compliance with it vitiates the whole proceedings: Stanga v. Stanga (1), a decision of a court consisting of DAVIES, J., and myself. In my judgment I gave the history of this rule and said it was drawn for the Rules Committee by LORD GREENE and LORD CLAUSON as being an exposition of the recognised Chancery practice in connection with persons under disability. So far as I know, it has remained unchanged ever since.

This petition was brought in the jurisdiction of this court under the authority of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18 (1) (b), on the ground that the wife is resident in England and has been ordinarily resident here for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings, and the husband is not domiciled in any other part of the United Kingdom or in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man. It is said, though I must not be taken to be stating that this is absolutely established, that he was domiciled in Eire, and manifestly the fact that the proceedings are thus complicated demands that no less than the ordinary care is necessary to ensure that the rules concerning service, and the appointment of a guardian, if the husband is under a disability, should be strictly observed.

It is common ground that the husband did not at any time material for the purposes of this application enter an appearance. An appearance was entered later, but not before the trial, and, it being common ground that no application for the appointment of a guardian ad litem was made, I come back to the question which is the cardinal question in this case—whether, for the purposes of r. 64 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, this man was a person of unsound mind. It is evident that, although the learned commissioner was informed that the petition was brought under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s.

18 (1) (b), and that when the petition was served the husband was in a mental home as a temporary patient, neither the rule, nor the Act of Parliament, nor the definition in the Act of Parliament was considered in detail. I think that the most convenient approach to the question whether the husband was under the disability in question is to take the series of questions which the Official Solicitor addressed to the medical superintendent. The first question elicited the date on which the husband entered St. Patrick's Hospital, Oct. 5, 1951. The second question elicited that the nature of his illness, which necessitated treatment there, was schizophrasia, and the third that he was a temporary patient under the Mental Treatment Act, 1945. To the question when the husband left St. Patrick's Hospital and in what circumstances—that is to say, whether he was then fully recovered or was still suffering from some form of mental illness, the answer was that he left St. Edmondsbury, Lucan, on June 21, 1952, and it is as well to incorporate with that the answer to the next question, that St. Edmondsbury, Lucan, is a convalescent part of St. Patrick's Hospital. The medical superintendent continues: "I had arranged his discharge care of his relatives. Actually he left before his relatives called for him, and went away without leaving an address. He was not fully recovered at this time, though, in my opinion, well enough to be discharged from hospital." We do not know whether or not there was at that time an effective extension of the original order, and, therefore, it would not be right to lay too much stress on the use of the word "discharge". Suffice it to say that it is consistent, but not exclusively consistent, with the discharge from detention of a man who is detained under an effective order. It is made clear, however, by the answer to question 6, that the husband had proceeded direct from the principal hospital to the St. Edmondsbury branch, and that when he went to St. Edmondsbury on Mar. 20 he was still under the care of the hospital medical and nursing staff. Finally, the medical superintendent was asked the following questions:

"During the period Apr. 16-22, 1952, do you consider that [the husband] was a person of unsound mind in the sense that he was or was not capable of (i) making up his mind rationally whether or not he wished his marriage dissolved and (ii) of conducting his defence to his wife's petition unaided or properly instructing solicitors so to do?"

To that the answer was:

"During the period Apr. 16-22, 1952, I consider that [the husband] was a person of unsound mind in the sense that he was not capable of (i) making up his mind rationally whether or not he wished his marriage dissolved and (ii) of conducting his defence to his wife's petition unaided or properly instructing solicitors so to do."

If that answer holds good, it is, in my opinion, clear that, although there is no definition for the purposes of r. 64, and, indeed, for many other purposes, of "unsound mind" or "being a person of unsound mind", the husband at the time of the purported service was a person of unsound mind within the meaning of the rule. But it is said that this answer does not hold good and that this court ought not to accept it, and the principal reason why that is submitted is that it is said to be inconsistent with an answer given by the medical superintendent to the wife's solicitors on May 17, 1952. On May 6, 1952, the wife's solicitors wrote to him, saying that they were acting for the wife, and continuing:

"You will appreciate that it was necessary for us to arrange for [the husband] to be served with a copy of the petition and other papers connected with the divorce, and with this object in view we instructed agents in Dublin. We advised our agents that [the husband] was a patient at your hospital, and had assumed that they would get in touch with you for guidance as to when service could be effected. We have now ascertained, however, that our agent interviewed [the husband] at St. Edmondsbury, Lucan, Dublin, on both Apr. 16 and 22, when, on the latter occasion, service of the documents was duly completed. [The husband] refused to sign the acknowledgment of service form which was handed to him by our agent, and has not caused an appearance to the action to be entered on his behalf. We are very loth to take steps for the action to be set down for trial in the undefended list until we have satisfied ourselves that [the husband] understands that his wife has taken proceedings for divorce, and that unless he forthwith takes some action in the matter the case will be heard by the court in his absence. Might we trouble you to let us know whether, bearing in mind his recent mental illness, you have any reason to suppose that he has not understood the nature and purport of the documents that were recently served on him. We look forward to hearing from you in this matter at your earliest convenience."

The reply which is said to be inconsistent with the medical superintendent's oath a year later is as follows:

"He [the husband] has had a serious illness and has recently completed a prolonged course of treatment and is now convalescing at our branch hospital in Lucan. I am glad to say that he has made excellent progress with treatment and I hope before long he will be able to leave hospital. I think it is most unfortunate that at this stage he should have the stress and strain of dealing with a legal matter such as you mention in your letter. In the interests of his health and complete recovery I should be most grateful if you could postpone taking any action in the matter for, say, six months, when I hope that [the husband] will be able to deal with the matter himself. Certainly as long as he is in hospital I think it would be inadvisable for him to deal with the matter, and I am sure you too would feel it more satisfactory that he should be out of hospital before proceeding with the action."

I say no more by way of analysis of that statement than that it is implicit, if not actually expressed, that on May 17, 1952, a month after the purported service had been effected, the husband was still ill, was still unable to leave hospital, was not completely recovered (though it was hoped that complete recovery might occur), and, above all, that he was not at the date of writing capable of dealing with the matter. I am bound to say that I have some difficulty in understanding how, with that expression of opinion, it was thought proper to proceed without complying with r. 64 (9) and obtaining the appointment of a guardian ad litem.

In my opinion, there is no inconsistency between what the medical superintendent said on May 17, 1952, and the considered and more detailed opinion that he has given to the Official Solicitor. I think that the question posed in the letter of May 6, 1952 (which, as I have already stated, assumes that his mental illness was "recent", whereas, in fact, it persisted at that date), whether the medical superintendent had any reason to suppose that the husband had not understood the nature and purport of the documents that were recently served on him raises too narrow an issue. That, in my opinion, is why the medical superintendent, very properly, declined to be pinned down to that aspect of the matter alone, and gave a more comprehensive answer which seems to me to have demanded more serious consideration than it received. I must speak plainly about this. I think that there was sufficient information in the letter of May 17, 1952, from the medical superintendent to necessitate an application under r. 64 (9), and that the wife went on at her peril. In my opinion, we have no option but to set aside this decree.

PEARCE, J.: I agree. There has not been a compliance with the provisions of r. 64 as required when a suit is brought against an infant or a person of unsound mind. It may be necessary in some future case to investigate with more particularity the precise area covered by the words "of unsound mind" in this rule, but I see no necessity here. This is not a border-line case. The doctor's answers to the Official Solicitor's questionnaire are verified by affidavit. They satisfy me that for the purposes of r. 64 the husband was, in the doctor's opinion, of unsound mind at the material dates. There is no evidence to the contrary. The doctor's earlier letter gives me no reason to doubt the accuracy and honesty of that opinion, and, in my view, it is consistent with that. I accept the doctor's opinion as correct. It is important that this court should guard jealously the provisions of r. 64, which were carefully framed, as LORD MERRIMAN, P., explained in Stanga v. Stanga (1), for the express purpose of protecting infants and those of unsound mind. Whatever the merits of a case this court must set a decree aside where the provisions of r. 64 (9) have not been carried out. I agree, therefore, that the decree must be set aside.

Application granted.

R. v. BARRY (GLAMORGAN) JUSTICES. Ex parte KASHIM.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.), October 6, 1953.]

Justices—Clerk—Presence in retiring room while justices consider decision.

While on a point of law justices are entitled to the advice of their clerk, they ought not to invite him to retire with them to consider a question of fact. If the clerk is so invited, he should advise the justices that it would be improper for him to accept that invitation.

Where the clerk retired with justices who had to consider only a question of fact, held, the defendant's conviction would be quashed.

MOTION for an order of certiorari.

On Feb. 13, 1953, the applicant, Nagi Kashim, was convicted at a petty sessional court sitting at Barry, Glamorgan, of being knowingly concerned in keeping a quantity of uncustomed American cigarettes with intent to defraud Her Majesty of the duties thereon, contrary to s. 186 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, and was fined £25. He applied for an order of certiorari to quash the conviction on the ground that the clerk accompanied the justices when they retired to consider their decision without being requested to do so in defiance of the remarks of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in R. v. East Kerrier JJ. Ex p. Mundy (1), to which the attention of both the justices and their clerk had been drawn.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In the course of the hearing in this court of R. v. East Kerrier JJ. Ex p. Mundy (1) it emerged that the justices' clerk had retired with the justices when, apparently, the only question that was before the justices was a question of fact. This court came to the conclusion that the conviction in that case must be quashed, but not merely on the ground that the justices' clerk had gone into the room with the justices, because we did not think at that time that it had been made sufficiently clear that this court disapproved of the practice of justices' clerks so retiring with the justices. When, in my judgment, I had announced the decision of the court, I said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 146):

"Another matter which I feel bound to mention is this. Although I cannot for the moment trace the authority, I think it has certainly been said more than once in this court that it is not right that the justices' clerk should retire with the justices. It has been said over and over again that the decision must be the decision of the justices, not the decision of the justices and their clerk, still less the decision of the clerk, and, if the clerk retires with the justices, people will inevitably form the conclusion that the justices' clerk may influence the justices, or may take some course which it is for the justices alone to take. The justices can always send for the clerk if they require advice on a point of law because that is what the clerk is there for, but it is not desirable, and it is not, I would say, regular, for a clerk to retire with justices as a matter of course at the time they are considering the facts. He should remain in the court until the justices either return into court or send for him. Whether we should have quashed the conviction on the ground that the justices' clerk retired with them (although I believe it has been done in one case), I need not say. But we think it is undesirable and we hope that in future justices' clerks will not retire with their bench, unless their advice is required."

In R. v. Welshpool JJ. Ex p. Holley (2), which, it is only fair to say, had not been reported when the present case came before the Barry justices, I was at some pains to explain the position, and I said (ante, p. 809):

"Justices will, I feel sure, recognise that it is their duty to obey a direction of this court not only in the letter but in the spirit, and that they are not to get round the direction which was given in the East Kerrier case (1) merely by pretending that they require the presence of their clerk to advise them when there is nothing but fact to be considered."

We did not mean, of course, in the East Kerrier case (1), that if a question of law were raised the clerk ought to stay in the court till the justices said: "Come out with us".

In the present case, at the end of the case for the prosecution, counsel for the defendant submitted that there was no case to answer in law. That, of course, raised a legal point, and the justices were entitled to tell their clerk to come out with them to give them his advice on that question of law. The question of law having been decided against the defendant, it remained for the defendant to try to satisfy the justices, if he could, he being charged with being in possession of uncustomed goods, that he was in possession of them innocently or that they were not, in fact, uncustomed. That was a pure question of fact. The justices then left the court and they took their clerk with them. All the justices have filed affidavits, and not one of them has suggested that there was any question on which they required the advice of their clerk. The justices cannot get round the direction this court gave in the East Kerrier case (1) merely by asking their clerk to go out with them when they do not require his assistance on any matter whatever—and they do not pretend in this case that they required his assistance. Therefore, they ought not to have asked him to go out, and when the clerk found there was nothing on which

A they required his assistance, he ought to have left the room to which the justices had retired. It is as well that clerks and justices should understand that this court requires them to follow directions which this court has given from time to time. Ever since there have been justices of the peace in this country, they have been subject to the control of the Court of Queen's Bench (now the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court) and if justices, knowing quite well the directions this court has given, act contrary to them, this court will have no hesitation in sending their names to the Lord Chancellor calling attention to what has been done.

B The direction given in the East Kerrier case (1), which the judges of the Queen's Bench Division, speaking generally, have approved, was given because the decision must be that of the bench, but, on a point of law, the bench are entitled to take the advice of their clerk. On a point of fact it is essential that the public should be able to see, and to understand, that the decision is that of the justices and of nobody else. One of the considerations which the court had in mind in the East Kerrier case (1) was the very thing that has happened in this case. The applicant has previous convictions in courts in which this very clerk has sat as clerk. I do not impute to the clerk any misconduct in the justices' room, but it is important to bear in mind that justice must not only be done but must be manifestly seen to be done. If it appears that there has been an opportunity for information to be given to the justices apart from that proved in open court, doubts may arise whether the trial has been fair.

D I have no doubt that the right course for the court to take is to quash this conviction in order to show that this court is resolved that justices shall obey the directions which this court gives, and if they do not obey the directions in the spirit as well as in the letter, other consequences will follow. The order will go for certiorari to quash.

E SELLERS, J.: I agree. I would only emphasise that it is the clerk's function to advise the justices as to his own powers as they have been defined by this court, and even if the justices do ask him to retire with them, if he is satisfied that the only matter for consideration is one of fact, he should indicate that to his justices.

HAVERS, J.: I entirely agree, and I have nothing to add.

Order of certiorari.

SOUTHGATE CORPORATION v. PARK ESTATES (SOUTHGATE), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Havers, JJ.), October 6, 1953.]

Highway—Private street works—"Unreasonable"—Proposed works premature—Proposal to make up street before land fully developed—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (c. 57), s. 7 (d).

By s. 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892: "... any owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing the [private street] works may ... object to the proposals ... on any of the following grounds ... (d) that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses are excessive ..."

The respondents owned a building estate on which they had built a certain number of houses. They were intending to build on the remaining vacant land. In 1951 the appellants resolved to execute certain private street works in a road on the estate, which road had been a private street since about 1934, the proposed works being to place three inches of tar macadam on a basis of hard core, the existing surface of the road being retained insofar as it provided this basis. The respondents, as owners under s. 5 of the Act, were liable to be charged about £3,000 towards the cost of making up the road, and in January, 1952, they objected under s. 7 (d) to the appellants' proposals to execute the works on the grounds that they were insufficient or unreasonable or that the estimated expenses were excessive, which objections were dismissed by a court of summary jurisdiction. In May, 1952, the respondents applied to the appellants, as agents for the planning authority, pursuant to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, Part III, for permission to develop the vacant land by erecting houses on it, but permission was refused by the appellants in June, 1952. The respondents intended to appeal to the Minister of Housing and Local Government, and, if their appeal were allowed, their building operations would necessitate cutting into the road to lay on gas, water, and electricity, and the heavy traffic on the road which the building operations would involve would inevitably churn up the proposed new surface. In July, 1952, the respondents appealed to quarter sessions against the dismissal of their objections under s. 7 (d) of the Act of 1892, and the appeal was allowed on the ground that the proposed works were unreasonable because they were premature. On appeal, HELD: the word "unreasonable" in s. 7 (d) of the Act of 1892 was a word of very wide import and was not to be construed in a narrow or restricted sense; it gave quarter sessions and justices jurisdiction to say whether or not, having regard to the scheme as a whole, it was reasonable that the proposed works should be done at all, and, therefore, whether it was reasonable or not that the proposed works should be done at any particular time; and accordingly, quarter sessions had power to come to the decision they did.
